SATURDAY, AUGUST 10.....1889

MARRIED.

McGOVERN—KISPERT—At Georges Creek, August 7th, 1889, by Hon. John A. Hannah, Superior Judge, Augustus G. McGovern and Annie R. Kispert.

O. H. Hill, of Bishop, has been visiting Bodie.

An unusually fine crop of hay is being put up by Mairs & Enos this year.

There are more men at work at Keeler than at any other town in the county.

Mrs. Fred. Burkhardt, of Lone Pine, is visiting with friends at Camp Independence.

Messrs. Burkhardt, Palmer and Dearborn, of Lone Pine, were in town on Wednesday.

Nothing like having grangers in the Board of Supervisors. No end of watermelons and peaches.

Attorney Miner, of Bridgeport, has recovered from his late illness and gone to San Francisco.

Mr. Luce has put up a new derrick at the marble quarry. He is now able to handle blocks weighing twenty tons.

R. T. Dunlap, of Fish Springs was in town during the week. He reports favorably on mines in his section.

Henry Davis was removed from the County Hospital to town during the week. He is temporarily insane and very ill in body.

Mr. J. C. Eddy met with an accident last Friday which prevented his attendance upon the Board of Supervisors this week.

Will they never quit? Spokane, Washington Territory, has just been destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at $6,000,000.

The new cable railway at Los Angeles has been completed to Boyle heights and the citizens of that section rejoice greatly thereat.

Road Master James has been doing good work in the lane at Camp Independence. The willows are being grubbed and the road widened.

The signal service report shows 31 cloudless days in the month of July, with an average temperature of 83°. Talk about climate!

On August 1st the Supreme Court decided the two orders appealed from in the case of Annie Turner vs. J. S. Turner in favor of Appellant.

As was stated in last week's issue the sale of the Union mine at Cerro Gordo has been effected and operations will soon be commenced there.

C. Mulholland has gone to O'ancha. He will go from there to Menache and Kern River and remain a couple of weeks, in the mountains.

Mr. Hollingsworth, agent for S. W. Luitweiler, of Los Angeles, is still in the Valley. He is becoming acquainted and is fairly successful.

On Tuesday afternoon the hay stacks belonging to John Kispert, at Georges Creek, were destroyed by fire. The cause and particulars are unknown.

A man named Flanagan was brought in to the County Hospital on Wednesday from Darwin. He arrived in a dying condition and died during the night.

Will. Yaney and H. J. Robinson started for Stockton on Thursday morning having in charge R. Fred. Brooks, who has been committed to the Insane Asylum, at that place.

Messrs. S. G. Gregg and Wm. McDonald passed through town early in the week on their way to the Kern River fishing ground. They expect to remain several weeks in the mountains.

Suit has been commenced in the Circuit Court of Northern California by the Newtown Mining Company vs. John Dumphy, T. O'Keefe and P. Reddy for the recovery of the San Peter mine, at Cerro Gordo.

L. B. Hopkins was down to Keeler at the end of last week. Mr. Hopkins was long connected with mines at Virginia City. He was one of the pioneers of Aurora and Bodie. He was looking after mining interests at Keeler.

The ninety days allowed the Supreme Court for a decision in the Elliott case, on appeal, expired on the 8th and no decision has yet been rendered. It is nearly certain, however that the case will be disposed of this month as the pay of the Judges ceases until that is done.

Walter Ober and S. Moore both request the statement made that they will accept the challenge made by Manuel Diaz to run 125 yards at Lone Pine on the 16th of September for $200 a side. It remains to be seen whether Diaz will make his challenge good. If the race is made it will be very close and a great deal of interest will taken in it. Ober and Moore are both in training.

On Thursday Mr. McConnell and others went out to the Maxim to start the mill. When they arrived there they found Arthur Smith and Neil McLean in posession of the premises, who informed Mr. McConnell that they intended to hold the same until their wages were paid. After some dispute their claims were settled and McConnell took charge of the works. There is now considerable ore on hand to be worked.

At the soda works, at Keeler, several men of more than average mental attainments are employed. One is a graduate of a leading law college, and has written quite a number of tales and stories of merit. Another is a fine telegraph operator and short hand reporter. A third is a fine musician, whose talent is widely known and highly esteemed. There are others who have respectable attainments in other arts. All the men employed there are highly commended for sobriety, industry and pleasing manners.

The Wright Irrigation Law.

California papers say that the Wright law has passed the Rubicon. The central irrigation district, Colusa County, has sold for cash $125,000 in bonds, and has used in purchasing canal right-of-way $25,000 in bonds at par, making a negotiation of $150,000 for the district. Three districts have now placed their bonds, and the law is secure as long as grass grows and water runs. It might be well for Nevada to pattern after this law.—Enterprise.

THE SODA WORKS,

A VAST SOURCE OF WEALTH.

What Energy and Capital Intelligently Directed is Doing at Keeler.

About five years ago L. F. J. Wrinkle, a well known mining engineer of Virginia City, Nevada, had occasion to make a trip to Owens Valley. He at once became much interested in Owens Lake, and began to make experiments with the water. The result of this is now seen in the developement of an industry of immense value. Mr. Wrinkle soon became satisfied that soda in any desired quantity could be obtained by the evaporation of the Lake Water. He convinced D. O. Mills, H. M. Yerington, Frank Newlands, and other wealthy men to believe as he did, and these parties furnished the capital needed. A great deal of work was done and much money spent without return the first three years. Large ponds, or ground tanks were dug close to the Lake, water was pumped into these and allowed to evaporate. The ground where the first tanks were built proved to be porous; the water filtered through and carried the soda back into the Lake. Other ground was chosen; new tanks made and trials were repeated. The result was no better than at first. The parties interested were not discouraged by these failures; they were now firmly convinced that success could be attained and determined to persevere. They had plenty of money and they spent it boldly. Again another location was selected and other tanks built. This time the right kind of ground was found. The new location lies along the Lake shore about five miles; the town of Keeler being nearly midway from either end. This tract near the lake is covered to an uncertain depth with volcanic mud of a blue color. When the ponds are dug the bottom is rolled repeatedly and becomes tough, like leather, and retains water as well. One difficulty had been overcome, but another was encountered. The new ponds were filled; evaporation went on rapidly, and several thousand tons of soda were gathered. But now it was discovered that common salt and sulphate of soda were mixed with the material in such quantity as to seriously impair its market value. New experiments were made and this difficulty was overcome. It was found that as the water evaporated and became more dense, the first matter to deposit and crystalize was the soda that is wanted. This goes on till the water attains a certain degree of density, and if it is permitted to go beyond that point salt and sulphate are precipitated and ruin the soda. When the water in the ponds is nearing the density at which these substances would be deposited, close watch is kept, and the density is reduced by the admission of new water. The soda forms on the bottom of the ponds in a sheet from one to two inches thick, and is hard as ice, but far tougher. The deposit could be made of any thickness, but one to two inches is the most convenient. When a crop is ready, in a pond, the liquid is run off into another pond at a lower level, and this is repeated until the accumulation of salt in the solution is so great that it must be let run back into the Lake. The lake-water contains 9¾ ounces solid matter in each gallon. When evaporated to the saturation point, where soda begins to deposit, or to 34° hygrometer, each gallon contains 2¼ pounds of solid matter. A very large proportion of this is a mixture of carbonate and bi-carbonate of soda; this is saved; the other constituents are salt and sulphate, and are run back into the Lake, as stated above. The soda is taken from the ponds to a mill conveniently located. A large furnace is nearly completed for roasting the soda and converting it into soda-ash. This material is used in the manufacture of glass and paper; in soap making; for bleaching woolen goods and other purposes. The object in roasting is to drive off excess of carbonic acid gas; about 150 pounds of gas is driven out of each ton of crude soda roasted. The furnace has a capacity of thirty tons per day. To make bi-carbonate of soda the crude material is crushed and dissolved in fresh water at a temperature of 150° Farenheit. The solution is then forced through a large filtering machine, to free it from impurities. It is then run into cooling tanks where the bi-carbonate settles to the bottom. At this point a very nice discovery was made by Mr. Wrinkle. He found by experiment that till the liquid falls below 73° nothing but bi-carbonate of soda is deposited. This discovery was patented by Mr. Wrinkle and the use of it given to the Company. By this means all the bi-carbonate is easily and cheaply secured. When the liquid is run off from the cooling tanks, the bi-carbonate is gathered up and run through a centrifugal dryer. From there it is taken to a very large drying room, heated by exhaust steam from the engine. When thoroughly dry it is run through burs and is then sacked and is ready for market. It is as fine and white as the finest flour, and contains 51 per cent of fixed carbonic acid gas, a much higher per cent than the baking powders on the market contain. After the temperature of the liquid has fallen below 73° it is run off into other tanks, and when the weather is cool enough nearly the whole of this solution crystalizes into carbonate of soda. This is spread out on floors till it becomes solid enough to sack and send to market. The liquid that remains after this last crystalization is pumped back to a heater; charged with soda-ash, heated to boiling, and is then drawn off into settlers, where most of it crystalizes into sal-soda, used for making soap-bleaching, and other purposes. Up to this time the evaporation ponds made have an area of thirty-one acres. Each one will give an annual crop of at least one-hundred tons of carbonate and bi-carbonate of soda. It is intended to increase the capacity of the works till the annual output shall be ten-thousand tons. As much of the material made is worth at least eighty dollars per ton, the value of this business is easily understood. The Pacific Coast even now requires more than the amount named, and the demand is steadily increasing. Owens Lake will yield an inexhaustible supply of the soda. Not only the Lake, but the lake-bed and the whole surrounding Country are full of soda. A good authority says that the primary source of the soda is the volcanic mud in which the ponds are made. At present fifty men are employed at the works; most of these are engaged in digging ponds and putting up machinery. When these improvements are completed less help will be required; but improvements will go on for a long time yet. The ordinary process for making bi-carbonate of soda is far more expensive than the process by which it is procured at Keeler. The usual way is to take soda-ash and reduce it to sal-soda. This is then put into a gas chamber with coke and lime, and is charbed with carbonic-acid gas. Thirteen to fourteen days are required to do this. Nature has already charged the soda in Owens Lake with carbonic-acid gas; and it can be formed from the water in as many hours as days are needed to change the sal-soda by artificial means. Nor is this the only advantage; by the artificial means of charging the soda with gas, forty-five per cent of gas is a high degree to get into the soda. But the naturally charged soda of Owens Lake carries 51 per cent, and even more than this, of fixed carbonic-acid gas. Natures method beats anything that man can do and costs nothing. Large quantities of the crude soda, just as it comes from the Lake, are used at the borax works along the line of the C. & C. railroad. The soda is needed to make the borax crystalize from the crude state. This enterprise will be permanent, and will for generations to come be a very important part of the industries of Inyo County.

The Breton Mills

CHAPTER I.

A PICTURE AND ITS CRITICS.

"Let's take a squint in."

It is on the sidewalk in front of the fine residence of Ezekiel Breton. Surely everybody within the length and breadth of a hundred miles must have heard the name of the wealthy mill owner, whose energy and shrewdness have passed into a byword. The house is brilliantly lighted, and the windows wide open as if to invite the attention and admiration of the humble passers by.

Three men, laborers, if coarse, soiled clothes and dull, heavy tread mean anything, have come down the street and now stand leaning against the tall iron fence.

"Why shouldn't we see the show, boys?" continued the long whiskered man, with an unpleasant laugh. "It's our work that's payin' for it, I guess. How long do you think it would take you, Jack, to scrimp enough together to buy one of them candlesticks? Hullo—there's the boss himself," and he thrust his hand inside the iron pickets to point out a portly gentleman whose bald head was fringed with silver white hair. Mr. Breton had paused a moment before the window.

"Come, let's go on," urged the man with a clay pipe, edging off a little into the shadow; "he'll see us and be mad."

"What's the odds if he does?" and the speaker frowned at the rich man from between the pickets. "He can't get help no cheaper than us, can he? That's one good pint of bein' way down, you can't tumble a mite. But just look at him, boys; big watch chain and gold bowed specs a-danglin'. See the thumbs of his white hands stuck in his vest pocket and him as smilin' as if he never did nobody a wrong in his whole blessed life. There now is somethin' purtier, though."

The old gentleman moved unsuspectingly aside and revealed a young girl, large and fair, with great calm blue eyes. She wore a pale blue silk, with delicate ruffles at her half bared elbow and at her neck, kissing the warm white skin.

"Well, I suppose my girl Jane might look just as good in such clothes as them. But she wouldn't no more speak to Jane than as if the girl wasn't human. And as for a poor man, he might pour his life out for her party face and she wouldn't give him a look. A few dollars and a suit of clothes makes the odds."

"What's she laughin' at?" said the tall man, taking his clay pipe from his mouth.

"Can't you see? There's the boy standin' jist beyond her. Breton's young hopeful. Nothin' less than the biggest kind of game for her, I cal'late."

"I never seen him before," remarked the third man, reverentially. "I s'pose he'll be our boss some day."

"He's been to college polishin' up his wits. 'Taint goin' to be so easy as it was to grind the poor. The old man now didn't need no extra schoolin'."

"I aint so sure now," said the tall man, blowing out a wreath of smoke. "The boy looks more kind about his mouth and eyes. See him look at the girl. I cal'late she don't think he's very bad."

"Wait till he gets his heel on the necks of a thousand of us, as his father has. Wait till he finds we aint got a penny ahead, nor a spot of God's earth for our own, but he at his mercy. See how kind he'll be then. 'Taint the nature of the beast, Bill Rogers."

Bill Rogers took a long look at the slight form of the mill owner's son—at his fresh, young face and small, pleasant black eyes. "I wish the lad had a chance. I believe I'd trust him, Graves. Hadn't we better be startin'? The meetin' will begin purty soon."

"What's the hurry? Curran is always late himself. Well, come along, then."

Just now Mr. Breton is leaning lightly on the mantel near one of his pet heirlooms—the silver candelabra. Near him stands a tall, elegantly formed gentleman, only a trifle past middle age, whose clear chiseled mouth has the merest hint of a smile on it, as if he had just said something bright. It was a smile he always wore when he had spoken—a smile with an edge to it. But Mr. Ellingsworth had to make that smile do good service, for he never laughed. The funniest jokes had been told him—the most ridiculous situations described to him—but he only smiled.

"What am I going to do with the boy?" Mr. Breton's voice was always loud and sharp as if making itself heard above the roaring of his mills. "Why, marry him to your daughter the first thing. Eh! Philip?"

"Why, marry him to your daughter the first thing."

Would she be angry, proud and reserved as she was? Philip shot a furtive glance at Bertha as she sat at the piano idly turning over the music sheets. But the girl might not have heard, not a shade of expression changed in her face. It might as well have been the sources of the Nile they were discussing so far as she was concerned, apparently, but as she pressed her white hand on the music sheet to keep it open, her lover's eyes softened at the flash of their betrothal diamond.

"I should think your hands must be pretty full already," suggested Mr. Ellingsworth in the low smooth tone, as much a part of his style as the cut of his black coat, "with a thousand unreasonable beings down in your factories. And by the way, I hear that Labor is claiming its rights, with a big L. As if anybody had any rights, except by accident."

"Skeptical as ever, Ellingsworth," said the mill owner with all a practical man's distaste for a thing so destructive to industry. "But no, I get along easily enough with my help if quacks and tramps would only keep out of the way; though there is some kind of an agitation meeting to-night; somebody is raising the mischief among them. I wish I knew who it was," and Mr. Breton looked impatiently around the room as if he hoped to seize the incendiary in some corner of his own parlor.

He met Bertha's blue eyes wide open in a new interest. She had half turned from the piano, but her sleeve was caught back on the edge of the keyboard, revealing the fair full contour of her arm, which glistened whiter than the ivory beneath it.

"A mystery, how charming!" she smiled; "let me picture him: tall, with clustering auburn hair on his godlike head"——

"Pish—excuse me, my dear—but more likely the fellow is some low, drunken jailbird you would be afraid to pass on the street. Some day they will find out there is no good making working people uneasy. They want the work, and they ought to be glad the work wants them. Their interests are identical with ours."

"No doubt," assented Mr. Ellingsworth, in his suavest tones, that seemed too smooth for satire, "but perhaps they think you get too large a share of the dividends."

"You like to round your sentences pretty well," retorted Mr. Breton, flushing slightly, "but do you mean to say you, of all men, sympathize with this labor reform nonsense?"

"You ought to know me, Mr. Breton. I sympathize with—nobody. It is too much trouble. And as for the sufferings of the lower classes—they may be very pitiable—but I don't see how the nether millstone can help itself, or for that matter be helped either." Then he glanced curiously toward the piano.

"Why, where are our young people?"

After considerable dumb show Bertha had become aware that Philip had some intelligence of a startling nature to communicate. So it happened that, at the moment Mr. Ellingsworth inquired for them, the young people stood just inside the door of the cozy little room called "the study."

"I am going to have some high fun tonight, Bertha; I am going to that labor meeting. I want to see the business from the inside, when the public show isn't going on."

The girl looked at him in astonishment. "They won't let you in."

"That's just where the fun is coming. It is going to be better than all the college devilry, and—wait here two minutes and I'll show you."

Book shelves ran up to the ceiling on the side of the room, opposite the door. A long office table stretched across the center almost to the high window looking toward the street. But all the business associations did not oppress this elegant young woman, who threw herself in luxurious abandon into the solitary easy chair. She apparently did not find love very disturbing. No doubt she only smiled at its poems, fervid with a passion unknown to her calm, even life. Her young lover had often been frightened at the firm outline of the cold red lips, with never a thought of kisses on them, and at the sprite-like unconsciousness of her blue eyes that looked curiously at him when love softened his voice and glorified his face. She was not listening for his returning footsteps, not one line of eagerness or of suspense was on the dispassionate face, while she played with the flashing jewel her lover had placed long ago on her finger.

The door opens behind her, but she does not turn her head—no doubt he will come in front of her if he wishes to be—there he is, a slight figure, looking very odd and disagreeable in the soiled and ill fitting clothes he has put on, with no collar or cuffs, but a blue flannel shirt open a button or two at his neck. His faded pantaloons were roughly thrust into the tops of an immense pair of cowhide boots which apparently had never been so much as shadowed by a box of blacking. His black eyes sparkle as he holds out to her a bandless felt hat which shows the marks of a long and varied history. Bertha looked at him in dull distaste. What a poor mouth he had, and how unpleasantly his face wrinkled when he smiled.

"I wouldn't ever do this again," she said coldly.

A hurt look came into his eyes; he dropped his hat on the floor and was turning dejectedly away.

The fun was all gone, and her words and her look he knew would come back to him a thousand times when he should be alone.

But she put out her hand to him like the scepter of a queen. "Never mind—you will generally wear better clothes than these, won't you?"

"But I wouldn't like to have that make any difference," said Philip, looking wistfully at the cool white hand he held. "Supposing I was poor"——

She drew her hand away impatiently. If he had known how he looked then, he would have chosen another time for his lover's foolishness.

"Don't get poor. I like pretty things and graceful manners and elegant surroundings; that is the way I am made. I should suffocate if I didn't have them."

"But," urged Philip uneasily, "you couldn't love anybody but me, could you?"

She smiled charmingly. "You must not let me!" Then she rose as if to dismiss the subject. "Are you all ready?"

In a minute more he was, after he had fastened on his yellow whiskers and bronzed over his face and neck and white wrists. "Your own father wouldn't know you!" she laughed, as they opened the outer door. Philip went down two steps.

"You shake the foundation with those boots." He was quite recovering his spirits, now that she was so kind with him. "And you will tell me all about it, and whether the leader has auburn hair as I said? How long before you will come back—an hour? Well, I'll be here as long as that."

He pulled his great hat well down over his eyes and started, but at the gate he turned to look back.

Bertha stood in the doorway, tall and queenly, the red gold of her hair glistening in the light like a halo about her head. He could not catch the look in her face, but as she stood she raised her hand to her lips and threw him a kiss with a gesture of exquisite grace.

In a moment more he heard her at the piano, and he tried to keep clumsy step to the strain from "La Traviata" that came throbbing after him.

CHAPTER II.

MASQUERADING.

Philip pushed open the door of Market hall and looked in. About sixty men were scattered over the benches in all conceivable positions. A number held pipes between their teeth, filling the room with the rank smoke of the strongest and blackest tobacco. Here and there two men appropriated a whole bench, one at each end, for a sofa. But more of them were settled down on the small of their backs, with their knees braced against the bench in front. He saw in a moment that, though he was worse dressed than any of them, yet there was a difference in kind also. There was more meaning in one wrinkle on their well worn coats than in all his ingenious paraphernalia. He felt ashamed in the presence of these pathetic realities, and turned to go back, but his great boots creaked incautiously. Only two or three looked around; a poor man more or less does not count for much with the poor or with the rich. Two or three grave, worn faces, two or three pairs of tired, hopeless eyes rebuked him unconsciously for the idle freak that brought him there. What right had he there, who came out of curiosity to watch the unhealthy symptoms of the disease called poverty? What an insult to their bitter needs were his mock trimmings, in which he came like one masquerading among a graveyard full of ghosts!

He found his way to a seat with a hang dog air, the best piece of acting he had done yet. The same stolid look was on this man's face, bleached to a settled paleness from the confinement of years in the walls of the mills, and there was a bitterness about the mouth and nostrils as if he had not kissed the rod that smote him.

"No call to be shamed, young man. I suppose them's the best clothes you got. Your heart may be just as white as if you had a better livin'."

The poor don't talk except when they have something to say. So Philip said nothing, to act in character.

"I suppose you think you're pretty hard up," resumed the big whiskered man, who was no other than Graves, the man who had peered into his companion's parlor window only an hour ago. And he glanced significantly at Philip's boots and soiled pantaloons.

"Jest look at that little chap over yonder, all bowed up. He don't look very hearty, does he? Up to his house there's a wife all faded and broken, and two little cripples for children, a whinin' and a screechin' from mornin' to-night. He would chop his head off to help them, but he is slow and weak, and don't git but ninety cents a day, and he can't save them babies a single ache, nor ease their poor misshapen little bones one twinge. It takes every penny to keep the wretched breath in 'em all, and him and his wife, once as purty a gal as ever you seen, has only to stand and see 'em cry. They used to cry themselves, too, but that was long ago."

Graves looked about him. "Do you see that lean faced man with the hurt arm, at the end of the seat ye're on? Well, he's got the smartest little boy in town. All he wanted was schoolin', and his father and mother saved and scrimped so he could have it. You oughter seen how proud they was to see their lad struttin' off to school while they kept a thinkin' of him all day long in the mill. And they was never too tired to hear the boy tell them over the hard names he had learned. And then they would tell the neighbors, who sometimes got jealous, how they was savin' every cent and how their boy was goin' to college like old Breton's son. But there was no call for the neighbors to be jealous; the woman went to work one day when she was sick, and caught her death o' cold and it took a mint of money to nuss and then bury her. Then the man fell and got hurt and the little boy cried enough to break your heart when they took his books away." The face of the long whiskered man softened an instant, but he turned his head away.

"He needn't a cried," he said gruffly; "I don't know as he was any better than the rest of us."

Now there came a little commotion on the platform.

A man who sat head and shoulders above the group on the platform rose to his full height like a young giant and came forward. He looked down into the upturned faces for a moment in silence, and Philip felt his steel blue eyes piercing him like a sword.

"Men," he began. Then he stopped speaking a moment. "Yes, men you are, in spite of all the degradation the rich and the powerful can put upon you. The time is coming when the principles of equality vaunted on the pages of so many lying constitutions, and breathed on the lips of so many false tongued demagogues, shall be fully realized. The time is coming when the work shall not be on one side and the reward on the other. We shall not always wear rags as the livery of our masters. Not always shall the poor rise early and toil late, wear their skin till it be shriveled like parchment, and their bodies till they be ready to drop into the grave for weariness, only to pluck the fruit of God's bountiful earth for the lips of the idle and the proud to taste. The gracious favors of ten thousand smiling hills and valleys are gathered only for the few, and those whose arrogance and hardness of heart have least deserved them. And they tell us it must be so; that the few who are more capable and prudent should thus be rewarded for their superiority. They point to six thousand years' oppression of the poor, and say what has been must be. Yes, for six thousand years the groans of the poor have gone up, and as long the few, for whom alone all the beauty and bounty of the great earth seemed to blossom, have answered with curses and contempt." Now his magnificent chest seemed to expand; his voice lost its pathetic tone and rang out like a trumpet.

"But the knowledge they have given to make us better slaves is bursting our fetters before their frightened eyes. The astonished people see at last the black and monstrous injustice of their subjection. They have numbered their hosts, as countless as the sands of the sea. It is the strength of their arms has girdled the earth with unceasing streams of wealth. It is the ingenuity of their brains has harnessed each of the untamed forces of nature to service. The infinite number of their cunning fingers has woven the fabrics to clothe Christendom, and their red blood poured out on a thousand battlefields has bought vain triumphs for the pride of their masters."

His lips suddenly curled in majestic scorn. "And how long will your patient, calloused hands build palaces for the great, while you live in hovels? Ought not such strong arms as yours be able to win enough to make one modest home happy, if you were not robbed? The world is full of cheap comforts; the harvests are boundless, the storehouses bursting, but each worthless pauper has as good a share as you who make the wealth. You cause the increase; your hands till the teeming lands and work the tireless looms. Your shoulders bow beneath the products of your toil—like muzzled oxen beating out the grain for empitying masters. Why will you endure it? They tell you it is only right; their books teach gentle submission; their oily tongued speakers soothe you with proverbs and consoling maxims, but all the wise men of centuries and all the hundred thousand printing presses of today, heaping up books in every language like a new tower of Babel, cannot turn a lie into the truth."

Philip sat leaning forward, his eyes fixed on the speaker in a strange excitement. Curran's words came into his soul like molten fire, consuming the chaff of years and leaving a path of light behind. He was full of wonder that he had been blind so long, mixed with joy at his new piercing vision. He had forgotten how he had come there, and felt a sudden desire to take the hand of every poor man in the room and pledge him his help. But no one seemed touched as he was. The same hard look was on each face, the mask the poor assume to cover their distress, but the eyes of them all were centered on their orator.

"But you are poor, and with your wives and children are hungry for even the crust of bread your masters cast you. Though you were a million to one, you are held to their service, no matter how unjust, by the daily recurring facts of hunger and cold. Look! the fields are white with their harvests, the shops filled with their cloths, but the law makers and their pitiless police are in their pay, and you must bow your meek necks and thank your masters humbly for the trifle their greed vouchsafes you."

Philip's heart thumped painfully within his faded coat. Could the speaker give no hope to the wretched listeners hanging on his lips? Must they cringe forever at the foot of power? Their thin, worn hands made the bread, but it was snatched from their mouths and doled out in scanty allowance as the price of hopeless slavery. He had never seen it before.

"Who is he?" he whispered to his companion. The man did not even turn his face from the speaker.

"It is Curran. He belongs to the Labor league." This, then, was the agitator his father spoke of. And Bertha had pictured him rightly, with his clustering auburn hair. For a moment he stood silent, while under the divine light in his eyes the souls of each one ripened for his next words.

It is thought that Tu'are lake will go completely dry this summer. The water is not over six feet deep anywhere, and all the fish are dead except the perch, and they are dying.

The Virginia (Nev.) Chronicle says: Snow plants, which are most numerous in the Sierras during May, are still plentiful in the vicinity of Emerald bay. The plant was first discovered in the Sierras by a naturalist accompanying General Fremont's party to the Pacific slope in 1843. The early development of the plant takes place under banks of deep snow. They come to the surface as the snow melts away from them. A recent arrival from Emerald bay brought with him a plant the stem of which is eighteen inches in length. It is kept in snow and looks as healthy as when it was plucked from the place where it grew.

LADIES IN LUCK.

They Draw a Prize in the Louisiana State Lottery.

THEY RECEIVE ONE THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS EACH.

Mrs. J. D. Collins, wife of an engineer on the East Tennessee road, and a friend of hers, Mrs. J. W. Little, are in luck.

They have drawn a prize in the Louisiana State Lottery amounting to twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mrs. Collins was seen at her home, 91 Windsor street, by a Journal reporter this morning.

"Yes," she said, in answer to the reporter's question as to the truth of what he had heard, "I have drawn a prize in the lottery."

"My husband has been buying lottery tickets ever since we were married, ten years ago. He would buy a ticket every month or so, but never drew anything. About four months ago his luck changed and he drew fifteen dollars. He and some of his friends went into partnership and bought a ticket, which drew two hundred dollars, but they only received one-twentieth of it.

"Just before the last drawing my husband suggested to me that I buy a ticket and try my luck. I took Mrs. J. W. Little, a friend, in as a partner, and we bought ticket No. 34,281, for which we paid fifty cents each.

"After the drawing came off we received a circular with the number we had encircled with a pencil mark, and on looking at it we found that our ticket had drawn one-twentieth of the capital prize of $50,000, which was $2,500. We went to Lowry's bank and drew on the lottery for the money.

"I received $1,250 and Mrs. Little received the same. We had to pay the bank $3 for collecting the money. We have not decided what we will do with our money, but have it in the Gate City National Bank."

"Will Mr. Collins try his luck again?" asked the reporter.

"I cannot tell. He may stop now that he has drawn a prize through me, or he may continue in the hopes of drawing another."—Atlanta (Ga.) Journal, May 30.

Attorney-General Johnson has decided that although $25,000 was set aside for the use of the State Board of Horticulture yet it did not call for any provision which would justify sending an entomological expert to Australia and New Zealand, nor employing such an expert here unless it be for the Inspector of Fruit Pests.

THAT CANTANKEROUS OLD WOMAN

Described in the nursery ballad, who "lived upon nothing but victuals and drink," and yet "would never be quiet," was undoubtedly troubled with chronic indigestion. Her victuals, like those of many other elderly persons whose digestive powers have become impaired, didn't agree with her. This was before the era of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, or some one of her numerous friends and relatives would undoubtedly have persuaded her to try the great specific for dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. This would have been a measure of self-protection on their part, for she would soon have been cured and ceased to disturb them with her clamor. The most obstinate cases of indigestion, with its attendent heartburn, flatulence, constant uneasiness of the stomach and of the nerves, are completely overcome by this sovereign remedy. Chills and fever and bilious remittent, rheumatism and kidney troubles are also relieved by it.

The only legitimate anger is a holy emotion directed against an unholy thing. Sin, not our neighbor must be its object.

PILES! PILES! PILES!

Dr. William's Indian Pile Ointment is the only sure cure for Blind, Bleeding or Itching Piles ever discovered. It never fails to cure old chronic cases of long standing.

Judge Coffinbury, Cleveland, Ohio., says: "I have found by experience that Dr. William's Indian Pile Ointment gives immediate relief."

There has never been anything discovered that will equal Dobbins' Electric Soap for all household uses. It makes paint look like new, and clothes as white as snow. Our wash-woman says it is a pleasure to use it. Ask your grocer for it.

A single conversation across the table with a wise man is better than ten years mere study of books.

"For seven long years I struggled away farming, running a mill, &c., until I was fortunately introduced to B. F. Johnson & Co., Richmond, Va., by my brother, and I went to work at once, and in seven months I had made more clear money than I had made in the seven years before. They took me right by the hand from the start and seemed to be very glad of the chance to show me how to do it." This is about what a young man said a year or so ago of the above-mentioned firm. Since that time he has been steadily at work for them, and is now one of the happiest men in America. If you need employment, it would be a good thing for you to follow this young man's example.

CLIMATE FOR CONSUMPTIVES.

The several climates of Florida, Colorado and California have each been much prescribed for sufferers from lung disease, yet thousands of the natives in those states die of this fatal malady. A far more reliable remedy is to be had in every drug store in the land, and one that can be used at home; a remedy which is sold, by druggists, under the manufacturers' positive guarantee that, if taken in time and given a fair trial, it will effect a cure, or money paid for it will be promptly returned. We refer to that world-famed remedy for consumption (or lung scrofula) known as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It is the only remedy for this terrible disease possessed of such superior curative properties as to warrant its manufacturers in selling it under a guarantee.

A TWENTY YEAR'S EXPERIENCE.

C. D. Fredricks, the well-known photographer, 770 Broadway, N. Y., says:

"I have been using ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS for 20 years, and found them one of the best of family medicines. Briefly summing up my experience, I say that when placed on the small of the back ALLCOCK'S PLASTERS fill the body with nervous energy, and thus cure fatigue, brain exhaustion, debility and kindred difficulties. For women and children I have found them invaluable. They never irritate the skin or cause the slightest pain, but cure sore throat, coughs, colds, pains in side, back or chest, indigestion and bowel complaints."

IT WAS JUST IN TIME.

G. C. Bartholomew, Kalkaska, Mich., says: "I located in this place five years ago, having formerly resided in Troy, N. Y. I have been a great sufferer from what the physicians of Troy called Bright's disease. I used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y. All the terrible symptoms of the disease are gone. I have no traces of any disorder of the kidneys, liver or bladder. Who would begrudge the cost of this medicine (one dollar a bottle) for such a blessing or refuse this simple though sincere token of gratitude for being perfectly cured? I owe everything to Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, and hope this will induce others to use the medicine who suffer from any kidney, liver or blood disorder."

MIRACULOUS RESTORATION.

That dainty lady tripping by,
How light her step, how bright her eye,
How fresh her cheek with healthful glow,
Like roses that in Maytime blow!

And yet few weeks have passed away
Since she was fading, day by day.
The doctor's skill could naught avail;
Weaker she grew, and thin and pale.

At last, while in a hopeless frame,
One day she said, "There is a name
I've often seen—a remedy—
Perhaps 'twill help; I can but try."

And so, according to direction,
She took Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription,
And every baleful symptom fled,
And she was raised as from the dead.

CURE FOR SUICIDE.

The spread of suicide is alarming some of our cotemporaries, and that they should be alarmed is not to be wondered at, perhaps, if the statement made is correct that "within the last three months three clergymen, three postmasters, six physicians, twelve well-to-do merchants, seven office-holders, three lawyers, three bankers, four railroad officials, two artists, three mayors, one journalist, one army officer and two capitalists have, for various reasons, voluntarily shuffled off this mortal coil." But in viewing such a record a little philosophy is desirable. An increase of suicide is not necessarily a proof that the world is growing more unhappy. On the contrary, it may mean that the general state of society is improving. Men and women do not kill themselves because their material condition is unbearable, but because some mental state leads them to prefer the sleep of death, no matter "what dreams may come," to the perplexity and moral tension of existence. The most miserable of people, speaking materially, are the least given to suicide—as, for instance, the Spaniards and the Italians. Suicide is vastly more prevalent among the better nourished and better educated Germans than among either of the nations we have named; the thrifty and intelligent Danes and Saxons are most given to suicide of all the peoples of Europe, while squalid and benighted Spain has the lowest suicide percentage. If we compare the epochs of the world, we find that in Rome, in the days of the glory of the republic and the empire, suicide was much more prevalent than it was in the darkness of the Middle Ages.

Suicide is a malady of cultivation—a characteristic, it may be said, of an advanced and even prosperous state of society. In the United States, where, in the five years between 1882 and 1887, 8,226 persons took their own lives, only 270 of these deaths were attributable to destitution. It is to "end the heartache," and not to escape unbearable material conditions, that people take their lives; and this heartache or world weariness in quite as distinctly traceable to the increased sensitiveness of organization on the part of a cultivated generation as is the delight in progress, in society, in art, in music, and in literature, that is also characteristic of this epoch of the world. The prevalence of suicide is in many ways lamentable; but there is no reason why the world should alarm itself unduly about it, or, treating it as if it were due to some preventable cause, like an epidemic of diphtheria, should call out, "What is to be done?" Nothing is to be done, at least by society as a whole. Suicide is an inevitable ailment of a time, which, on the whole, is the best time that the world has ever had.

But though society can do nothing to restrain suicide, the individual being supreme in at least this respect, something may be done, and effectively, too, by the individual who feels the urging to self-destruction strong within him. If no consideration of the hereafter gives such a one pause, it is in his power to put himself in healthy harmony with nature, if he will, by obeying the philosophical injunction to "look outward and not in;" to admit to his life the light of nature—first comprehending that nature is not a thing exterior to him, but that it is himself and he is nature—and not forever shut himself within the darkness of a partial and selfish view of life; and, examining in this light his condition, to determine whether the lethargy and despair which impel him to suicide are not of his own making, and whether the natural gift of hope and health are not still within recovery.—Boston Transcript.

THE HORSE STARTED.

"What are we stopping for?" said the lady. "Balky horse on the track," answered the gentleman. "He won't move for whipping or petting or whispers in his ear or—any thing." Did I ever tell you," she asked, "about my experience with a balky horse? No? Well, it was out on the Colorado plains. The most elegant young eligible of our set had invited me to take a ride behind his high-spirited, line-blooded horse. I got myself up to do justice to the occasion. All went delightfully till, when we were on the open plain outside Denver, that valuable animal concluded to pause in his rapid motion and meditate. My escort shook the reins, clucked persuasively, demonstrated encouragingly, gave a touch of the whip, at which the horse reared and kicked viciously, but still we were stationary out on that lonely sandy level. My elegant escort grew red in the face with mortification, and clenched his teeth so as not to let slip any regrettable words. 'If you will allow me to get out I could start him,' he said, 'O, by no means,' I rejoined, 'I could never hold him. Let me get out, and try putting sand in his mouth. I've been told that worked like a charm.' And so it did. I clambered out of the buggy, grabbed a good fist full of fine sand, opened the jaws of that horse, and threw it in. The astonished horse tore off like a flash, and as I stood alone, five miles from home in that solitary place and watched the maddened horse, the powerless driver, and the black buggy grow a mere dot in the distance, I decided the experiment had been a perfect success as far as starting the horse was concerned."—Chicago Journal.

SIGNAL TOWER GIRLS.

Lonely Nights in Order That Travelers May Speed Along in Safety.

The block signal system of the Pennsylvania railroad is a great success, but one scarcely realizes how much depends on the carefulness and wakefulness of the telegraph operator until he spends a night in one of these telegraph towers.

It was the misfortune of a Dispatch reporter not long since to have such an experience. Caught at night in the country, with the only hotel in the village two miles away, and the farmers for miles around sound asleep, one of the lonely towers of the Pennsylvania road was not uninviting under such circumstances. The news gatherer had a long telegram to send, and the young lady operator vowed a thousand times, as she admitted afterward, that she would keep the door locked hereafter and admit nobody but railroad men at night. But when the hard job had been performed, and after vigorous rubbing the blood began to return into her numb arm, she was pleased with the prospect of having even a reporter to talk to until morning.

How these poor girls in the towers must suffer from loneliness none but they themselves can tell. If a man had a wife that talked too much he could easily effect a cure by having her learn the telegraph business, and then secure her a position in one of the Pennsylvania towers. It is surprising how many lady operators there are on the railroads, and invariably they work at night. One of them accounted for it by saying that their chiefs are men, and they try to discourage women from entering the business as much as possible.

"I wish I didn't have to work," said the lady operator in the course of the long chat. "Cortainly we get lonely, and the night is always terribly long. I have two revolvers in this drawer, but I am awfully afraid of fire-arms. In my experience so far I have had plenty of scares, but I never was really frightened but once. A German tramp was determined to come into the tower one night, and, placing a skid which the men used in handling freight against the building, he climbed up as far as the window.

"I pointed the revolver at the fellow's head, and he cried out to me in broken English not to shoot. I didn't, and I confess I felt as much relieved as he did when he found himself on the ground again. He slid down that skid almost like a shot.

"Most of the night operators on the Pennsylvania road are girls. About the hardest work we have to do is to pull the lever back and forward which changes the lights. In the winter, when the long bar becomes covered with ice, it is almost impossible to pull it, and it requires all our exertion.

"My greatest trouble is to keep awake after three o'clock in the morning. We help each other, and if I think an operator is asleep I try to warn her by making all the noise over the wires I can. I remember when the Eastern express was put on early in the morning. The operators were so used to dozing about that time of the night that the express had to make a number of stops on its first trip. You see the red lights hang out continually, and this the engineers are guided by. If the operator goes to sleep the trains are blocked, and if she is reported she is fined two dollars.

"Well, I have forgotten how often that train was stopped the first morning. At some towers they had to break open the door to see what was the matter. Generally the conductors and engineers are good fellows and do little reporting, but there is a limit to their patience. The train made a number of trips before the operators got used to the new run, and now we all manage to be awake."—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

A Mirror of Your Mind.

Starting with the word Washington, write down one hundred words just as they occur to you. Let your second word be the one which Washington naturally suggests to you. Possibly it will be capitol. It may be President. Take the word which first comes into your mind. In the same manner let the third word be suggested by the second, the fourth by the third, and so on. Be careful that the third word is not suggested by both the first and second. Drop the first entirely and let your mind go from the second alone to the third. Having written this list of words you will have furnished yourself with a cheap but very useful mirror of your mind. If you are able to use this mirror you may discover some very serious defects in your mental processes. You may discover that you think along certain lines too frequently. You may discover that you are using superficial principles quite too much, to the neglect of more important laws of mind. You will thus be led to avoid certain linkings, and to encourage others of a more philosophical nature.—Des Moines (Ia.) Register.

CHILDREN OF TO-DAY.

Why Parents Are Getting to Be Nervously Afraid of Their Offspring.

One day last week, a rather elderly man was observed to get into a horse car and take a seat beside a couple of bright-looking little school children. Of an evidently amiable turn of mind, he at once began to beam on the children, and to put to them the following questions: "Which would you say, if asked, seven and five is eleven, or seven and five are eleven?" "I should say twelve," at once replied one of the pair, and did it in a very superior manner of his own. "Oh! ah! yes! I think you are right!" answered the disconcerted questioner, who for the rest of the ride held his peace. Evidently he had been so anxious to show himself "booked up" in a modern point of grammar that was never thought of in his own early schooldays as to have quite lost sight of the multiplication table. But the funny thing to note was the air of lofty complacency with which the child of seven manifestly felt himself entitled to look down on the man of sixty. His little frame dilated with the sense of what Milton calls "the formidable independence begotten of converse with truth." He felt his feet planted on a rock of scientific authority, against which all the traditions of age and life experience would beat in vain; and, so, that he had "settled" that old gentleman.

Now, the mischief of it is that a specimen brick of this little chap is in all our households of to day. Boy or girl, it makes no difference. The conservatively orthodox father, perfectly sound himself on Noah's ark, suddenly finds his child putting contemptuous questions about the cubic contents of oxygen needful for the respiration of so vast a number of beasts; the musically inclined mother, brought up on "Kathleen Mavourneen" and "Robin Adair," equally finds herself regarded as a curious and interesting "survival" of the antediluvian epoch of music that preceded Schubert and Chopin. In one way or another, this phenomenon is so perpetually manifesting itself that fathers and mothers are actually getting to be nervously afraid of their children. Naturally, no parent likes to live in an atmosphere of intellectual and æsthetic contempt, and yet it is too late in life for him to go to school again and learn all the new-fangled ropes in grammar, pronunciation, theology, science and art. What, then, shall be done?

In the direct line of American evolution, as it is so vigorously going on today, it would seem vain to look for any help in this sad plight from parents themselves. Their day is evidently over. So long as they could keep up a decent semblance of superiority to their children, they could command a certain degree of respect. But this is no longer possible. It counts for nothing now that a parent was well educated in his day and generation. So was Hipparchus before Copernicus came along and turned all his ideas topsey-turvey. No, it is from the children alone that any prospect of relief can be looked for. More and more are they manifestly destined to become the superiors of their fathers and mothers, to see it so clearly themselves that a wide range of new duties and responsibilities will ultimately be devolved upon them. Why, then, should not advancing education seek to develop in children a thoughtful, and even chivalrous, sense of these new duties and responsibilities? Contempt for inferiors is not the necessary and inevitable accompaniment of superior position and attainment. "Noblesse oblige." Why may not, for example, the fuller development of the sentiment of pity—a sentiment so deep-seated in the human heart—furnish solid ground for the hope of a brighter future? "Poor father! why should he not, in compassion, be suffered to still play with his Noah's ark? Poor mother! why should she not be left to enjoy her romantic tears over 'Robin Adair?'" Is it simply millennial to prophesy of the future, fully-evolved American child, so merciful and gracious, a recognition of the real situation as this? Surely, if the whole data and doctrine of evolution go to show that it required the sacrifice of long generations, whose lives amounted to nothing in themselves, to eventuate in the quintessence of the American boy or girl of to-day, it does not seem overbold to hope or even believe in the coming of a time when these boys and girls shall be led, by the great stream of tendency, to the acknowledgment of the duty of patience and forbearance with their unhappy parents. No longer will it seem right simply to snub or to laugh at them, or even to keep them in a state of perpetual mental anxiety lest they shall slip and fall. Depend upon it, the day will come when the higher orders of children will begin to admit this, as a logical necessity of the changed order of an antiquated and bygone relation.—Boston Herald.

FURNISHING A PARLOR.

A Story With a Moral For Dissatisfied Young Women.

Mrs. Hutton had never had a parlor in the farm-house. There was the big, sunny, clean kitchen where she worked, and, opening out of it, the living-room, with a green and black rag carpet on the floor, her pots of geraniums in the windows, Jenny's sewing machine in one corner, Abe's shelves of books in another, father's big easy chair at one side of the fire and her own on the other, with the little table beside it, on which lay the Bible, the Baptist paper and the basket of stockings.

The summer boarders declared it to be the most delightful and the pleasantest of rooms; but Jenny wanted a parlor. "All genteel people," she said, "had one."

After the boarding season was over her father handed her a hundred dollars.

"You have worked hard this summer," he said. "Fit up the gray room as a parlor to suit your taste, Jenny."

The sum seems small to city people, but it was enormous to Jenny. She consulted all her friends. Each one gave her different advice, but all agreed that she must be "in the style." Mrs. B—— told her that "pink wall-paper was the rage in New York." Mrs. C—— described a lovely set of red furniture which she had seen in Trenton. Mrs. R—— assured her that her own curtains were "the latest thing out," and offered to send for a pair just like them.

Hence Jenny's walls were pink, her chairs scarlet, her curtains blue. She bought cheap tables and gilded them, because somebody had seen gilt tables and thought them "lovely." She bought baskets of colored paper flowers, purple plush tidies, yellow and violet ribbons to tie back the curtains, because somebody else told her that these things were the fashion.

When the room was finished, the jarring colors fretted and annoyed her, though she did not understand the cause. The summer boarders, when they came, glanced into the hideously fine parlor with a look of amusement; but they sat with her mother in the old living-room.

One old gentleman, who was an artist, made a sketch of the room, with her mother in it at work by the fire, and one day, when Jenny pressed him, explained to her that the parlor, like most show-rooms, expressed nothing but the whims of fashion, while the sitting-room caught the character and human interest of the people who made it a home.

Jenny was puzzled; but she felt that her attempt at tawdry display was a failure, and almost resolved never to have any thing in her house hereafter for show again.

Every girl, probably, who reads this story will sometime have to decide upon the furnishing of the room or house in which she lives. Can she learn any thing from Jenny's mistake?—Youth's Companion.

TIMOTHY FOR HORSES.

A Stock-Raiser's Experience With Grass That Was Cut Early.

My observation and experience have proven that nearly every one, especially farmers, feed twice as much hay as is necessary or best for horses, the common practice of feeding it being to gather up a fork or arm full and fill the manger of each horse. It has been thoroughly proven that fifteen pounds of hay is a liberal day's allowance for a horse. I have in my barn a small scale and I bind up my hay (as grain is bound) in bundles weighing seven and eight pounds each. By weighing one occasionally you soon become so practiced that you can guess very accurately as to pounds; and any one who has never taken the trouble to do this will be surprised what a small amount of hay a horse requires. You not only save in the expense, but horses are much less liable to sickness and disease when fed a proper allowance of hay regularly (the same as you feed grain). They relish it and do better when fed in this way.

I prefer timothy cut early. Do not think a little clover any damage in timothy hay when cut early and properly cured. Horses do better on chopped hay; and I have added one-third oats straw (when nice and bright) and chopped together, when hay is high, and found it gave splendid results when feeding horses to fatten for market. The best hay I ever fed, I cut so early and put in stack so green that all who saw it predicted it would mold in the stack. I sprinkled with salt occasionally as I stacked it and it came out green and sweet.—J. W. Booker, in Orange Judd Farmer.

—Chicken in Cream.—Select a plump, young chicken; clean it nicely and divide into pieces. Roll or dredge in flour and fry to a golden brown. Arrange neatly on a dish and pour over it a dressing made of a cup of cream brought to the boiling point, into which are stirred the beaten yelks of two eggs, salt and pepper and a few drops of lemon, being careful that it does not curdle or get too thick. Garnish with parsley, if liked, and serve at once.

—"Hand that feather-bed down carefully, and don't throw the pictures about so recklessly. Great heavens, man, you'll break every spring in that sofa! Here, you, you've got the stove lid right among the best dresses! Stupid! Why can't a man that knows something be sent with a moving truck?" The above is a short chapter from May-day moving experiences.—Hartford Post.

Matters of Importance.

They were in the conservatory at an evening party, and there, amid the perfume of the roses and posies, he had fervently declared his passion.

"Mr. Sampson, George," she responded, with womanly tenderness, "my heart has been wholly yours for months, and now," she went on, shyly taking his arm, "you may take me in to supper; I heard it announced when you first began those words of love which have so blissfully changed all the colors of my life."—Harper's Bazar.

Blood Will Tell.

Phyllis (sotto voce)—Why don't you acknowledge his courtly salutation, Dorothy? Is it because his father was in soap?

Dorothy (in whispered warmth)—Yes, my family traditions are against cultivating such an acquaintance.

Phyllis (soothingly)—Pardon me, dearest, I did not mean to wound you. But were all your ancestors tramps?—Munsey's Weekly.

HISTORY DONE OVER.

A Newly Discovered Anecdote of Queen Elizabeth.

The March wind was swirling and soughing drearily as Sir Walter Raleigh ascended the steps to the palace and inquired of the Grand Duke of the Vestibule if her majesty was at home. That individual, turning to the Goldstick in Waiting, repeated the question to him, and he in turn interrogated the First Lady of the Front Staircase, who promptly communicated Sir Walter's request for information to the proper authorities, the result being that the courtier was informed that her majesty was in and would be pleased to have him call again next week. This Sir Walter, concealing his discomfiture, proceeded to do, remarking to the queen when next he met her that she had treated him in a very wintry manner the last time he called.

"No, my dear Sir Walter," replied her majesty; "the treatment accorded you was not wintry, it was summary."

"Ha!" smiled the courtier. "You were feeling coolly that morning."

"Wrong again, Sir Walter," was her majesty's quick retort. "I was not coolly disposed. Indeed I was much less Rawly disposed than usual."

"Were I your enemy, madame," quoth the courtier, "I should inform your majesty that the jest was good when first 'twas uttered by the third assistant game keeper on my great-great-grandfather's estates, some two hundred years ago, but as one of your majesty's devoted slaves I remember what is due your highness, and observe, 'Ha! ha!' Thy wit well nigh drives me to the verge of lunacy. Again your majesty will permit me to observe, 'Ha! ha!'"

"Laugh away, my dear Sir Walter," replied the queen, somewhat piqued; "but do not laugh too hard. Men have been known to laugh their heads off."

It Is All Right.

"I think I dropped a letter into the mail the other day without stamping it," said a man at the postoffice as he called for the chief clerk.

"If you did it has gone to the dead letter office."

"Has, eh? You must have known that it was a mistake."

"Yes."

"And you ought to have held it for inquiry."

"We have our rules."

"And they are mighty impudent rules, let me tell you! The postoffice department needs overhauling, and I'll help to see it done!"

The next day the man returned, this time with a smile on his face, and said:

"You remember I was speaking about an unstamped letter?"

"Yes."

"I was much put out."

"Yes."

"Well, I want to apologize. That letter was directed to an acquaintance. In it I called him a liar and a horse thief. Last night I found out that I was mistaken. He hasn't got the letter and won't get it, and so won't know anything about it. The postoffice department is all right. Rules are all right. Clerks are all right. Have a cigar and press on to promotion and increased salary."—Detroit Free Press.

He Couldn't Strike.

He stood on a step ladder trimming the dead limbs out of a fruit tree, when a man came along with some tools in his hand and stopped and asked:

"How many hours are you putting in for a day's work?"

"I'm busy from daylight to 8 or 9 o'clock at night," was the reply.

"Don't you know that nine hours is a day's work?"

"I've heard so, but he won't let me off at that."

"Then strike on him."

"I can't very well."

"Dasn't you kick?"

"It wouldn't do any good."

"Some rich old cuss who wants to grind you into powder, eh?"

"Well, he keeps me at work. I believe I put in thirteen hours every day."

"Then you are a fool?"

"Maybe so."

"He ought to be talked to."

"Yes."

"Why don't you quit?"

"I would, you see, but I am the 'old cuss' you are talking about, and though my man can get his day of nine hours I have to put in three or four more, or things will get behind."—Detroit Free Press.

Would Go That Far.

"Say, come into the bank and identify me, will you?" he asked of an acquaintance on the street.

"Identify you as what?"

"As John Blank."

"Why, yes, I'll go that far, I guess, though perhaps it is taking a risk. I didn't know but what you wanted me to vouch for your honesty and respectability."—Detroit Free Press.

PROTECTING TREES.

Effectual Remedies to Be Applied Where Rabbits Are Very Numerous.

A nurseryman recommends the following remedies: A teaspoonful of tincture of assofœetida in half a bucketful of liquid clay, mud or muck of any kind, applied with a brush to the stem and branches of young trees will preserve them from the attacks of rabbits without injury to the trees. Two or three applications during the winter will be sufficient. A mixture of lime water and cow manure made pretty strong forms an excellent anti-rabbit composition. There should be plenty of the latter ingredient, both to make it adhere properly and because, if lime be in excess, the mixture dries too white upon the trees and is unsightly; whereas, if properly mixed, it dries just the right shade of greenish gray. When tar is objectionable on account of its injuring the young trees, a simple mixture of soot and cow manure made thin enough to be put on with a brush will help to ward off the attacks of rabbits during the ordinary seasons. A mixture of equal proportions of sulphur, soot and lime made into a thick cream with liquid cow manure is also very effectual in cases where a strongly smelling remedy is not objected to. Where appearance is of no consequence Stockholm tar is recommended. Gas-tar should never be applied to young trees, especially if the bark be already stripped away from them. The stems should be tarred from the ground to about twenty inches in height. If the trees be planted for ornament, the following plan is preferable if the extra expense be no objection. Instead of applying to the trees itself, stick three or four stakes round each plant, at the distance of nine inches or a foot from it, then tie a piece of fresh tarred line round the stakes at the distance of nine inches from the ground. The tar should be mixed with an equal portion of manure of about the same consistence as the tar, or it may injure some of the trees. A strip of tarred paper tied round the stem is also of service where the rabbits are not very numerous. Strong subjects may be daubed with a mixture of equal parts of gas tar, cow manure and water made into a thick paint. If there be any marks of old bites they should be carefully painted over. Among miscellaneous remedies are the following: Place a thin layer of weeds or refuse round the stems, fasten it with a tough reed or tie of straw. Rub the bark with something distasteful to them, such as strong-smelling grease. The application of a paint made of buttermilk and soot when snow falls, and again in March, is said to be an excellent remedy. Wire netting or tying sticks or cornstalks round the necks of plants are effectual remedies in severe seasons where the rabbits are numerous.—Practical Farmer.

PROFITABLE CROPS.

How Farming Might Be Made More Remunerative Than it Has Been.

It is small, not large, crops that we need more of. My minimum crops have invariably been more profitable, and I have heard many farmers make the same remark. Would it not be well for our farmers to combine to produce less for a few years of all staple crops, thereby thoroughly cleaning up the surplus and getting better returns for our labor than we have received for the last decade? Certainly we have the same right to combine to limit production as have coal or oil companies, millers and manufacturers. Some may say that it is our duty to ourselves and our country to do our best in our chosen calling—but best for whom? If we can do better by producing less and getting more for it, why not do it, as long as other producers are doing the same thing and we have to exchange our products for theirs?

Why should farmers be the only class of producers that can not establish a price for their commodities? When we buy we have to pay the price asked; when we sell we have to take the pittance the purchaser sees fit to offer. Surely, no class of laborers work as many hours for as little pay as the farmer, and it is time our calling is more remunerative. Can this be done by producing more or less? I am of the opinion that General Butler was right when he said that "our trouble is not overproduction, but underconsumption," and the question is, how shall we increase the consumption of farm products? Certainly not by increasing the quantity, but by improving the quality. Every one knows that soggy potatoes, stale eggs, rancid butter, etc., last much longer than good, fresh, No. 1 articles. If all food products were the very best, much more would be consumed, thus making a greater demand and more remunerative prices. Many of our wide-awake farmers can make a part of their productions an actual necessity to one or more families in our large cities at paying prices by supplying these products regularly, fresh, sweet and wholesome. I know this by experience, for my customers often tell me that they prefer to purchase farm products of the producer, especially eggs and butter.

It is laudable for practical farmers to experiment, investigate and produce maximum crops, but it is more profitable to produce the best and get good pay for them.—American Agriculturist.

—The military custom of saluting by bringing the hand into a horizontal position over the eyebrows, is thus accounted for: It is supposed to date back to the tournaments of the middle ages, when, after the Queen of Beauty was enthroned, the knights who were to take part in the sports of the day marched past the dais on which she sat, and as they passed shielded their eyes from the rays of her beauty.

FIGHTING THE COOK.

How a Fierce Battle for Dishes Was Fought in a Kitchen.

Mark Lemon, editor of London Punch, told the following story of a dinner obtained under difficulties:

"You all know little Blank—gives capital dinners. Well, the soup was all right, and the fish followed—cooked as usual to perfection—the remains were removed; then came an uncommonly long pause. Blank looked at Mrs. Blank and Mrs. Blank looked at Mr. Blank, and matters became very embarrassing. Presently the butler appeared and whispered to his mistress—the lady changed color and said:

"Good gracious! How horrible!"

"'What's the matter?' said Blank. 'Where is the rest of the dinner?'

"'It's in the kitchen, sir,' replied the butler, 'and cook says there isn't one of the dishes that satisfies her, and she won't allow them to come up.'

"'She won't allow! We will soon see about that. What on earth can the woman mean?' exclaimed the master of the house as he arose from his chair.

"'I beg your pardon, sir,' interposed the butler, 'I think you had best not go alone into the kitchen, if such is your intention, for cook, I am sorry to say, has been drinking hard, and she threatens to murder the first person that touches one of the dishes.'

"'Murder! I'll murder her!' said the host, as he turned to leave the room.

"'My dear,' cried Mrs. Blank, 'pray be careful. You know the woman's violent temper when she is sober, and what it must be when she is—oh, Mr. Lemon, do go with my husband!'

"'By all means,' said I, as I followed Blank into the kitchen.

"The maid and a most cowardly footman were standing in the dresser, shivering with fear. In the center of the floor stood the cook—a tremendous female, six feet high, and stout in proportion—armed with the spit, with which she declared she would run the first person through who ventured to touch one of the dishes, which were arranged around her in a circle on the floor.

"'How dare you to act in this way, woman?' said Blank.

"'Woman indeed! Who are you calling woman, I should like to know? Be so good as not to call me names, Mr. Blank. My name is Mrs. Green, as you well know, and I have a character to lose, and I am not a-going to lose it through that dratted kitchen maid, which would be dear at no wages and find herself. It's all through her as the dinner is spoilt. It ain't fit to put before ——. No, you don't,' with a huge lunge with the spit at the butler, who had tried to snatch one of the dishes.

"Blank and I started back, for the drunken woman was really dangerous. We held a whispered consultation.

"'Just make a feint in front of the fury,' said Blank. 'Take care of the spit. She is uncertain on her legs. I will get behind and pinion her.'

"Rather bold, this, wasn't it, of a little fellow like Blank? Well, I tried to turn the female warrior's attention to the kitchen-maid, whom I effected to scold for spoiling the dinner, and at the same time made a dash at one of the dishes. This confused the woman, and Blank threw his arms about her, but, bless you! they wouldn't meet, and she upset him in a moment.

"'You just try that again, mister,' said the lady, 'and I'll spoil that dress shirt of yours.'

"'Mrs. Green,' said I, 'now do listen to reason. There are several ladies and gentlemen up-stairs who are hungry. Do let them have their dinners. Never mind if it's not quite up to your usual high mark of excellence.'

"'I don't know you, mister, said the cook, 'and I don't allow no strangers to interfere with me. Get along with you.'

"Here a bright idea occurred to me. I had noticed a bowl of some kind of sauce standing on the kitchen dresser. I seized it and threw the contents full in the cook's face. This staggered her, for it was rather warm. Down fell the spit with a clang upon the floor; the butler and footman rushed upon the fury, pinioned her and carried her in a screeching fit of hysterics into her bedroom."

One of Our Social Weaknesses.

A weakness in the American social system is introducing people to each other without any utility or right. Not long ago I was at a public place where there were some hundreds of invited guests. A young man who was present came up and spoke to me, upon the very slightest previous acquaintance, and immediately introduced me to another person; and then he seemed to go around the halls and saloons and drag other people up to introduce them, whom he had barely known a few minutes. Having got done with these miscellaneous introductions, he paid no further attention to the entertainment in hand, but bolted for the door and street, having accomplished probably as much small havoc as he could have contemplated if he had been thinking about it for months. There is no right to introduce an acquaintance to a street full of people. It takes up time, is without any reasonable motive, and is a species of familarity which breeds more than contempt. In this way imposters get their opportunity upon these instantaneoues acquaintances. On the other side of the water the matter of introducing people to each other is made too formal, perhaps; but there is a golden mean somewhere which ought to put it out of the power of an unblushing person to rush upon gentlemen in conversation that one of them may be compelled to introduce his correspondent.—Gath, in Cincinnati Enquirer.

SATURDAY AUGUST 17 1889

On March 20, 1888, a joint resolution was passed by Congress directing the Secretary of the Interior by means of the Director of the Geologidal Survey to investigate the practicability of constructing reservoirs for the storage of water in the arid regions of the United States, and to report to Congress as soon as practicable. The resolution recites that a large portion of what is known as the arid region can be rendered fertile and productive by means of irrigation. On October 2nd 1888 by act of Congrss $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of investigating the extent of the arid region, the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region and making surveys for reservoir sites etc. and for the necessary expenses connected therewith. A report, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be made to Congress on the first day of December of each year. And all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches or canals for irrigation purposes and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs ditches or canals are from this time henceforth, hereby reserved from sale as the property of the U. S. and shall not be subject after the passage of this act, to entry, settlement or acceptation until further provided by law: "Provided, that the President may at any time in his discretion by proclamation open any portion or all of the lands reserved by this provision to settlement under the homestead laws." Inyo County is included in the arid region and it is probable that all desert land entries made in Owens Valley since October 2, 1888 will be cancelled. If such a cancellation be made it will work a hardship on many settlers. Undoubtedly the Government will return all moneys received from the locators, but no provision is made to reimburse them for time and money expended in building ditches and making other improvements. It appears to be the aim of the Department of the Interior to have only homestead entries made in future.

THE TWINS.

In the solemn hours of night,
'Neath the stars' soft, misty light,
'Twixt the nether earth and sky,
Angel wings go flutt'ring by.
Little waifs they onward bear
To this world of grief and care.
Little lives that, wrapped in gloom,
Must journey onward to the tomb.
They were found when coming day
Drove the shades of night away;
On a pillow sweetly sleeping,
No fond heart a vigil keeping,
Unless an unseen angel stood
In lieu of unknown motherhood.
Clothed in robes of softest down,
Come to brave the cold world's frown.
Perhaps they were by fairies sent
To stop an aching discontent;
And make two mortals doubly blest,
When to their lonely bosoms prest.
In the morning cold and chilly,
They were found by "Murph" and "Willy"

M. G.

Chas. Levy, of Bishop, is in town.

J. S. Gorman came up from Keeler on Thursday.

Geo. St. Clair is foreman of the Union Mine, at Cerro Gordo.

S. G. Gregg and Wm. McDonald have returned from their fishing trip.

N. G. Fairman arrived at Independence from Panamint on Thursday.

Herbert M. Geiger and wife, of Gold Hill, were here this week on land business.

Last Wednesday W. H. Murray of Virginia City was in town on land business.

Fred. Burkhardt and L. H. Dearborn, of Lone Pine, were in town on Wednesday.

Clara Willett was kicked by a horse on Tuesday morning and stunned but not seriously hurt.

On Thursday morning Mederic Laprairie was admitted to citizenship in the Superior Court.

For the seventh time J. W. P. Laird Esq. has been commissioned a Notary Public for Inyo County.

Mr. Whitney Parlor N. S. G. W. will give an entertainment in Mairs' Hall during fair week.

Bill Johnson says he has ordered a supply of "Elixir of Life" for Murphy, and thinks other old men should try it.

Sheriff Eldred returned from Round Valley last Tuesday, where he had gone to sell the merchandise in the store of R. Fred. Brooks, under a writ of execution.

The Native Sons of the Golden West will give a grand celebration, at San Jose, on admission day. It will be the grandest affair of the kind ever had on the Coast.

Quite a force of men are steadily employed on the new race track at the Fort. When completed the track will be a good one as the soil is very well adapted for that purpose. Mr. Vagt expects to have it in a condition to drive on by September first.

Mr. W. S. Enos received a letter on Monday evening from Edwin F. Smith, Secretary of the State Fair, informing him of his appointment as Chief Marshall during the coming fair at Sacramento. Will does not know yet whether he will attend or not.

Under-Sheriff Yaney returned on Wednesday's train from Stockton where he had been with the insane man Brooks. He reports having had considerable trouble on the way and that Brooks' condition was decidedly worse than when leaving. Mr. Robinson, who accompanied Mr. Yaney, has gone to Butte County.

W. S. James and C. F. Williams, of Gold Hill, Nevada, spent several days in town during the week. They state that Inyo County fruit is far superior to any fruit found in the markets of Gold Hill and Virginia City and they believe that this County can find a ready sale for all of its surplus fruit in those places. Low rates can be had from the C. & C. R. R. if fruit growers will ship large amounts; and there is no good reason why we should not successfully compete with fruit growers on the other side of the Mountains. It would pay our orchardists to hire good live men, open fruit depots in Carson and Virginia, during the fruit season, and supply those cities with a fine article.

At Cerro Gordo

Mr. Archie Farrington has taken charge of the Union mine, at Cerro Gordo, and has six men employed. It is the intention of the owners to begin timbering the old shaft, sink deeper and open new ground. The body of ore recently discovered by Boland and Gorman is holding out and promises to yield a large amount ore. A tramway will be built immediately from the mine to Keeler, a distance of some five miles. It is reported that a smelting furnace will be erected by this company in the near future at the drop in the Inyo canal near the old Eclipse tramway.

Piano Tuning

Professor Thomas Cara will be in the Valley next week. Prof. Cara is a competent, careful piano tuner and will make that the object of his visit here. He will be in Independence about the 29th. He will also make any repairs that may be needed on organs. Mr. Cara is a thorough musician and those who require his services may safely intrust their instruments to his care.

Disgusted.

A report that the new survey of the State line will throw a portion of this county, and possibly the whole of Bridgeport and Bodie, into Nevada, has brought forth many strong expressions from our people in regard to being unceremoniously put out of our beloved Califarnia—but as the Indian said "Oh—we aint gone yet!"—Chronicle-Union.

OLANCHA.

A GOOD FRUIT COUNTRY.

What has Been Accomplished There In The Past Fourteen Years.

It is of very great importance to any new settled country that experiments should be made, to test what things are best suited to the soil and climate. In Owens Valley Mr. W. Walker, of Olancha, has made a great many experiments and the result may be of interest to others. When Mr. Walker settled at Olancha, over fourteen years ago, there was nothing growing on the land but sage-brush and grass. The first trees he planted were for shade, and these were cottonwoods chosen for their rapid growth. Two years after planting, the trees began to afford considerable shade. These trees are now very large, and for eight years past have furnished a good deal of fuel and fence posts. Locust and catalpas have since been planted near the cottonwoods and the latter are being cut out as the others get large enough to afford shade.

APPLES

Two years after locating at Olancha Mr. Walker planted apple and peach trees. The apple trees were Winter pearmain, Northern spy, Ben Davis and some seedlings. Of these the Winter pearmain gave the most satisfactory results; but all did well, and continue to bear fine crops of excellent apples. The third year after being planted the trees began bearing, and have never since failed to bear a good crop every year. This season the trees are heavily loaded and will give a fine crop. No pest of any kind has ever troubled the trees or the fruit. The apples are fine keepers and of excellent flavor; very juicy and pleasant to the taste.

PEACHES

The same year peaches were set out. The varieties chosen were the early and late Crawford, blood peach, Alexander, Day's cling and seedlings. The Crawford peaches and the Day's cling gave the best results. The second year after planting the trees begin to bear, and from that time have never failed to be so loaded with fruit that a great deal had to be picked from each tree while growing, in order to prevent breaking down the limbs. This year the crop is the heaviest yet seen on the trees. Every year Mr. Walker can gather peaches that weigh sixteen to seventeen ounces each. No pests of any kind.

PEARS

The Flemish beauty, Bartlett, Seckle Bloodgood, Winter Seckle, Winter Nellis, were the varieties of pear trees planted. These were not all planted at the same time, but a few each year. The only trees yet bearing are of the Flemish beauty variety. The fruit is very fine; Mr. Walker thinks it quite equal to the Bartlett. All the trees have made fine growth and look very thrifty. They have never been troubled by pests of any kind.

NECTARINES

Two varieties of nectarines have been planted; the new white and the Stanwick. Both began bearing the second year after being planted. The fruit of both varieties is truly delicious. The nectarines are as large as ordinary peaches. The trees have grown rapidly, are now of large size and heavily loaded. The new white ripens about two weeks before the Stanwick; the present crop is already ripe. These trees are not troubled by any pests.

APRICOTS

For apricots the Moorpark is the only variety yet tried. The trees bear very heavily, and began bearing the second year. The apricots are of good size and excellent flavor. Seed from the original trees were planted, and these yielded fruit the third year from the seed. The fruit from the seedlings is of larger size and better quality than that from the parent trees.

PLUMS

Imperial gage, Duane's purple, Coe's golden drop, yellow egg and Kelsey, all of these varieties do remarkably well. The trees begin bearing the third year after being planted. All the plums grow to a large size; most of the varieties being as big as ordinary peaches.

PRUNES

Only one variety of prune—the German—has yet been tried. The trees grow well; the fruit is of excellent quality, but so far the crop each year has been light.

CHERRIES

Knight's early black; the Governor Wood and Morello are the varieties tried. The two first named varieties were planted ten years ago, the last named only two years ago. All the trees have made rapid growth and look very thrifty. The Govetnor Wood does best so far. Knight's early is not at all satisfactory, the tree runs to wood and does not bear fruit. The Morello trees are not old enough to afford a test. What cherries have been produced are very fine.

QUINCE

The orange is the only variety of quince yet tried. The trees made rapid growth and began bearing the second year after being planted. The fruit is always large and of fine quality. Evidently Olancha is well suited to quince growing.

FIGS

Two varieties of figs are grown; the large purple and the Ischid. Mr. Walker considers both varieties failures. Each year the trees produced a little fruit of good quality, but the winters are a little too cold and the trees are injured every year.

ALMONDS

The Languedoc is the only variety of almond yet tried. The trees grow rapidly and bear excellent crops of fine almonds. The trees are now ten years old; last year each tree yielded fifty pounds of dried almonds. Mr. Walker got twenty cents per pound for all that he sold; being ten dollars per tree; he considers almonds a very profitable and safe crop.

WALNUTS

Three varieties of walnuts are grown; Eastern black, California black and English. The trees are now six years old; they are all growing rapidly, but none are yet bearing.

GRAPES.

White Muscat, black Hamburg, flaming Tokay, Mission and sweetwater are grown. The sweetwater and Mission, have so far given the best satisfaction. The Tokay and black Hamburgs are not yet old enough to afford a fair test of how they may be suited to the soil and climate. The vines are growing finely and give promise of excellent results.

SMALL FRUIT.

Currants, strawberries, and raspberries, all make very rapid growth and bear heavily. Goose berries are not so satisfactory; the bushes make great growth, but they do not produce much fruit. The berries are very large and fine, but the quantity too small.

FAILURES

Mr. Walker has tried raising oranges, lemons, dates and Japan persimmons. All of these have proven entire failures. He thinks our winters are not too cold for the trees, but attributes his want of success to too great an altitude.

SHADE AND ORNAMENTAL

Lombardy poplar, black, yellow and honey locust; black and Russian mulberry, althea acacia and catalpa; all these trees are growing finely, and are evidently well suited to the soil and climate. Mr. Walker prefers the catalpa to any of the others, on the ground that it is the handsomest and is the most rapid grower.

OTHER PRODUCTS

Several varieties of sweet corn have been tried, but Mr. Walker finds the Black Spanish best. This variety is quite sweet; the ears are plump and well filled; it yields heavily, and has the advantage of less liability to injury by worms than any other corn he has yet tried. Celery, beets, carrots salsify, asparagus, peas, beans, cabbage, tomatoes, cranberries; all these and other kinds of "garden sass" grow most luxuriantly. Peanuts produce immensely. Sweet potatoes were tried this year for the first time. They give promise of a very heavy yield. Tobacco has been tried on a small scale and the result was most satisfactory. The leaf was of the finest quality. Nowhere else are potatoes of better quality grown, or a better yield. The early rose is preferred to all other varieties; it is of fine quality, yields heavily and keeps well. Watermelons and muskmelons of the very finest quality can be grown in any desired quantities.

HAY

Mr. Walker cuts three crops of alfalfa each year. The average yield is ten tons per acre; or three and one-third tons at each cutting. The wild hay yields a heavy crop and is of excellent quality. No small grain is grown; other crops pay better.

SPORT

Ducks, geese and other wild fowl come to Owens Lake every Fall in vast numbers; and the sloughs at Olancha afford as good shooting as can be found anywhere. Quail abound all over the plain, and a fairly good marksman can kill as many dozen as he wants every day in the season. A fine stream flows down from the Sierra Nevada Mountains to Olancha. Five years ago this stream was stocked with fish from Kern River. Now when Mr. Walker wants a mess of trout, he sends a boy up the stream, and in three or four hours the lad comes back with from fifty to seventy-five as handsome "speckled beauties" as were ever taken from water. A good trail leads up from Olancha into the Mountains; and the head waters of Kern River is but twelve miles. Here an endless maze of valleys winds about among the peaks of the Sierras. Snowfields, cataracts, forests, lakes, without end; the highest mountain peaks in the United States; all these combine to make a region that offers more attractions to tourists than any other from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This wonderful region only needs to be known and it will attract tourists from all parts of the world. Olancha is at the south west end of Owens Lake, nineteen miles from Keeler, the present terminus of the Carson and Colorado railroad, and forty miles from Independence, the County seat. It has an elevation above the sea of about 3500 feet. The only settlers at present are Mr. W. Walker, Mr. A. Walker and Mr. Archie. Livingstone. These use all of the water now available, for irrigation. The land is all of the same character and will all produce equal to the land belonging to Mr. W. Walker. Mr. A. Walker grows as fine fruit as his neighbor. In the same locality not less than ten thousand acres of as good land as any now under cultivation are open for entry and settlement. It is quite possible that water for irrigating much of this land may be developed in the mountains near by. Indications strongly favor the belief that plenty of artesian water could be easily obtained. When the C & C road shall be extended it will pass through this land.

Keeler Notes

Double Dan. holds forth as the champion Sullivan of Keeler, but the shoemaker succeeded after two hotly contested rounds, in making him lie down. During the second round the shoemaker in some way got outside the rope and lacerated his right hand, he taking a glass door for the proboscis of Double Dan. Shoemaker regained his position promptly and grasped Dan by the throat with his disabled and bloody hand, at the same time throwing his adversary to the floor. Many who stood by, upon seeing such an abundance of gore on Dan's neck, thought the now enraged Shoemaker had cut his throat, and separated them.

L. F. J. Wrinkle Supt. Inyo Development Co. is here, to remain some time.

Salt Lake and Los Angeles.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 10—Samuel P. Godbe, who has just arrived from Pioche, reports that work on the construction of the Utah Central railroad's Salt Lake and Los Angeles branch is being actively pushed forward. The preliminary surveys are completed and location stakes and grade stakes set over a portion of the road, and a force of graders are at work. It is intended to push the work as rapidly as possible and the money is ready. The general route will be from Milford, in Utah, to Pioche, and from Pioche following the valleys southwest to Barstow, on the California Southern. Whether it will connect with the California Southern, or build an independent line to Los Angeles is not known. —Herald.

A Sad Affair

Many people in Inyo County will remember photographer Crockwell, and his pretty little daughter Ada. Mr. Crockwell has been for some time past located at Virginia City. Last Monday evening an assistant of Mr. Crockwell's carelessly left a pan of coal oil on the stove. Mr. Crockwell started a fire without noticing the kerosene until it exploded, throwing fire all over the little girl, who was standing near. It is feared that she is fatally burned. Mr. Crockwell and another daughter were also badly burned. The flames were suppressed and the building was not destroyed.

An Improvement

Mr. Swan is steadily at work on improvements in the Court House. The partition between the Courtroom and the Assessor's office has been removed, making the Courtroom eighteen feet longer. The entire building was badly planned at the beginning and the change being made is only making the best of a bad job. The Assessor will now occupy the former jury room. A hallway now extends to the front of the building and a door will be opened from the Courtroom to the balcony. It is found necessary to place two pillars in the center of the room in place of the support removed. Mr. Swan is doing a careful, painstaking job.

The Parlor of Native Sons at Bishop intend giving a grand ball on Admission Day. Some of the members of Mount Whitney Parlor intend going up.

Correspondence.

BISHOP, August 14, 1889.

EDITOR INDEPENDENT.—Again the musical notes of the festive threshing machine are heard within the classical shades of the precincts of Bishop Creek (oh, Bishop), with Ben. T. Williams as the chief engineer thereof. Ben's friends were pleased and astonished to see him back in Bishop attending to his accustomed duties. They eagerly inquired why he had laid down the burdens, honors, and responsibilities of official position for a rural pursuit: Ben. informed them that statesmen and philosophers were plenty; that material for congressmen, senators, county officers, and other public burdens was the most abundant commodity in the market, while the engineer of a horse-power threshing machine was made out of sterner stuff; that the farmers had been blest with an abundant harvest; that the usual draft on the force of workers in the more useful avocations, by reason of the demand for the aforesaid public burdens, had so depleted the ranks of honest labor that it behooved him to see that the husbandman should reap the reward of his labor in the shape of golden cereals, and thus offer himself a sacrifice on the altar of industry, with the same spirit of self-abnegation that prompts the aforesaid statesmen, philosophers, etc., to willingly submit to the fattening process at the public crib

This is the first instance in the history of our county where the honor of official position has not raised the recipient thereof above the dignity of honest labor; therefore Ben's friends say that as he has been diligent and faithful in the discharge of his public duties, which is universally recognized throughout the county, having so many friends here and elsewhere, that he has the best show to be the Sheriff of Inyo county for the next term, and further, that Ben. has been weighed in the balance and not found wanting.

It appears that the only condition which will be imposed upon him, so far as heard from, is to select to discharge the duties of Under-Sheriff a person who will not attempt to divide with him the dignities which appertain to so high and honorable an office; one who will freely greet his superior officer with the most humble salaams and otherwise unequivocably recognize his indivisible dignity; but if Ben. has assured any person on this subject your humble scribe has received no information thereof.

Round Valley can justly boast of the greatest heroine of the age. This lady, without any assistance, conveyed a desperate lunatic from Round Valley to Bishop, the road leading for many miles through an uninhabited country from which no aid could be procured, even if needed. Rumor saith that from Independence to San Francisco, which journey was made on the cars where assistance was at all times within reach, though the lunatic had undergone no appreciable change, and though attended by two bold and determined men, it was found necessary for the preservation of the aforesaid attendants to heavily manacle the hands and feet of the unfortunate, which caused bitter drops of scalding sorrow to flow from the eyes of the aforesaid lunatic. This verifies the Irish adage that "The wimmin are the best min."

"Alone you can do nothing, but united we can shake the world, and all over the land the oppressed are banding together. We are weak now, but when the long stifled voice of your wrongs finds utterance, the answering moans of millions will rouse your souls to the resistless martyr pitch. Then it will seem sweet to die—yes, to starve—with your dear ones about you inspired with the same enthusiasm. When the generation is born which dare starve but has forgotten how to yield, and even for the bread of life will not sell its children into eternal slavery, then will the gold of the rich rot worthless in their white hands till they divide with us our common heritage."

He stopped and sat down, and as his enthusiasm faded from his face, Philip saw he was not handsome. The eyes that had seemed so wonderful were too deep seated beneath his heavy brows, and his smooth shaved face was scarred from exposure to sun and storm; yet, while he had been speaking, pity and divine wrath in turn melting and burning in his eyes and lighting up his ragged cheeks, he had seemed beautiful, like an archangel.

The audience sat in silence a moment, then one man shuffled his feet uneasily, then another, and then all rose listlessly to their feet. Philip thought their zest in life had gone so long ago that they did not even miss it; then he remembered what his life was, bright as a June morning. Did God love him so much better than these weary creatures, whose only refuge was in hopelessness? Then he thought of Bertha waiting for him, and he hurried out, glad that he seemed to be escaping notice. Where was the funny adventure he had to tell his sweetheart? A new world had been revealed to him; a world within the world he had played with, that knew no such thing as mirth, but fed forever on bitter realities, and his little spark of happiness seemed smothered in its black night. Each one must have a family circle of his own. There were hungry eyes that looked to him for the cheer his poor heart was too dead to give. Suddenly a heavy hand was laid on his shoulder.

"Praps you aint got no place to go to, friend." It was his big whiskered companion in the hall, Graves.

"I sort o' liked your looks in the meetin' to-night, and you're welcome to a bed at my house if you want it."

"Oh, no," stumbled Philip, at his wit's end.

"Oh, no? Why not, then? Where be you goin' to stay?" and the man took his hand from the young man's shoulder and eyed him suspiciously. "Why, he wanted to go home and lay off his masquerade forever. Bertha, all radiant in all that wealth can add to beauty, was awaiting him. He had so much to tell her," but he had nothing to say aloud.

"I won't take no refusal," insisted the man, taking Philip by the arm. "No words; Jane will get along easy with an extra for once. I presume you've slept in wuss places."

CHAPTER III.

AN UNWILLING GUEST.

Philip thought things were going a little too far, and as he walked along with his undesirable host he began to plan escapes.

Up on the hill to his left he could see, now and then, between the houses, his own home and the lights in its window streaming welcome to him. The tense mood relaxed in him, old habits of thought and association made themselves felt again; the poor man walking heavily by his side seemed a thousand miles removed from him.

"Here we are," said Graves, as he led the mill owner's son up a couple of rickety looking steps to a doorway. Philip was not pleased at all; he had seen enough poverty to-night; he did not care to particularize. What was the use of distressing himself over this man's private miseries and discomforts? Wasn't it written in all the books of political economy that—but Graves opened the door and waited for his unwilling guest to go in before him. The poor man's heart was warm in the unwonted exercise of hospitality.

With an ungracious frown on his face Philip entered the dimly lighted room, his great boots sounding with startling effect on the bare floor. The top heavy kerosene lamp was turned down, but with the heartiness of a true host, Graves turned up the lamp so that Philip could look about him. There was little enough to see—a round pine table with a little blue, cracked crokery on it, a rusty cooking stove, two or three dingy, unpainted chairs, a high backed rocking chair, with a faded, shapeless chintz cushion, and what seemed to be a sofa in one corner.

At first Philip thought the room had been unoccupied, but as Graves turned up the lamp a trifle more he saw it was a woman lying upon the sofa—a woman with sunken black eyes and wan, colorless cheeks, whose loosely bound hair, gray before its time, fell down over her shoulders.

"The woman is sick, or she'd get up and speak to you," said Graves, with a new gentleness in his voice, as he looked at the wife of his youth. "They say she might get well if we could pay doctors' bills. Eh, Jennie?"

The girl who stood in the doorway had her mother's eyes, not quite large enough, but with a rare sheen in them; it might be her mother's face, too, but with the bloom of perfect health lightening up its olive.

Involuntarily he rose to his feet and bowed, but as the girl only seemed to regard him as one might look at a circus tumbler, Philip relapsed into his seat, in the humiliation beauty can put upon the greatest of us.

"Nothin' but cold potatoes? Well, I guess they'll do with a little salt and a piece of bread."

"Did Curran speak?" asked the girl.

"Yes," answered Philip. "And who is he—a common laborer?" Then he bit his lip.

But nobody took offense, no one suspected their guest of being anything above a common laborer.

"Only a laborer," answered Graves, "a weaver, but he's got some book knowledge somehow. There aint many can beat him at talkin', is there?"

The girl's eyes were on Philip now, impatient, as he fancied, even for his poor tribute to her lover's praise.

"He is wonderful," he assented, "but what I don't understand is, that he can be such a man and still a weaver. Where did he learn it all?"

"Have you got enough to eat? Well, knowledge has got pretty well through all classes now, for those as wants it. It's there for all who have eyes or ears for it. Why, friend, where have you been all your life? Brains and hearts don't go by station. I've found smarter men in shops and mills than most we send to congress. There's thousands like Curran, if they only got the stirrin' he's had some way. Now, Jane, it's about time you got this man's bed ready."

Philip's heart jumped. Of course he couldn't stay, but what excuse could he give for coming at all, then?

"Be you lookin' for a job?" asked Graves, after his daughter had left them.

It occurred to Philip that he had one, if he wanted it—to put one spark of happiness into such lives as these, but he nodded. The man looked him over rather disparagingly.

"Well, wash yourself up and black your boots a bit, and I guess I can do somethin' for you in the mill. It's hard work and small pay, but we never had better, you and me. We don't well know what we miss bein' poor, we miss it such a big ways."

"How long has Curran lived here?" asked Philip incoherently. The man stared at him a moment.

"Oh! Curran, he ain't been here more'n a six month. He aint got no folks; he lives down to one of them factory boardin' houses, but don't have no friends, or talk about anythin' but what you heard to-night. But it's all useless." Graves looked gloomily on the floor. "We aint got no show; the rich are too many for us. I guess it's human nature for one man to boss the crowd, or it wouldn't a always been so. There's the girl, she'll show you where to sleep. Be up early in the mornin', now."

The only course for him seemed to be to follow the girl, and Philip rose to his feet.

"Good night," he said. The sick woman opened her eyes in surprise. Such people as they found no time for amenities in their dreary home. Graves looked around.

"What? Oh, yes, goodby, but I'm goin' to see you in the mornin'."

His bedroom, on which the roof encroached greedily, was newly whitewashed, or else was seldom used. His lamp sat on a wooden chair with no back to it, crowded by a tin wash basin, with his portion of water half filling it, and a round black ball of soap. Then Philip turned to look at the bed they had made for him on a slat bedstead with low headboard but not so low as the thin pillow. How many times must anybody double the pillow to make it fit for his head? For a counterpane was the girl's plaid shawl; he had seen it on a nail down stairs. Poor little girl, she would want it very early in the morning. Then he glanced in the eight by ten looking glass that hung on the white wall. Disguised! his own father would not have known him, and he had a sensation of double consciousness as he saw his own reflection. Perhaps Graves was disguised too, and all the ill dressed men he had seen that evening, who suffered as much in their wretched lives as he could, who could enjoy all that brightened his own life as much. And clothes made the difference between him and them, apparently, perhaps really. The world managed according to the clothes standard—for the man who could borrow a broadcloth suit, comforts, consideration, happiness—for the man in overalls, weary days, cheerless houses, hunger and—bah. Paillip pulled off his great boots and threw them angrily across the room; he did not know what to make of it all.

He did not propose to spend the night here, of course, and face the family and his job in the mill in the morning, but he might as well lie down till the house was asleep and escape became possible. But he could not lie down with all his paint on and spoil the poor little pillow. So he takes off his yellow whiskers, and makes such good use of the basin of water and the ball of soap that when he next looked in the little mirror he saw no longer the road dusty tramp, but the fresh, kindly face of a young man who has never tasted of the bitter fountains of life. He started as if he had been shot; the windows had no curtains, and any passerby might have seen his transformation. Then came a heavy step on the stairs. He blew out the light and buried himself in the bedclothes. In a moment more the door opened and Philip was breathing heavily.

"Asleep?" it was the voice of his host. "Well, I s'pose the morning will do. Pretty tired, I guess; wonder how far he came to-day?" and Graves closed the door after him and went down stairs again.

Of course Philip was not going to sleep, but there would be no harm in just closing his eyes, he could think so much better.

Here he was drinking in the very life of the poor, a strange, terrible life he had never really imagined before. He had seen how worn and broken were their men, and read the pathetic lines of despair and sullen wretchedness written on their faces, as if in silent reproach to the providence that had inflicted the unsoftened curse of life on them. He had seen, too, their hapless girlhood, which beauty cannot cheer, which love only makes blacker, as the path of lightning a starless night. And their sick, too, with no nursing, no gentle words, no comforts to assuage one hour of pain. Then he seemed to be in the hall once more, and thrilling under the eloquence of the man Curran. Suddenly he opened his eyes wide. It could not be he was going to sleep, the bed was too hard—absurd—there could be no danger. But in five minutes the heir of the Breton mills was sound asleep in John Graves' garret room.

How long he had slept Philip had no more idea than Rip Van Winkle on a former occasion; indeed it took him a ridiculously long time to separate dreams and facts enough to get his bearings. Was that moonlight in the east, or dawn? Perhaps the family were all up and escape would be impossible. He bounded to his feet and clutched at his false whiskers, but alas! his paint was all dissolved in the tin basin. His only chance was in getting away unnoticed, and in two minutes more he was groping out of his little room and down the steep stairs, boots in hand. He slowly opened the door into the sitting room. What if Graves stood within curiously watching. An old guest, this, stealing out before daybreak. Again Philip wished he had stayed at home that night.

Thank God! no one was in the room. There was the cracked, rusty stove and the sofa the sick woman had lain upon; there was the dish of cold potatoes on the table and the chair he had sat in while he tried to eat. But somebody must be up in the inner room; a stream of light made a white track through the half open door. Would that bolt never slip—there. It slipped with a vengeance, and Philip drew back into the staircase in mortal terror. The light streak on the floor began to move, and in a moment more a white figure stood on the threshold of the bed room. It was Jane Graves, with her long black hair about her neck and white night dress, and her eyes glistening brightly. She held the lamp above her head, and let her drapery cling as fondly as it chose about a form that would have charmed a sculptor. As she listened he could see her wavy hair rise and fall over her beating heart. Would she notice the open stair door and come forward? What then? He must push her rudely to one side. He imagined her startled screams and the father's figure hurrying into the scene from another room to seize the interloper. No, she returns to her room. In another instant he has opened the door and is walking along the street. His escape was well timed, for the gray dawn of another day of toil and weariness is creeping over the factory village.

The houses were all alike, the front doors just as soiled, the steps equally worn, the paint the same cheerless yellow to a shade. Through the windows of one of them he caught a glimpse of a tall gaunt woman building the kitchen fire, her face and form lighted up by the flames she was nursing.

His ready imagination pictured the wan-featured man who must be her husband, out of whose eyes had faded so many years ago the last lingering gleam of tenderness. He imagined their old faced, joyless children begrudged the scant play hours of childhood. Trooping behind them all, he pictured a long line of special wants and sorrows, the companions of their days, the specters of their nights. Their houses looked all alike as he walked along, so their lives might seem just alike at first thought. Ten hours for each in the same mills—who got almost the same pittance for their hot work—and must spend their pennies for almost the same necessities. But infinite must be the diversities of their suffering.

It was Jane Graves.

CHAPTER IV.

CRYING FOR THE MOON.

The strident voices of 400 looms would seem to be too much for human nerves, but the walls of the weave room Number Two of the Breton mills are hung with soiled plaid shawls and chip hats, the livery of the factory girl. Their restless forms are busy among the rattling machinery, their swift cunning fingers moving harmlessly where mutilation would seem certain. It is a mere matter of habit; one look at most of the set pale faces would show there was no brain force in exercise. Why, the overseer will tell you those girls are as much machines as the frames and belting, though they undoubtedly have one advantage for the employers, the girls are cheaper. The wonderful mechanism of these looms, the skillful system of belts and pulleys and the enormous water wheel cost a fortune. Girls can be bought in the market any day for a crust of bread.

Is not that figure familiar—the one that stands this moment leaning against a dingy white pillar, while the rushing belts and sliding frames seem hurrying the faster all about her? Yes, on the piece of wall between the two jail like windows nearest to her hangs the plaid shawl Philip Breton had for a counterpane only last night. Her dress is coarse and ill made, and her hair tied up in the closest and ugliest coil to escape the greedy machinery, ever reaching out for new victims. But the warm, soft tint of her cheeks and the moist sheen in her black eyes were always the same, and many a young man would rather look at her this minute than turn off an extra cut, they call it, of cloth at twenty cents.

Her days used to be more terrible to her even than now. She had wished every morning that she might die before night, and at night that God would take her before morning; take her, she cared not where; no place could be worse, certain. But she was slowly growing, she thought, into the dead calm that all the rest had learned; and yet how she hated the great massive mills, irresistible giants that held her with deathless grasp, grimly contemptuous of her writhings and foolish struggles. The overseers, too, how she hated them; their sharp words stung her like the lash of so many taskmasters, and the paymaster who doled out to her the few dollars, the wages of her blood and life, as if that could be paid for. She had longed so many times to throw back his money in the smiling, patronizing face; but the poor cannot afford the dearest of all luxuries, pride.

Another day's work was closed, and the poor girls hurried on their shawls and hats as if at last something pleasant awaited them and went out in chattering groups.

"What is it, Tommie?" A broad shouldered young fellow had left the crowd and followed her shyly up the hill.

"Nothin' much, only may I walk home with you?"

"Will that do you any good? Hurry up then."

He was an honest faced young fellow, and a little better dressed than most of the group that waited about the mill yard gate.

"What you want to walk round here with me for I can't see. They can't work you very hard, Tommie, if you want so much extra exercise."

It was rather a contemptuous laugh she had for him, but she showed a row of small white teeth that poor Tommie thought were very beautiful.

"I wanted to say somethin' particular, Jennie." And he reached down his big dingy hand for a stalk of grass, and began pulling it nervously to pieces, as he kept up with her quick feet. They were just passing Mr. Ellingsworth's house, and father and daughter stood in the doorway. No doubt Mr. Ellingsworth had just come home to tea. He held his tall hat in his hand, while he waited with his beautiful daughter to enjoy the soft spring mildness. Jane Graves could see in behind them. How could they bear to stay outside? She saw a white spread tea table glistening with silver and rare china, soft tinted carpets and pictures in rich gilded frames, far prettier, she was sure, than anything nature had to show. The girl's face, as she stood resting her white hand on her father's shoulder, was as calm as the twilight itself.

"How has she deserved it all more than I? She was never tired in her life, and I never lie down at night but my hands and feet ache. See what she gets for being idle; see what I get for my ten hours' work, every day since I was a child."

"We've known each other pretty long, Jennie, and—and"—he had pulled the grass all all to pieces—"and I s'pose you know how I've—I mean how I've felt. I am doing a little better now." The young man's eyes brightened. "I've got a little money left me, and you know I'm just made second hand."

"What is that to me, Tommie?" she said, impatiently. Her woman's soul was longing for the beautiful life of the rich, whose house she was passing, and she felt, too, the admiring glance Mr. Ellingsworth had given to her graceful figure. Why was this awkward boy by her side to spoil the effect?

Tommie Bowler winced, but ducking his round head to avoid the sharp look he feared was in the beautiful eyes, he went on doggedly.

"I s'posed we'd been agoing together quite a while, Jennie, and I was goin' to ask you when you was willin' to be married."

"Married—to you?"

Ah, Tommie Bowler, what were you thinking of to want to marry a girl who had such a tone as that for you?

To Visit the Sultan of Morocco.

M. Patenotre, the able French Minister now at Tangier, is bent upon getting some better local government for the diplomatic capital of Morocco. He has just started accordingly for Fez, the Sultan's capital. "His cortege," writes a correspondent, "was imposing—the baggage, tents and numerous presents for the Sultan and his Vizier had to be sent on before—an electric boat had to be left behind, every thing having to be carried on the backs of mules, camels, horses and donkeys. A detachment of Moorish cavalry with crimson banners preceded the cortege, composed of French officers and about a dozen French soldiers, their arms gleaming brightly in the African sun. M. Patenotre headed the party on a white charger. He remarked the ride to Fez was likely to be a tame affair after his experience in Persia and Central Asia, where he had once ridden 300 miles in three days, whereas at his present rate he was not likely to reach Fez—or 150 miles—in less than ten days. Mr. Patenotre seemed anxious to work with every one and conciliate the rival jealousies of the civilized flags at Tangier for the sake of achieving some real improvement in the administration of that wild city."

The National Guards have never been in better shape than they are at present. Congress apportioned $400,000 for militia expenses among the states according to population this year, and the citizen soldiers in some of the states are making good use of it.

A PRIZE WINNER.

Unprecedented Luck That Has Attended J. V. Schofield.

"Yes, San Francisco is a lucky city, and I'm one of the lucky citizens when it comes down to winning prizes," observed Engineer J. V. Schofield of the Union Block, as he polished up a brass coupling.

"You have been playing Louisiana State Lottery," suggested the reporter whom he was addressing.

"Exactly; that's just what I've been at.

"Talking about prizes, though. Here's a little romance. You see, last February I drew the whole of a capital prize. Louisiana was not in the deal though—it was my wife. I had all the coupons. The first thing she did after our bridal tour was to purchase a ticket in the Louisiana State Lottery. We won an approximation prize. The next month we did the same thing, and in the last drawing, May 14th, my wife pulled out $5,000, and we have got the money. There were two other $5,000 prizes won in the city and several $2,500 prizes."

"Do you expect to quit work and go into business of some kind.

"Oh, no. I am just waiting a good opportunity for investment. Next time I'll get $15,000, and then I may think of taking things easy."

—Two years ago Miss Amy Malloy, of Pelham, N. Y., fell into an unguarded excavation, and as a result lost one of her eyes. She sued the town and got a verdict of $10,000 damages. The case was appealed by the town, but on a second trial the damages were increased to $12,000. This was also appealed, but recently the Supreme Court at Brooklyn sustained the verdict and added $500 for Miss Malloy's counsel. It is unlikely that any more appeals will be taken.—Buffalo Courier.

—One of the peculiar things resulting from the machine methods of the public school system is the effect produced upon the handwriting of the teachers. A man who has received within the last year a large number of letters from fair young and fair old pedagogues has noticed that there is an almost absolute lack of individuality in their chirography. The letters of all seem to be formed upon the same model; they are all of the same height, and upon the same slant, and the t's are crossed and the i's are dotted with the same painful precision.—N. THAT CANTANKEROUS OLD WOMAN

Described in the nursery ballad, who "lived upon nothing but victuals and drink," and yet, "would never be quiet," was undoubtedly troubled with chronic indigestion. Her victuals, like those of many other elderly persons whose digestive powers have become impaired, didn't agree with her. This was before the era of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters or some one of her numerous friends and relatives would undoubtedly have persuaded her to try the great specific for dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. This would have been a measure of self-protection on their part, for she would soon have been cured and ceased to disturb them with her clamor. The most obstinate cases of indigestion, with its attendant heartburn, flatulence, constant uneasiness of the stomach and of the nerves, are completely overcome by this sovereign remedy. Chills and fever and bilious remittent, rheumatism and kidney troubles are also relieved by it.

WHAT BRANDRETH'S PILLS DO.

In Brandreth's Pills the true life medicine has been found, composed as they are of numerous vegetables so combined that each multiplies the virtues of the rest. They never can do any harm. Their action is always the same, no matter how long or in what doses they are taken. They purge away the waste particles of the system. They recruit the animal vigor and arrest the progress of decay. They purify the blood. They stimulate the liver. They invigorate digestion. They open the pores. They make the bowels do the work of the kidneys, thus giving those organs an ofttimes needed rest. One or two at night for a week will demonstrate their power and is generally sufficient to cure ordinary diseases.

MR. JOHN W. FURBUSH, An Army Veteran, OF WAKEFIELD,

who has probably suffered more than any man or woman in America to-day. Taken sick while in the Army, he has endured untold agonies since. Describing his first symptoms he said: "My head ached and my appetite was poor. I felt a faintness at the pit of the stomach, and bad taste in my mouth, while my skin was sometimes hot and sometimes cold. I next felt pains in my back and around the lower portion of my body, and noticed a peculiar odor and color in the water I passed, which was scanty at one time and free at others. Sometimes it pained me to void it, and again it was almost impossible to do so at all. Finally I began to pass clear blood accompanied with the greatest strain and agony."

No less than 20 eminent physicians attended Mr. Furbush at various times, but not one of them could help him. He was near death's door. And yet he says: "I am alive and well to-day, wholly through the wonderful power of Hunt's Remedy which took me from the verge of the grave."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

FASHIONS IN LEATHER.

Russian Leather, Ooze Calf, Kangaroo, Patent Leather and Cordovan.

In her choice of leather Dame Fashion shows the same fickle mind as in her selection of dress goods or other wearing apparel. Last year a very pronounced demand was experienced for Russia leather, and this year it seems probable it will be more extensive. The distinctive odor which characterizes the article seems to have a peculiar fascination for the general public, and they are no longer content to have their pocket-books, their purses, their bags or their belts made of Russia leather, but they must wear their boots, shoes or slippers made o the same material.

But of all fashion's pet leathers ooze calf is this summer the favorite. Two years ago it was unknown. This summer, in all the many original designs for tasteful footgear, ooze calf plays a very conspicuous part. Its soft, velvety feeling and appearance no doubt commend it to the favor of the ladies. It is really calf, small skins of fine fiber being selected. The dyes are percolated or oozed through it; hence its name. The velvety feeling is given to the flesh side by a series of sandpapering, while the grain side of the skins is slightly pebbled. This permits of many combinations from the same skin. Thus a shoe may have a vamp the velvet side outward and quarters grain side out, and as the head and neck of the skin are always slightly darker in shade than the butt, those parts are used for trimmings. The peculiar texture of a calfskin permits of its being dyed a "fast color" in any color and shade from jet black to a bright orange or cream white. Though gray, tan, and russet are the most in demand, close adherents of the "latest" are now calling for "blood orange." Not only is ooze calf being used in the manufacture of shoes, but it is also used to quite an extent by the makers of albums, pocket-books, hand bags, card cases, pen wipers, and a thousand other novelties. Nor is this all, for the dressmakers have caught the popular craze, and ooze calf now adorns the head gear and serves as the latest in dress trimmings.

Kangaroo is another of fashion's favorites. It was first used in the manufacture of shoes about twelve years ago, since which time it has gradually grown in favor. As it has won public favor entirely by its merits, it will doubtless retain its popularity for some years. It has the virtue of being both durable and very easy to foot. Its strength is so great as to defy the power of ordinary men to tear. The kangaroo was first hunted for sport. The Australian considered that his visiting English cousin had not "done" the country if he returned without enjoying the excitement of a kangaroo hunt. The kangaroo is now hunted for profit, the hide being worth from seventy-five to eighty-five cents a pound. As shooting injures the hide the killing is usually done by clubbing.

During 1888 upwards of 750,000 kangaroo hides were imported into the United States. Add to this the number of hides consumed in Europe, and it seems no wonder that the Australian Government is now discussing the advisability of limiting the annual slaughter of kangaroos.

Patent leather is one of the things of fashion's fancy. The better grades of patent leather shoes are made from patent calf. It may be surprising to many to learn that no patent calf is made in this country, but it is all imported from Germany and France. Some few years ago the tanners here spent considerable money in trying to make a patent calf that would compare favorably in quality with the imported article, but were unable to do it. Patent leather and patent calf must not be confounded. Of the former large quantities are made here, it being tanned from cowhide, while the latter is from calfskin. Small calfskins of fine fiber are selected. During the process of tanning they are stretched, else the japan would soon crack. The process of laying the japan followed in Germany and France is a secret the American tanner has not yet learned. A first quality patent calf, if not exposed to sudden change of temperature, will wear quite as well as the ordinary calf. The quality may be judged by the brilliancy of the jet black. If the japan has a bluish cast, depend upon it the quality is not first-class, and let not the smoothest-tongued shoe salesman deceive you.

Cordovan has taken the place of alligator for wear in wet weather. This, too, is largely imported from Germany. It is made from certain parts of the horse hide, and is a very durable leather. It is impervious to water, and has a very smooth surface. It is not imported in sides, as are most kinds of leather, but comes blocked to the shape of the vamp. Unlike calf, it does not stretch in wearing, but retains the shape of the last until the shoe is worn out. A few years ago it was very expensive, but recently the tanners have conquered many of the difficulties in preparing the hide, and, with reduced cost, it is now quite popular.

As to what is the coming leather no man can tell. Almost every animal, and even reptile, has played a part in the make up of fashionable foot gear. It was only a few days ago the reporter saw in the cutting room of a slipper manufacturer the skins of a moccasin snake measuring eight feet and its mate measuring seven feet. These were to be made into slippers, and the small pieces to be made into pocketbooks.—N. Y. Sun.

THE HABIT OF LYING.

Falsehoods That Are Really a Credit to Those Who Tell Them.

Have you ever noticed how general the habit of telling falsehoods is among your acquaintances and even with yourself? If not, just set apart one day to keep track of your own sayings and those of others, and if you can not say at the end of the day that this world is made up of people who habitually tell fibs and falsehoods then it can be safely inferred that you have not talked with any body and have been silent yourself, or else that you have grown forgetful and have not tallied correctly. Do not hold up your hands in holy horror at this statement, but read on and find out the use and abuse of untruths. Falsehoods, when used in the proper place, are not, as many suppose, things to be marked up against us in the records by which we shall eventually be judged, but on the contrary, according to my ideas, will entitle us to a bright sunny spot in the great Oklahoma of the future. What can be more noble than the words of the sick man who, although he feels that his malady is growing worse, in order to save is friends anxiety declares that he is getting better, and while pains rack his body declares that he is resting comfortably? What more generous than the words of the child which will give up its sweets to another and say that it does not care for them, while in reality its mouth is fairly "watering" for them? What can cause us to respect a young lady more than to hear her tell her parents, whom she knows are aversed to her attending an opera or some other amusement, that she does not care to go, thus relieving the parental minds of the idea that possibly they have caused pain by expressing their wishes? Or who if more deserving of a kindness than the man who, in order to help a fellow-being, will devote valuable time to his assistance and then declare that the act did not inconvenience him in the least and that the time he spent in doing it was valueless? These are the kinds of falsehoods and fibs that are a credit to those who tell them. There are only two other kinds of untruths, and one of those, I think, is the kind which should cause us to pity, not to blame, the one who tells them. These are the malformations of truth which the genus "yarn spinner" gets off, which, although they may be "whoppers," never harm anybody, and you generally find that the man who gets off yarns of this sort is harmless and will not tell a falsehood in order to injure his neighbor. That which has ruined the reputations of fibs, falsehoods, untruths and yarns is the genuine "lie." By that word is meant that which is told by the scandal-monger, the sneak, and those who, although they may bear the appearance and reputation of honest people, have yet that on their tongues which is more dangerous than the venom of the viper. By all means encourage the production of the harmless but useful fib or white lie, and don't discourage the man who is fond of telling yarns, as he derives a pleasure from them himself, even if an outsider does not, and he never harms; but of all things avoid a vicious and deliberate liar.—Chicago Journal.

PROGRESS IN JAPAN.

Independence a Marked Characteristic of Japanese Independence.

Japan is in an especial sense an American mission field. Of the twenty-six Protestant missionary societies which are laboring in that field twenty are American, including two Canada societies. The first missions in Japan were began just thirty years ago. Missionaries of three American churches—the Presbyterian, the Reformed (Dutch), and the Protestant Episcopal—arrived in that country in 1859, and those of the American Baptist Union in the following year. These four churches carried on their missionary work there—and it seemed to be not very encouraging work—without help until 1869, when the American Board and the Church Missionary Society of England sent representatives to join them. Since then other societies have entered the field one after another, nine having joined the list since 1880. The Unitarian missionary went out in 1887, just two years after the Society of Friends (orthodox) had sent their missionaries. European societies have been slow to appreciate the claims of Japan as a mission field. They have missions in China and India, but they have left Japan, for the most part, to America. Only one Continental society has a mission in Japan, begun so recently as 1885. The Scotch Presbyterians, the English Baptists, and three Church of England societies have missionaries in Japan; but of the 443 missionaries laboring in Japan at the close of 1888, no fewer than 386 were from the United States and Canada. The number of missionaries in Japan in 1888 indicates an increase of 90 for the year. There are 249 organized churches, of which 92 are wholly and 157 partially self-supporting—an increase of 28; 25,514 members—a gain of 5,768; 9,698 scholars in day and boarding schools—a gain of 2,553; 287 theological students, and 142 native ministers. The increase of theological students was 71, and of native ministers 40. The growth of hospital practice may be inferred from the fact that the number of patients increased from 3,334 in 1887 to 17,279 in 1888. The contributions of native Christians for all purposes were 34,455 yen—an increase for one year of 22,883 yen. Independence is a marked characteristic of Japanese Christianity. The native Christians show a disposition to help themselves, think for themselves and to have a church of their own.—N. Y. Times.

THE ARIZONA KICKER.

A Number of Valuable Suggestions and Reflections.

We extract the following from the last issue of the Arizona Kicker:

A REMEDY.—We would suggest to the Postmaster General that he drop a line to the postmaster of this town reading: "Major Bill Perkins—Sir: Either attend to biz or git, and I'd a little rather you'd git. So would the people of your town. Yours truly, and don't be over a week making up your mind what course to take."

TOO PREVIOUS.—Ever since Harrison's election Colonel Hank Taylor, of this town, has been sweating the color out of his blue suspenders in running after office. The office he wanted was boss of the Custom House, and he has been figuring that if he got it he would raise asparagus in his front yard, horse-radish in the back, and put on all the style they do in Chicago. It was only yesterday that he suddenly became aware of the fact that we have no custom house here for him to boss. What he had always supposed was a government institution of the kind, turned out to be Desnoyer's storage house for bones. Colonel Hank has our sympathy in this his hour of deepest trial, but that's the best we can do. We are in no situation to either lend him a shirt or trust him for groceries.

IT MAKES US SAD.—Mrs. Judge Shiver passed the Kicker office at eleven o'clock Tuesday night in a state of happy inebriation, being on her way home from a high lager beer given by Mrs. Prof. Westenhouse at her elegant mansion on Bronco Place. Mrs. Judge was dragging her new bonnet along the ground by the starboard tie and softly singing about pansy blossoms. We were sitting on the front steps in the gentle moonlight, thinking of the past and gone, and the event saddened us more than we can express. We had a mother once. She was not beautiful, and splitting wood while our dear father talked politics at the grocery made her lop-shouldered, but she was good and temperate. Suppose she had been in the habit of getting slewed? Where would we have been to-day? Instead of being at the head of a great weekly paper like the Kicker, which also runs a harness shop, grocery, feed store and bazar in connection, all under one economical management and the same roof, we should doubtless have inhabited a convict's garb in some State prison. Veni, vidi, curanter, which, if we remember correctly, means: "The mother makes the man what he is."

A SUGGESTION.—We have nothing in particular against the Government, neither do we wish Indian Agent Babcock any harm. It seems to be our duty, however, to call the agent's attention to the fact that he is making an ass of himself and that he can resign any time within the next three weeks. If we were running this Government we'd run him head first into the soil about the first thing we took hold of after breakfast Monday morning.

THANKS.—Judge Burrows entered the Kicker office the other day in his usual quiet and dignified manner and laid three cucumbers on our table and withdrew. They are of his own raising, and of superior breed and finish. We thank the judge from the bottom of our heart. Such things prove to the editor that he is not forgotten. We shall publish a two-column sketch of the judge next week.

UNKNOWN FRIENDS.—Some time during Monday night some kind-hearted but unknown friend left a piece of rope about fifteen feet long, beautifully noosed, on our steps as a present for our faithful work in this community. We took it in and shall treasure it highly. The editors of the World, Herald, Times and other New York sheets toil from sun to sun and are hardly known, by name. Scarcely a day passes that we do not receive dead-head tickets and beautiful little mementoes to prove that the busy world is not too busy to remember us. Cum solis. Which means, 'tis well.—Detroit Free Press.

He Would Not Relent.

A story is being told of a very close citizen of Washington that he wanted to go to Lynchburg recently. At the ticket office he was told that the fare was $1.80.

"One eighty," he muttered. "Gif you $1.40."

"Gif you one fifty."

"Nope. One eighty."

"Den I'll valk."

"That is your privilege," answered the ticket-seller. So he started off down the track and had made about half the distance when he heard an engine tooting and whistling behind him.

"You needn't visstle," said he, waving his hand, "I'll not gome back."—Washington Post.

—A story is told of an old church clerk who, being unable to read or write, forgot to announce that on the following Sunday there would be no service, the vicar having promised to officiate for a friend at a neighboring church. Directly the congregation were outside, the blunt old clerk thought of his omission; and, rushing out and mounting the nearest tombstone, he shouted at the top of his voice: "This is to give notice that there won't be no church here next Sunday. The vicar's goin' a-fishin' with a friend."

—A mechanician of Danzig has constructed a hand fog-horn that may be heard ten miles. With a second horn of lower pitch to mark the divisions between letters, whole sentences can be clearly transmitted by the Morse or other code of signals.

JACKETS AND CLOAKS.

Description of the Most Popular Fall and Winter Wraps.

Three kinds of wraps are imported for autumn and winter use, viz: cloth jackets for general wear, short mantles for dress occasions, and long cloaks for comfort. The English fancy is to use rough-finished cloths for jackets and other outside garments; but French tailors prefer smooth cloths even for short and jaunty jackets, using the rough cloths merely for borders, collars and cuffs.

The new jackets are shorter in the back and longer in front, sloping gradually to a point. The back has two side forms on each side, fitting it closely to the figure, except in very small sizes, where this would cut up the cloth into so many small pieces that only one side form is preferred. The middle forms may end in plaits or be smoothly fitted over the tournure. The fronts of rough cloth jackets are either double or single breasted, but in most cases the right side laps on the left at the top and buttons diagonally. The fronts are now provided with darts, and are nearer being tight-fitting than they were in last season's coats. The boucle cloths and the thick blanket cloths with rough finish, the diagonal cloths and the somewhat smoother homespuns, are made up in this way in dark brown, blue, plomb and black, and there are many cloths that combine two colors, such as brown with blue or brown with red. The standing collar about two inches high is preferred on these coats, and may be of cloth, or of velvet, or of heavy repped silk.

It is finished around the edges with a piping or cord of mohair braid such as finishes the edges of the whole garment; the fronts of the collar are straight, and are made to meet, being provided with a button hole in each end, through which two flaked buttons are passed; if not fastened in this way, there is a small clasp of wood or metal, or else a mammoth hook and eye of fanciful design. The coat sleeves are amply loose all their length, but have no added fullness at the top. Small straight cuffs match the collar. Slit pockets bound with braid are on the sides.

Very large flat buttons are again used, and there are generally two sizes on the same jacket; at the top and at the waist line are set buttons two inches in diameter, while those between are but half that size. Naturally, fewer buttons are used, now that they are so much larger, and in costumes these large buttons are continued to the skirt and coat, while smaller sizes that fasten more easily are placed on the corsage. Flat plaques or cup-shaped backgrounds of bright metal holding stars, flowers or fans of darker metals are the popular designs for buttons on wraps and on cloth dresses. The fancy for vests and for revers fronts continues, but these are seen more often on the fine broadcloth jackets that are imported from French modistes. Dark green cloth is in favor for French jackets cut with the fronts turned back in revers that lap only at the waist line, disclosing above this a vest of the cloth or of satin, plush or velvet. Brown, blue and black cloths are similarly made, and many are finished with a high collar and sleeve bands of furs or else of rough Astrakhan cloth. Braid is still used in diagonal rows and in points on the vest, collar and sleeves, and as a border on the lower edge. Alaska sable, Persian lamb-skin and the light natural beavers will be the popular furs for trimming cloth wraps.

Long cloaks are made with closely fitted backs, half-loose fronts and square sleeves. The back is cut off just below the waist line, and the fullness necessary for the skirt is added there in large pleats, or in French gathers that are taken in long stitches, making the edge shelve out from the closely fitted waist. The fronts may be single or double-breasted, but are mostly fastened only as low as the waist. The trimmings are arranged in lengthwise lines, as a border at the foot is not desirable on these large wraps, unless the wearer is very tall and wishes to shorten her apparent height. Quilted satin linings are in the upper part of such garments, but the wadding seldom extends below the hips, as it is not needed there for warmth, and this helps to reduce the weight, which has hitherto been the objection to large cloaks. Two kinds of velvet or plush, or else heavy ribbed silks, are in the most dressy long cloaks, while plainer garments are of boucle cloth or brocaded wools, or else the blanket cloths that need no lining. For ulsters and closely fitted redingotes the diagonal cloths are much used, and with these are hoods with lining and revers of plush, either plain or striped. The wood-beaded galloons and Theodora braids are the trimmings for long cloth coats. Striped and checked homespuns are liked for traveling coats, and these have the waist and sleeves lined with satin.—Harper's Bazar.

Begin Early.

"Education commences at the mother's knee, and every word spoken within hearsay of little children tends toward the formation of character.' Endeavor always to talk your best before your children. They hunger perpetually for new ideas. They will learn with pleasure from the lips of parents what they deem it drudgery to study in books; and, even if they have the misfortune to be deprived of many educational advantages, they will grow up intelligent if they enjoy in childhood the privilege of listening daily to the conversation of intelligent people. We sometimes see parents, who are the life of every community which they enter, dull, silent and uninteresting at home among their children. If they have not mental activity and mental stores sufficient for both, let them first use what they have for their own households. A silent home is a dull place for young people—a place from which they will escape if they can. How much useful information, on the other hand, is often given in a pleasant family conversation, and what unconscious, but excellent, mental training in lively, social argument. Cultivate to the utmost the grace of conversation."—Boston Budget.

HAD A RAT-TRAP.

But He Made a Mistake in Waking Up a Passenger.

It was on one of the Sound steamers coming down the other day. A man of middle age and much dignity had fallen asleep in his rocking-chair on the promenade deck, when he was approached by a sharp-nosed, hawk-eyed man of forty, who had a parcel in his hand.

"Hey—you!" he exclaimed, as he slapped the sleeping man on the shoulder.

"Sir! How dare you?" sternly demanded the latter, as he roused up.

"I haven't done any thing that I can be sent to State prison for, have I?"

"What is your business with me, sir?"

"That's better. That's coming to the point. Let me draw up a chair and take it easy as we chat. You told me at Stonington that you thought you would order twelve dozen as a starter. Suppose you double the order and take ten per cent. discount?"

"Sir, what are you talking about, and who do you take me for?" demanded the man.

"Your name is—is Faxon—firm of Faxon & Brown, dealers in hardware, isn't it?"

"No, sir!"

"What! Why, I'd bet a farm agin a wheel-barrow that it was! Didn't we have a conversation at Stonington?"

"No, sir!"

"Didn't I show you my centennial rat-trap and exhibit its workings?"

"No, sir!"

"Didn't demonstrate the fact that it would catch and hold any thing from a mouse to a raccoon, and that the public was bound to buy millions of 'em?"

"Sir! Do you intend to insult me?" shouted the other.

"Not for Joseph. I never insulted nobody. It's curious if I have made a mistake. Didn't you spend half an hour yesterday investigating my anti-friction, double leverage, anti-cogless centennial rat-trap, warranted to clean out a whole county of rats, mice, chipmunks, gophers and rabbits inside of ten days, or no pay?"

"No, sir! No, sir!"

"Well, that's queer! I'd take my affidavy it was you. And you didn't order twelve dozen, to be shipped the first of the week?"

"Never! You ought to have more sense and manners, sir! Go away about your business!"

"My business is to sell the centennial rat-trap—only thing ever invented to entice rats without bait; no delicate machinery to get out of order; no cost for steam power to run it. If I have made a mistake I beg your pardon."

"Then go away, sir—go away before I forget my position and do you injury!"

"You wouldn't injure a feller for wanting to sell you a rat-trap which lays over all other inventions in America, would you? If you ain't the man who ordered the twelve dozen, you may want to give me an order just the same. I will show you how it works."

"No, you won't! Go away, sir—go, or I'll do you harm! You are the most impudent rascal I've met in a year!"

"And you won't look at my trap?"

"No, sir!"

"And you want me to leave you in solitude?"

"At once, sir!"

"Well, I'll do it. Some folks force their inventions upon the public. That ain't my style. My centennial rat-trap speaks for itself. I go, sir; but I leave my card. Peruse it at your leisure. All mail will reach me promptly at that address. Send you a dozen on trial, or give you a discount of five per cent. on all over three dozen. Send in your orders as early as possible, as the season is forward. Au revoir, sir."—N. Y. Sun.

Wood Pavements in Europe.

It appears that wood pavements have met with greater success in some of the countries of Europe than in our own, the reason assigned for this being the fact of their having a foundation of concrete to rest upon in the former, at the same time receiving more attention there, in the way of maintenance, than here. Owing to its hardness and resinous quality, American yellow pine, it is stated, has become the favorite wood for this purpose in Berlin and Hamburg; and official report says that Frederick's Bridge, Berlin, which was paved in the spring of 1879 with the wood in question, is still in good condition, while the approaches, paved with granite blocks, have twice since required repaving. The Opera platz, also, in front of the Emperor's palace, was paved seven years ago partly with yellow pine and cypress, at a point where the traffic is greatest, while at other points stone blocks were used, the laying of the different surfaces with these several materials being at the same time. According to the report the area covered with the wood pavement is at present the one which is best preserved.—N. Y. Sun.

—According to the New York Sun Herr von Bulow has won one triumph in America that has as yet been unchronicled. One afternoon while the crowded audience was listening silently to his wonderful shadings, all over the house, up in the galleries, down in orchestra, on either side of the balcony, mice come running out to hear him play, as their ancestors came out to hear the great master, Mozart, long ago.

Appreciative.

(The young lady has just finished playing a selection from "Faust.")

Old Lady—Yes; Min plays it. I can always tell it when she crosses her hands.—Harper's Bazar.

He Was Mistaken.

A man with fire in his eyes and his fists doubled up was prancing around on Monroe avenue yesterday when a policeman hailed him with:

"Are you looking for anybody in particular?"

"I should remark that I was. I'm going to smash a fellow's head the minute I find him!"

"What for?"

"He called me a crank, and I don't take that from anybody."

"I suppose you know the definition of the term?"

"You bet I do! It means a fellow who will walk into a saloon where five or six of his friends are and drink alone. I have never done it in my life, and I'll allow no man to impeach my honor."

The officer explained the term as generally understood, and the man replied:

"Is that possible! Well, then, I won't smash him. I must post up on some of these things before I get into trouble."—Detroit Free Press.

So Artless.

He stood in a doorway on Woodward avenue the other rainy day with an umbrella in his hand and he seemed to be waiting for an opportunity. One soon came tripping along. She had no umbrella, and he stepped out, raised his own and began:

"Excuse me, but"——

"Oh, certainly," she laughingly exclaimed. "You are very, very kind. I shall always remember it. Good-by."

And she took the umbrella from his grasp and tripped away without ever once looking back, and he returned to the shelter of the doorway to exclaim:

"There goes a $5 umbrella and here stands an idiot who has been sold for a cent."—Detroit Free Press.

Cupid's New Arrow.

Young Cupid went storming to Vulcan one day,
And besought him to look at his arrow.
"'Tis useless," he cried; "you must mend it, I say!
'Tis not fit to let fly at a sparrow.
There's something that's wrong in the shaft or the dart,
For it flutters quite false to my aim;
'Tis an age since it fairly went home to the heart,
And the world really jests at my name.

'I have straightened, I've bent, I've tried all, I declare;
I've perfumed it with sweetest of sighs;
'Tis feathered with ringlets my mother might wear,
And the barb gleams with light from young eyes;
But it falls without touching—I'll break it, I vow—
For there's Hymen beginning to pout;
He's complaining his torch burns so dull and so low
That Zephyr might puff it right out."

Till Vulcan the weapon restored.
"There, take it, young sir; try it now—if it fail
I will ask neither fee nor reward."
The urchin shot out, and rare havoc he made;
The wounded and dead were untold;
But no wonder the rogue had such slaughtering trade,
For the arrow was laden with gold.

Advice Is Cheap.

Seedy Stranger—I have here a couple of articles which I think would interest your readers.

Editor—Well, sir, what are their subjects?

Seedy Stranger—They are editorials. One is on "The Business Situation," and the other "Advice to Young Men as to Getting on in Life."

Editor—If you will leave them we will look them over.

Seedy Stranger—Thank you; but if you would only advance me five cents it would be a great favor. I should like to buy a neat but not gaudy sandwich.—America.

Not an Uncommon Voice.

The music teacher in the Sunday school was selecting a chorus. He inquired of each scholar in what voice he sang. They answered tenors, altos, etc. One little boy didn't know what his voice was.

"Say treble," was the kindly advice.

He became confused, blundered and said, "Terrible."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

—The smallest oil painting in the world is entitled "What an Awful Lie," is one inch by an inch and a quarter in size, very handsomely framed and was painted by Mueller, a celebrated artist. The picture represents two monks in conversation, one of them evidently getting off a whopper to the other. It is exhibited in New York.

A QUEER NEWSPAPER.

It Has the Greatest Earthly Dignity and a Circulation of Three.

Instead of "the largest circulation" the newspaper of the greatest dignity has "the smallest circulation in the world." It is the Austrian Kaiser's Chronicle, the most curious publication in Europe. Its proprietor is Emperor Francis Joseph, of Austria, who publishes it for his sole benefit, and not for that of the public. State duties occupy most of his time, and he has little leisure to read the Vienna dailies. He wants to know not only what goes on every day in the civilized world, but also what is said in Europe and America about the Austrian Government.

To satisfy this desire it would be necessary for him to skim through hundreds of papers daily, but even then many a pungent notice of himself or his Government would certainly escape him. And even if he were to employ a staff of clerks to examine the papers, and clip out the proper articles, he would be little better off, for he would have no time to read the mass of material which they would hand to him every morning. News, however, the Kaiser must have, and through this paper, the Imperial Review, he gets it in richer and fuller measure than any other man in the world. The construction of the paper is as unique as its object. The imperial news bureau, which is almost a department of state, publishes it at a cost of 200,000 gulden yearly. The chief of the bureau, who is a high Government official, is assisted by several sub-editors, each of whom is in turn assisted by a corps of trained clerks. The work begins before dawn, when the chief's mail wagon proceeds to the depot for the foreign papers. Once in the bureau they are sorted to the different countries or states, and taken to the various sub-editors. There is a copy of every leading paper in Europe, no matter in what language it may be printed, and there are also copies of several minor Austrian papers in the different dialects of the empire. The huge pile of papers being arranged, the clerks go to work. On any reference to the Austrian Government or the imperial family being found a blue pencil is drawn through the article. In this manner the readers get through their work, after which the marked papers are sent to the sub-editors, who read the articles carefully and condense them. A lengthy criticism may thus be reduced to a few lines, though if very important little pruning may take place. In all cases the original language and style are closely preserved. It is, of course, necessary to translate all foreign articles into German, as the Review is in that language. This work of translation takes a long time, but can not be shirked, as the foreign criticisms form an essential part of the Review. In due time, however, every paper has been read and every article condensed, and now comes the last process in the construction of this strange paper. It is late at night, for the work is very heavy and the paper must be ready for the Emperor in the morning. Men famous for their penmanship do the finishing work. The selected articles are given to them and they make three copies—one for the Emperor, one for the Foreign Minister, and one for the Secretary of State. A fourth copy is never made, and a glimpse at one of the three is never vouchsafed to any one unconnected with the bureau. The copy for the Emperor is written on beautiful linen paper, and at the head of the first page stands the finely decorated title, Journal-Revue for Sie Majestat den Kaiser. The copies of the minister and secretary are also written on exceptionally handsome paper, but of an inferior quality to that used for the Emperor's. The writing itself is like copper plate, and no matter what the hurry may be, excellence in this respect is imperative. There are usually from sixteen to twenty pages in the paper, but in dull times, when criticism is scanty, it falls as low as four or five. It is the Emperor's regular custom to read the Review as soon as he wakes in the morning, and if there is any specially important article in it he summons his minister and has a talk with him about it. At any rate he reads the journal from beginning to end, and thus knows each day how he and his Government are regarded by the civilized nations of the earth. The articles may be old—as a matter of fact each journal is a day late—but they are new to him.—Current Literature.

A Sensible Canvasser.

An agent who had made a study of human nature stopped at a gate on Second avenue the other day and asked of a small boy digging plantains out of the grass:

"Bub, is your mother home?"

"Yes, sir."

"Changed hired girls within a week?"

"No, sir."

"House cleaning all done?"

"Yes, sir."

"Got her new spring bonnet?"

"She has."

"Children well?"

"Yes, sir."

"Father go away good-natured this morning?"

"He did."

"Then I guess I'll ring the bell and try to sell her a picture."

She took two, and asked him to call in a day or two with a $7 family Bible.—Detroit Free Press.

THE TERRY TRAGEDY.

The following summing up of the Terry tragedy is taken from the ALTA, a paper always disposed to take a fair and impartial stand on every public matter, and presents the best view of this deplorable affair.

The killing of David S. Terry by the United States Deputy Marshal David Nagle was an unfortunate affair, regretted, we believe, by no one more than by Justice Field, in whose defense the fatal shot was fired. There seems, however, to be an almost undivided sentiment that the killing was justifiable. Everything attending the tragedy points to the iresistable conclusion that there was a premeditated determination on the part of Terry and his wife to provoke Justice Field to an encounter, in which either Terry might find an excuse for killing the man against whom he had threatened vengeance, or in which his wife might use the pistol which she always carries, in the pretended defense of her husband. For some time past it has been feared that a meeting between Terry and Justice Field would result in bloodshed. There is now indisputable proof that Terry had made repeated threats that he would assault Justice Field the first time he met him off the bench, and that if the Judge resisted he would kill him. Viewed in the light of these threats, Terry's presence on the same train with Justice Field will hardly be regarded accidental, and his actions in the breakfast room at Lathrop were directly in line with the intentions he had previously expressed. Nagle's prompt and deadly use of his revolver is to be judged with due reference to the character and known disposition of the man with whom he had to deal and to his previous actions and threats. He was attending Justice Field, against the will of the latter and in spite of his protest, in obedience to an order from the Attorney-General of the United States to Marshal Franks to detail a deputy to protect the person of Justice Field from Terry's threatened violence. A slap in the face may not under ordinary, circumstances be sufficient provocation to justify the taking of human life; but it must be remembered that these were no ordinary circumstances and Terry was no ordinary man. Terry was a noted pistol shot; it was known that he invariably carried arms and that he boasted of his ability to use them. If on this occasion he was unarmed, as Mrs. Terry asserts, Nagle had no means of knowing that fact; on the contrary, to his mind every presumption was in favor of the belief that he carried both pistol and knife, in accordance with his usual habit. As a peace officer, even apart from the special duty which had been assigned to him, he was justified in taking the means necessary to prevent Terry from continuing his assault; but the means necessary in the case of one man may be totally inadequate with a man bearing the reputation of David S. Terry, a man who only a few months previously had drawn a knife while resisting the lawful authority of another United States officer. It is true that if Terry was unarmed, the deputy-marshal might have arrested him, without taking his life or seriously endangering his own; but Terry was a man of gigantic stature, and, though aged, in posession of a giant's strength; and there is no one who is acquainted with him or has had oppurtunity to learn his past history, who does not know that he was a desperate man, willing to take desperate chances, and to resort to desperate means when giving way to his impulses of passion, and that any person who should at such a moment attempt to stay his hand would do so at the risk of his life. Whether he had a pistol with him at that moment or not, there was every reason to believe that he was armed, and that the blow with his hand was intended only as a precursor to a more deadly blow with a weapon. At such moments little time is allowed for reflection. The officer of the law was called upon to act and to act promptly. He did so and the life of David S. Terry was the forfeit. He fell, a victim to his ungovernable passions, urged on to his fate by the woman who was at once his wife and his client, and perhaps further incited by sensational newspaper articles which stirred up the memory of his resentment for fancied wrongs and taunted him with the humiliation of threats unfulfilled.

The close of Judge Terry's life ends a career and an era. He had the misfortune to carry into a ripened state of society the conditions which are tolerable only where social order is not fully established. Restless under authority, and putting violence above law, he lived by the sword and has perished by it.

That example which refused submission to judicial finalities was becoming offensive to California, but the incubus of physical fear was upon many, who realized that the survival of frontier ways into a non-frontier period was a damage to the State. But, be this as it may, the stubborn spirit which defied the law has fallen by the law.

When Justice Field showed the highest judicial courage in the opening incidents of the tragedy which has now closed, the manhood of California received a distinct impetus. When the Justice, with threats made against his life, returned to the State unarmed and resentful of protection against assault, declaring that when Judges must arm to defend themselves from assault offered in reprisal of their judicial action, society must be considered dissolved, he was rendering to our institutions the final and highest possible service. The event that followed the killing of Terry in the act of striking him the second time from behind, while he sat at table in a crowded public dining room, was the act of the law. The Federal Department of Justice, by its cheif, the Attorney-General of the United States, had ordered its officer the United States Marshal for the Northern District of California, to take such means and in such measure as might be necessary to protect the persons of the Judges against assault by Judge Terry, in carrying out the threats that he had made. This order was from the executive arm of the Government, and it was carried out to the letter. Judge Terry took the law into his own hands, and fell. Nothing can add to the lesson his fate teaches. It is established now that in California no man is above the law; that no man can effect the even poise of Justice by fear. Confiding in his own strength as superior to the law, David S. Terry fell wretchedly.

No more need be said. New California inscribes upon her shield, "Obedience to the law, the first condition of good citizenship," and the past is closed.

COURT NOTES.

FRIDAY, August 16th.

TUESDAY, August 20th.

Mary A. Malone vs. Frank Malone—Filed complaint in action for divorce and summons issued.

MARRIED.

CANNON—TIBBITTS—At Fairfield Center, Maine, July 18, by Rev. J. L. Seward, Mr. Geo. L. Cannon and Miss Mina B. Tibbits.

The Waterville Mail says: "Mr. Geo. L. Cannon, of the firm of Morse & Cannon, of this city, and Miss Mina B. Tibbets, also of Waterville, were united in marriage Thursday morning, July 18, at the residence of Mr. Hiram Potter in Fairfield Centre, by Rev. J. L. Seward, of this city. A pleasant party had assembled at an early hour to witness the ceremony, at the conclusion of which a bountiful wedding breakfast was served by Mr. and Mrs. Potter. The generosity of many kind friends was amply attested by the large display of useful and valuable bridal gifts, among which was an elegant silver service, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Potter, silver knives, forks, spoons, berry spoon, vasas, rich glassware, fine engravings, embroidered scarfs, and many articles seen on such an occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Cannon are to take a bridal tour of two weeks."

BORN.

BOURLAND—At Rawson's Ranch, August 14, 1889, to Mr. and Mrs. G. P. Bourland a daughter.

Owens river is lower at present than it has ever been known.

Boulanger has been found guilty of embezzlement and treason.

Truckee had a destructive fire on the 13th in which over thirty houses were burned.

L. F. J. Wrinkle came up from Keeler and remained in town a couple of days this week.

J. A. McKenzie is making improvements on his residence at the Lucky Jim mine at Darwin.

Miss Annie Kohler will soon return to Independence and take charge of the public school here.

The family of W. S. Enos, of Camp Independence, have returned home from the lower country.

After two months work in experting the Auditor's books of Los Angeles, the shortage has been found to be $5,652.

The sum of $202,485 was paid out for wages to employés on the Comstock for the month of July.

Rev. E. McEvers has gone to Bishop to take charge of the pastorate there. His family will remain here about a month.

Mrs. Blair and her daughter, Miss Maud Cook, will leave Europe for their home in Independence about the first of September.

No teacher has yet been secured for the Georges Creek school. It is understood, however, that Mr. Janvier has the refusal of the situation.

H. L. Gordon has confessed to the Clipper Gap train robbery in December last. He says he and his brother did the work and got $5,000.

Billy S. is claimed for the fastest 600 yard horse in the State of Nevada to the extent of offering to match him against anything for $1,000 a side.

Henry Giles returned last week from a visit to his old home in England. He brought with him a handsome jockey outfit and in all probability the "ivory bones" will be sporting it during fair week.

John L. Sullivan has discovered that his arrest was no joke. He was sentenced to one year in prison and referee Fitzpatrick, who pleaded guilty got off a with fine of $200. Jake Kilrain is out on bail in Baltimore, and is a badly scared pugilist.

The Inyo Canal is now completed to a point about four miles north of Lone Pine Station. Slow progress is now being made owing to the character of the soil, which is rocky. The line of the ditch is close to the base of the Inyo mountains at this point, but the closer to the mountains the ditch is run the more land will it irrigate.

The California State Board of Trade Committee say that the Owens River during the summer months carries sufficient water to place a surface depth of 15 inches of water on 300,000 acres of land without the use of storage reservoirs. Less than 12,000 acres are now cultivated in Owens Valley.

A miner's inch of water, legal measure, in the State of California, is that quantity of water which will flow through an opening of one square inch in the bottom or side of a vessel under a pressure of four inches above the opening. Fifty of the above miners inches is equivalent to the discharge of one cubic foot of water per second.

Milton A. Sharp, the "Black Bart" of Nevada, who stood up stages and walked off with Wells, Fargo & Co.'s treasury box for years in Esmeralda county, and who was finally captured, convicted and sent to the Penitentiary took advantage of the confidence reposed in him as a trusty, and on Thursday evening of last week took leg bail. A reward of $350 is offered for his recapture.

Sporting.

For some time past a challenge has been published by Manuel Diaz offering to run any man in Inyo county 125 yards at Lone Pine on the 16th of September. On Wednesday an agreement signed by Walter Ober was sent to Lone Pine, accompanied with $50 as a forfeit, accepting the challenge as follows: The race to be run between the hours of 2 and 5 o'clock p. m., on a level, hard track, or one having a slight declivity. Each party to select a judge, the judges to appoint a starter. To start at the sound of a pistol shot. If either party neglects or refuses to run, or fails to deposit $150 with the stakeholder on September 15th, he shall forfeit $50. No reply has yet been received but Diaz will undoubtedly make his challenge good. The men are very evenly matched and the contest will be close and exciting. S. Moore desires the statement made that he is ready at any time to run either Ober or Diaz, or both of them. A match will probably be arranged for fair week. A challenge is also being publirhed by Marshall Naylor to run "Sidewinder" against "Darby," notwithstanding the fact that Irv. H. Mulholland offered to accept the challenge three weeks ago, conceding 6 pounds weight, Darby to carry 133 pounds and Sidewinder 127, and also to ride catch weights. Neither of the offers were accepted, and as the challenge is still being published, an acceptance in strict accordance with its terms will be found in this issue. It is now a case of "put up or shut up."

School Social.

On Wednesday evening quite a number of people met at Georges Creek and spent a most pleasant evening, the occasion being the completion of the new school house at that place. The music was good and the new building afforded an excellent place for dancing. The affair was rendered especially pleasant by the amusement afforded the children, the keen zest with which they entered into the sport could not help but bring pleasurable emotions to the older ones who watched them. Their dancing may not have been a la mode but their "get there" tendencies were refreshing, and more than all, happiness was depicted on each childish face. The new building is well calculated in every way for a schoolroom. The ceilings are high and there is plenty of light and ventilation. The building is decidedly a credit to the district and to its builders, Messrs. Cartier, Stecker, and Andrews. The work is thorough in every particular.

Challenge Accepted.

I hereby accept the challenge offered by Marshall Naylor to run "Sidewinder" against "Darby," the conditions being as follows: The race to take place between the hours of 2 and 5 o'clock p. m. of Monday, September 23, 1889, on the race track at Independence, under the management of the 18th Dist. Agricultural Association. Distance, one mile and repeat. Purse, $400—$200 a side. Both horses to carry not less than 118 pounds. Pacific Coast Blood Horse Association rules to govern. I have this day deposited with J. C. Irwin, as stakeholder, the sum of $50 as a forfeit. The party to the agreement failing to deposit the additional sum of $150 with the said stakeholder on or before 12 o'clock m. of Saturday, September 21st, to forfeit $50. Said sum of $50 will remain with J. C. Irwin till September 1st, being ample time for the backers of Sidewinder to make their challenge good. IRV. H. MULHOLLAND.

Independence, August 23, 1889.

Wounds From Barb Wire.

The following receipt, from the Home Journal, is pronounced by many horsemen to be the best thing they have ever used for healing cuts and flesh wounds of all kinds in live-stock, especially from barbed wire, and flies will not trouble a cut where it is used: Raw linseed oil, 16 ounces; saltpetre, powdered, 1 ounce; sugar of lead, powdered, 1 ounce; sulphuric acid, 1 ounce; carbolic acid, ½ ounce. Mix the oil with the saltpetre and sugar of lead, and slowly add the sulphuric acid, stirring constantly. When cold, pour off from the dregs and add the carbolic acid. Apply with a feather twice daily. Do not wash the sore at all. Keep a supply constantly on hand to be ready for casualities.

Apportionment.

County Superintendent Shannon has made the following apportionment of $1,010.94 school money received from the State:

DISTRICT.	SCHOOL	LIBRARY.

Birthday Party

A pleasant party was given by Mrs. N. E. Conklin at Blockrock on Wednesday evening, the occasion being the 21st birthday of Alvah Conklin. Music, dancing and games were indulged in and the guests were admirably entertained until morning. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Conklin, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. P. Laird, Mrs. Webb, Misses M. Conklin, Addie Lewis, Sarah James, Annie Thomsen and Nellie Craig, Messrs. W. R. Johnson, J. W. Murphy, Geo. Lewis, W. P. Yaney, Frank Densmore and J. Rogers.

Castro & Carrasco have bought the property formerly occupied by E. H. Edwards in Lone Pine.

Benjamin F. Butler has declined to participate as counsel in the prosecution of Deuputy Marshal Nagle for the killing of Judge Terry.

Mr. William Kermode has been engaged to teach the Lone Pine school during the coming term. Mr. Kermode is spoken of as an excellent teacher and in every way qualified to fill the position he has secured.

M. Damala the ex-husband of Sarah Bernhardt, died at Paris last week of cerebral congestion. The deceased was a native of Greece, was married to the distinguished actress in the Church of St. Andrew, London, in 1882, and was subsequently divorced from her.

Mary A. Malone has commenced action against Frank Malone for a divorce. In her complaint she alleges that they were married at Bishop Creek on July 29th 1882 and that some time during the following month the defendant deserted and abandoned her and ever since has continued to desert and abandon her.

The County Board of Education met at Independence on Tuesday and is still in session. Messrs. Shannon, Hardy, Laird, Crough and Janvier are present. William Deby, of Laws, and Miss Jennie A. Shirley of Bishop, are being examined for teacher's certificates. The first day's examinations generally considered a test, was successfully passed.

Correspondence.

BISHOP, August 19, 1889.

EDS. INDEPENDENT:—Will you kindly inform me through the columns of your paper what was done at the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors about the County Bonds. SUBSCRIBER.

Nothing was done at the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors in the matter of refunding the county indebtedness. There is a proposition before the Board to refund at five and one-half per cent, $1,000 to be paid for commissions. Some of the members think a lower rate can be had and we understand a correspondence on the subject is now going on. We will have something to say on this subject later on.

A Business Opening

In another column will be found the advertisement of Thomas Boland, of Keeler, for the disposal of his general merchandising business at that place. Mr. Boland has been in business at that place for a considerable time and has built up a good trade. There are more laboring men in Keeler than any other town in the County. The Soda works, marble quarry, and other enterprises afford employment to many men who get their supplies at Keeler. Any person desiring to go into business at a good stand should lose no time in communicating with Mr. Boland.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

MARY A. MALONE, Plaintiff, vs. FRANK MALONE, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against by the above named plaintiff in the Superior Court of the County of Inyo State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

This action is brought to obtain judgment against you dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between you and the plaintiff in the above entitled action. That you pay a reasonable sum into Court to defray the expenses of this action, and for counsel fees; and that you pay to plaintiff such further sum for alimony as to this Court may seem just for her support during the pendency of this action, and for general relief, as will more fully appear by reference to the complaint on file herein.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court, of the County of Inyo, State of California, this 20th day of August, 1889.

[SEAL] P. H. MACK, Clerk.

Notice.

In the matter of the estate of Alphonse Thiebaut, deceased.

Nathan Rhire, a creditor of the estate of Alphonse Thiebaut, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order upon Emelie Thiebaut, Administratrix of said estate, requiring her to sell the personal property as also the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth, it is therefore ordered by the Judge of said Court, that said Administratrix and all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court on Tuesday, the tenth day of September, 1889, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Court-room in the Court house, in the town of Independence, in said County, to show cause why an order should not be granted upon the said Administratrix to sell all the personal property, as well as so much of the real estate of the said deceased, at public sale, as shall be necessary; and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in the "Inyo Independent," a newspaper printed and published in the town of Independence, in said County, and that a copy of this order be personally served upon said Administratrix.

The Breton Mills

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy and published by arrangement with him.]

Tears of shame started into his eyes. "I aint so low; I never thought but what you would before."

She gave him a look half curious and half pitiful. He might as well have cried for the moon. Could it be the lad thought that just because she was pretty she could make his home happy for him—his?

"I'm not going to have a hand at making another poor man's home. People like us had better be single; there's only half the trouble that way, Tommie."

The broad shouldered young man, who did not know what was good for him, fell back from the woman his heart hungered for as if he was shot. And she walked on, with hardly another thought for the foolish lover who imagined they two could be happy together.

Why couldn't she be rich? They had always told her she was beautiful. If she only had a chance. They say men are fools over pretty women, and that is the only hope a woman has of winning her way. If she only had a chance.

A delicate gray mist floated over the river below the village, and the green forests and fresh meadows on the other side smiled through it, like a fair woman through her tears. A tired soul might have drunk in its beauty and been rested, but Jane Graves cast her eyes down on the dusty road before her and walked along with a set bitter curl on her bright red lips, and did not once look at the gift of God's mercy to the poorest of his creatures. For her part she despised the poor; she didn't pity them; great strong men who submitted to be trodden on and ground under the feet of the rich; whose blood and muscles and quivering flesh were weighed in the balance against a few dollars of the speculators. It was good enough for them as long as they submitted to it. She didn't blame the rich; they were the only wise people; she only envied them. They did well to take all they could get and walk over as many thousands as would fall down before them. Oh, if she could only win her way to their ranks. But the rich men do not come into the weave room for their enslavers.

Suddenly she heard a step behind her; a step she knew from all others in the world, and the whole air seemed to tremble with a new, strange, heavenly impulse.

"Good evening, Jane."

She turned with a new, sweet shyness. It was Curran, the agitator, who was beside her. A soft flush was on her cheeks, a warm light in her eyes that had grown larger for him in delicious surprise.

"Who is that young fellow who just left you?"

"Oh, one of my lovers," she answered coquettishly, dropping her eyes before his.

"He your lover!" repeated Curran in his imperious fashion. "You're not for such as he, Jennie."

Her heart fluttered in sweet fear at the meaning she thought in his words. She was trying to walk very slowly, but how fast they seemed to pass the houses.

"So I told him," she said.

"You did well, then," and he looked down admiringly on the girl. "You are a fine woman. I don't suppose you know it."

Jane Graves tried to look as if it was no to her, and Curran went on. "Few women are prettier. There are fine prizes for such as you in this world if you will only wait." He continued thoughtfully, "Men have to work for distinction; a pretty face brings it to women."

"What sort of prizes?" And she trusted herself to look up at him. How grand he was, with his firm, strong face. If he only had a touch of weakness in him that might bend down to her.

"Position, money, power."

"No woman cares for those." And she believed it as she spoke, looking away over the river.

"What then?" he asked, smiling. "Those things are what all men are working for, I suppose."

"Women care for but one thing."

Sometimes the climax of a character is reached only in old age, when storms have wreaked their fury for a lifetime on a soul. Sometimes it comes in childhood, with three-score years of decline to come after it. It was at this moment that this girl's life reached its moral height. If she could but have kept it.

"That is love," she added softly. "It is their lives; they hope only for that; they dream only of it."

Curran laughed, but gently, as he took her hands at parting, pressing them perhaps unconsciously, yet no man can be wholly careless to such beauty as hers.

"It is only because women are more foolish than men, not because they are more devoted, that they are able to make such absurd mistakes."

She smiled on him as radiantly as a red petaled rose unfolding its glowing heart to the morning sun—the sun that gives everything and wants nothing, and stood half turned watching his retiring form. The road at this point passed near a deserted ruin, once a brick sawmill, which had shern the hills and valleys around of their pride, now a favorite trysting place for lovers of moonlight nights like this would be. Curran was just entering under an arch, where once had swung a heavy oaken door which long ago had served some shivering family for a week's firewood.

He went in and did not once turn. How cruel men are. Perhaps, she told herself, he is to meet there some messenger of the Great league he had told her about, and they will plan together some bold stroke. It was beautiful to have such power, even if it made him forget this one poor girl, whose heart leaped so eagerly for another smile.

The whole world seemed glorified to the girl as she walked on. She had loitered so long that the sun was now almost setting, with his flowing robe of carmine about him, and the whole landscape seemed in a rapture of silent worship. Jane Graves was like one in a dream—her home, which she could tell from its cheap dreary counterparts, might have been a palace; the path along in front of it, beaten by so many faltering footsteps, seemed only pleasantly familiar to her. What had she seen to envy in anybody's life that had not her dear hope!

But down the hill comes a great white horse, tossing his mane and curveting in the pride of his strength and beauty.

Its rider who held the rein so gracefully must be young Philip, the mill owner's son; he had just finished college, they said. So that was the young man Bertha Ellingsworth was engaged to; not ill looking, and he rode well. The girl smiled to herself. "But Bertha Ellingsworth had not seen Curran."

"Did he lift his hat to me?" She looked inquiringly about her. "There is no one else, and his black eyes seemed to know me, too; how odd!" thought the girl, as she walked on more hastily, and the horse and its rider disappeared in a cloud of dust.

"And it seems as if I had seen him somewhere, too."

CHAPTER V.

A RUIN BY MOONLIGHT.

Bertha lay back indolently in her favorite armchair, watching the deepening twilight from her parlor window. Her eyes were almost closed, and Philip, affecting to be interested in Mr. Ellingsworth's conversation, thought he might look at her as fondly as he chose without discovery and rebuke. He was sure he was not noticed, but the girl was quite enjoying his silent offering—so long as he did not guess she perceived it. If a girl must have a lover, Philip did very well. But her lover was no divinity to her; she saw all his faults as clearly as anybody; not with impatience, however; that was not her temperament. For example, he was too short and his shoulders were too slight. She never forgot it for an instant. But then he always did what she said, and that was very convenient, and yet she was half provoked with him for it. A man ought to command a woman's love, not try to coax it from her. He thought quite too much of her for what she returned him; he ought to be stern and cold to her sometimes, and give her a chance to be something besides an ungrateful recipient. But perhaps she would not like him at all in that character. She suddenly opened her eyes wide and looked curiously at her lover; there is nothing so chilling as such a look as that, and Philip winced under it.

"Well, I suppose you two are bursting with tender confidences," smiled Mr. Ellingsworth, as he rose to his feet; "I really won't stay a minute longer." He moved toward the door, then he smiled and looked around; he had thought of something very funny. "Now Philip, my dear boy, you mustn't be too sure of her just because she seems so affectionate. That is where a young man makes his worst mistake. As long as there is another man in the world, he may have hope, that is, the other man."

His daughter looked coolly after him. "Must you go? Why we shall die of ennui. We shall have to take a walk ourselves. Excuse me, Philip, while I get ready."

Left alone, the young man rose and went to the window and looked out at the evening sky. There was a little frown on his face. "What an unpleasant way of talking Bertha's father had. One would think he believed in nothing. There was no danger of his feeling any too sure of her; how far away she seemed to him. The idea of marriage seemed vague and dreamlike, and yet he had her promise."

"You may adjust my shawl for me." His vexation fled, and he smiled with the sweet complacency of possession as he laid the delicate bit of lace about her warm shoulders. To-night would be a good time to turn his idea into reality, and ask her when——

"But you must promise me one thing," she said, standing close to him for one moment.

"What is that, Bertha, dear?" he asked with guilty uneasiness.

She put her soft white hand in his so charmingly that he was suddenly sure it could be nothing hard she would require.

"I promise," he assented.

"No love making in the ruin, if I let you take me there."

"Why, Bertha!" he exclaimed so sorrowfully that he showed his whole plan. The girl laughed.

"You are too cunning by half, Mr. Philip, but then you know love making in the saw mill is too common. Why, it is the rendezvous of all the factory hands. No, I couldn't think of it for a moment."

"Then I won't insist on taking you to the old saw mill."

"Oh, yes! it is charming by moonlight."

"One would think you hadn't any heart." Philip did not confess the peculiar charm this woman's very coldness had for him; there was some quality in it that was irresistibly exciting to his nature. Perhaps it was the presence of an unconscious reserve of passion, never yet revealed, that he felt in her, that kept his heart ever warm, and his eyes ever tender for its unveiling.

The round faced servant girl had come up from the kitchen, and stood awkwardly at the door.

"Yes, you may light the gas now, Annie; we are going out." She laid her hand lightly on Philip's arm as they went down the walk. "I must really have a maid. That Annie is too clumsy for me to endure in the parlor or dining room. Oh, yes, I probably have got a heart; some time it will frighten you, perhaps."

They walked slowly along the street, passing the very spot where Tommie Bowler had offered his poor little all to Jane Graves only an hour or two ago. Their feet trod carelessly on the bits of grass the nervous lover had scattered along the path.

"But you haven't told me about the meeting. Did the agitator have auburn curls, as I said? That is the clearest idea I have got of a hero."

As he told her his adventure they reached the ruin and went in. The moonlight poured through the dismantled roof, and made a white track for itself over the uneven floor, leaving the rest of the interior in the shadow. Such as remained of the fallen rafters made convenient beaches for visitors, who might easily enough imagine themselves in some old world ruin. And the young mill owner's son and Bertha, the hem of whose garment had never touched poverty, seated themselves where many a penniless young fellow had wooed some pretty weaver maid to share his destitution, all for love—soon starved out of both their lives.

Philip felt all his last night's enthusiasm coming over him again, as he described the meeting of the hopeless poor and the life of the family that had taken him in. He seemed to be again thrilled with Curran's eloquence as he pictured his noble presence, and tried to repeat his vivid sentences. Was Bertha listening so patiently to him or only idly watching the shadows as they shifted with the moon? He hoped she was touched. She could help him so much to do something for the thousand souls in the mills if there was anything could be done. And then it seemed so sweet to have an earnest thought and hope in common—one more bond to unite them.

"But what can I do, Bertha? It is all so mixed up. Do you suppose my father would listen to me? But if he would, what can I propose? If I tell him the people are poor and unhappy, he knows all that. I can't ask him to divide all his wealth with them; that wouldn't last so many very long, and then he couldn't employ them any more—they would be spoiled for work, and we would all starve together."

"I wish I could see him," said the girl slowly.

He looked at her blankly.

"Why?"

Suddenly a double tread of feet without, and the forms of two men, one much taller than the other, blocked the doorway.

"Hush, then," whispered Philip excitedly. "There he stands."

The men came forward till they stood directly in the path of the moonlight, which seemed to clothe them with its silver sheen. No need to tell her which was he; the girl bent eagerly forward and fixed her eyes on the majestic figure that stood with folded arms.

"I am very late," began the shorter man apologetically.

Curran did not reply, and the man went on in a minute more. "What is the news? I want to report your village, you know."

"There is no news. It is the same old story. What is the good of reporting and reporting, and then doing nothing?" The words escaped between his teeth like the staccato tones of a cornet. "I am sick of the word 'wait;' it is the resource of the weak."

"But we are weak. Give us time."

"The injustice has got its growth; it has fattened on our flesh and blood, and sucked out the life of untold generations before us." His eyes shone fiercely on the man of caution. "I believe the time has come to destroy it, and the crime of murder lies at our consciences for every crushed soul sacrificed for our delay."

Philip fancied Bertha trembled.

"But," began the stranger, in the metallic voice of the objector, "the officers of the league think the laborers are not ready."

"No, nor will they ever be; they have submitted too long. But they are always good for action if somebody will lead them. They hang on our lips, but we do not speak."

"Yes, we are spreading intelligence, sending out orators like you; we are arranging political campaigns. By and by capital will be more reasonable."

"Do you fancy then," retorted Curran, bitterly, "that the rich will willingly open their coffers to the logical workman, out of whose earnings they have filled them? Isn't it too delightful to be able to build a palace for a home, and create another paradise for a garden; to marry off their sons and daughters when the first coo of love trembles on their young lips? Then will they divide," and he raised his voice with terrible emphasis, "when there is no escape from it. As long as the people submit, if it be till the trump of doom, so long the lords and masters will defraud them of the price of their labor: so long their wives and daughters will look down complacently on the sufferings of the million, one of whom starves for every piece of finery they smile to wear."

Philip felt Bertha tremble again, but her eyes never once wavered.

"What do you propose?"

"I don't know," muttered Curran, turning his head half away, "but when I see the silent raging in the hearts of the poor, when I see the riches squeezed out of their scant, ill fed blood, I am mad with impatience. But I suppose all great changes come most beneficently if they are slow. Then there are no heart sickening reactions. Come out into the open air. It seems close here."

The two men went out and the indistinct murmur of their voices was all that could be heard.

"How do you like my hero?" said Philip, pleased that Bertha should have a chance to learn from the same source whence he had been so stirred. Now, she could sympathize perfectly with him, in the new idea that he felt must have such a great influence over his life.

"He is coming back," she whispered breathlessly, "alone."

Curran looked in astonishment at two figures starting toward him out of the shadows. He recognized them at once.

"Well, I hope you may have learned some useful truths," he said scornfully, looking the young man full in the face.

Bertha's lip quivered, and she came close to him in the moonlight and laid her white hand on his arm. "We did not mean to overhear your secrets," she said earnestly; "but surely it could do no harm to listen to such beautiful words. They see not to be wasted on the one you meant them for."

"We did not mean to overhear your secrets."

Philip looked at Bertha in startled surprise; he hardly knew her; then he glanced at Curran, whose curled lip softened its stern lines. The girl's bonnet had fallen back on her neck, and her face was turned up toward his in the perfection of graceful entreaty, her big blue eyes showing dark in the evening. The agitator glanced at her sparkling diamonds, and the rich lace shawl that lay over her shoulders, then back into the beautiful upturned face, and at last his eyes fell before hers. His boldness was gone; his scorn and contempt for the women of the rich changed to timidity before her.

"Don't distress yourself, my dear lady," he said at last; "there is no harm done, I am sure."

As his tense mood relaxed, the charm that had so transformed the girl seemed broken, and she drew back as if in surprise at finding herself so near him.

The walk home was a silent one, till almost the end.

"Do you know what I am going to do to-morrow, Bertha? I am going to put on the old clothes again."

"Don't you think it rather boyish?"

"I'm in earnest this time. I am going to learn how to make cloth, and find out just how hard the work is, and just how—why Bertha, are you yawning?"

They had reached the doorway. She looked very sweet, even when smothering a yawn with her two fingers, as she stood on the step above him, and gazed off on the river. His foolish heart began to beat.

"Bertha, we are not at the saw mill now, and"——

She smiled. "But you were not to say anything if I let you take me there, and I have let you, haven't I?"

"But aren't you ever going to consent to"——

"There," she stamped her foot playfully. "You are almost breaking your promise;" then she looked at his reproachful face and let him take her hand and kiss it. "You know there is a sort of solemnity in the kind of business like talk you want so much. But I'll promise this: if you will be patient for just one month, you can say what you please to me."

Philip went off in great glee, and his horse Joe could not leap too high to suit him, for what Bertha had said was almost what he asked. One month from today—that would be a Friday early in the morning.

TWO LUCKY MEN.

Having been asked many times regarding my fortunate investment in the Louisiana State Lottery, I do not object to making a statement concerning it, said A. Keller, as our reporter asked for a statement. Some time since I was a member of a club for one month and sent a couple of dollars to the Louisiana State Lottery, but without drawing any prize. This time I sent one dollar in my own name, and received one-twentieth of ticket No. 34,281 in return. This ticket drew the third capital prize of $50,000. I sent my ticket for collection and within five days I received a draft on the Bank of Commerce, at St. Louis for $2,500. I have not used the money yet. I am well pleased with my investment of one dollar. Of course I was delighted. I have determined to invest this money in real estate, and hope to double it by another fortunate investment. The Lottery company certainly dealt fairly with me, and I shall patronize them again.—Lamar (Mo.) Democrat, June 13.

Shortly before the May drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, John Shultz, a driver of a slop wagon, purchased one-twentieth of ticket No. 38,847, which drew on May 14th, $100,000. The ticket was placed with the Salina National bank on May 20th for collection, and on May 31, the bank paid to Shultz $5,000. He has been in the habit of investing each month for some time past, and at last has realized his dream of years.

A beautiful 80-acre farm, well stocked will soon be in the possession of Jno. Shultz, the slop wagon driver, as he stated to a Republican representative that he was now negotiating to exchange his $5,000 for a home in his old age.—Salina (Kas.) Republican, June 6.

THAT CANTANKEROUS OLD WOMAN

Described in the nursery ballad, who "lived upon nothing but victuals and drink," and yet, "would never be quiet," was undoubtedly troubled with chronic indigestion. Her victuals, like those of many other elderly persons whose digestive powers have become impaired, didn't agree with her. This was before the era of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters; or some one of her numerous friends and relatives would undoubtedly have persuaded her to try the great specific for dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. This would have been a measure of self-protection on their part, for she would soon have been cured and ceased to disturb them with her clamor. The most obstinate cases of indigestion, with its attendant heartburn, flatulence, constant uneasiness of the stomach and of the nerves, are completely overcome by this sovereign remedy. Chills and fever and bilious remittent, rheumatism and kidney troubles are also relieved by it.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE CURED.

About two years ago our daughter had congestion of the kidneys, which developed into Bright's Disease. Her body was swollen to an enormous size—measuring 43 inches around the waist, and 18 inches below the knee. After physicians had given up her case, I determined to have her try Dr. Kennedy's "Favorite Remedy," of Rondout, N. Y. Gradually the swelling was reduced from 43 to 29 inches. She began to gain Strength, and was able to walk without fatigue. We do not know how to express our gratitude for what it has done for our child. We are confident the Favorite Remedy will do all that is claimed for it—Surely God has blessed it in this case, and we earnestly recommend it to all suffering from kidney disorders.—S. D. CRAMPS OF THE MUSCLES CURED.

John I. Wood, of Stratford, Ont., was cured of cramps in the legs by wearing Allcock's Porous Plasters. Mr. Wood says:

"Some three months ago I was taken very sick with severe pain in the small of my back over the kidneys. The pain was excruciating. I applied an Allcock's Porous Plaster over the affected region and had relief almost within an hour. At the same time, in conjunction with this trouble, I had very great nervous disturbance, affecting my legs with cramps so I could scarcely sleep. Meeting with such success with my back I applied a plaster under the knee on each leg, and in three days was completely cured, and have never been troubled in either way since."

BUYING A DIAMOND.

A GLOBE TROTTER'S EXPERIENCE WITH A LOVE OF A RING.

He Knew the Real from the Paste Article, and His Ardor Was Only Fanned by the Warnings He Received—A Bunco Game at Colombo and Its Cost.

It was at Colombo that we met him. He was the beau ideal of a rich young globe trotter. We used to see him in the deep verandas of the Galle Face and Oriental hotels, surrounded by the best gem dealers, bargaining and buying at—for them—an exhilarating rate. He had bought rubies, he had bought sapphires, the best pearls and the finest cats-eyes to be obtained for love or money, and still his money seemed abundant. He was a gentlemanly fellow, for all that, and did not parade his wealth intentionally. Stones had a fascination for him.

THE FIRST ACT.

After dinner he proposed a game of billiards or pool. In the only room in which play was not going on was a gentleman whom we recognized as one of the Australian passengers. There being three, he was asked to join in one game, to which he consented. Upon the first stroke he made I could not help noticing two things—first that he handled his cue in quite an enviable manner, and that he had upon the third finger of his left hand the very finest diamond ring I had ever set eyes on. The stone seemed as large as a small nut, and the flashes of light it reflected from the gas jets over the table were dazzling. The attention of our friend, it was easy to see, was riveted upon this ring, which his eyes followed round the table. The Australian passenger seemed a very pleasant man, and soon we all became more friendly.

"What a lovely ring that is you are wearing. Would you allow me to see it?" said our young friend, presently.

"Oh, with pleasure, but I am ashamed to tell you it is only paste," said its owner, slipping it off his finger and allowing us all to look at it.

It is needless to say whose fingers soon held it, while his eyes seemed to reflect the brilliancy of the stone.

"Nonsense, man," said he, pleasantly, "I know something about diamonds, and don't know when I've seen such a perfect one."

"Ah, that stone has deceived even jewelers by artificial light. I only wish it were a real diamond, for it would be worth about six hundred pounds."

"It is worth every penny of it," said the other, enthusiastically. "How did you come by it, if it's not an impertinent question to ask?"

"It was left me by my aunt," said the owner. "She knew it was only paste, although she always wore it, and I was very fond of the old lady, so I wear it, too."

"Will you let me see it in the morning?" said our friend, handing the ring back with lingering interest.

"Certainly. We will have a return match, gentlemen, before tiffin if you are agreeable, as I must be off to the steamer now to bring some more of my kit ashore."

We all said good night and parted, each one of us thinking a good deal about the beautiful ring. After breakfast the next day S—— and I drove over from the club to the hotel, where we had promised to "tiffin" with young "Golconda," as we called him. He was there with a bevy of native "tumbies" around him, displaying very inferior gems, which he refused to look at.

SECOND AND LAST ACT.

The Australian passenger soon strolled up, and asked my companion if he was disposed for a return match at billiards. These two had seen each other before breakfast, and young "Golconda" had backed his opinion of the diamond ring to the extent of offering four thousand rupees for it. During the game he renewed his offer, but the other said he did not wish to sell the ring at all, and especially as a real diamond, knowing well that the stone was paste.

"Will you lend me the ring then, and allow me to show it to a native jeweler with whom I have been dealing? If he recognizes the stone as a diamond, too, I will repeat my offer, and also will give you an open check on the bank for the amount before closing time this evening." "Look here, gentlemen," said the Australian, "of course I'll sell the stone for that, if any one can be so rash as to buy it at that price; but, you see, mine will be an awkward position. I know the stone to be paste, so I cannot and will not sell it as a diamond. If you, sir," turning to the would be purchaser, "will give me in writing a statement to the effect that you buy the ring as a paste, all well and good; but I warn you honestly you will find that you are deceived in imagining this to be a diamond."

Young Golconda took the ring to his native connoisseur, who in a moment pronounced it to be a diamond; he also went to a European store and showed it to the proprietor. This man, after testing it, said that not only was it a diamond, but that he would himself give 4,500 rupees for it.

The bargain was struck, the requisite statement signed, and the check given, all in the presence of the native jeweler, S——, the Australian and myself; and young Golconda sat all through tiffin with the ring upon his finger. He asked us the next day to come round with him shopping, and among others we visited the store proprietor who had tested the ring. Again the man looked at it, took it to the light, shaded it from the light with one hand, again he called for a file, touched it lightly, and said at once:

"Sir, you've been done; this isn't the stone you brought me yesterday—this is paste."

And paste it was! Somehow the ring had been changed, although we none of us remembered seeing it touched by the hands of the clever swindler who had sold it. And yet he had done it. The ring had lain on the billiard table during the signing of the paper. The purchaser had paid 4,000 rupees for a ring "knowing the stone to be paste."

The Australian had taken ship, undetached from his lovely diamond, but not before young Golconda's check had been carefully cashed.—Leisure Hours.

Idle Hands.

There is one lofty place in this progressive city where the expression, tempus fugit, finds no application whatever. The clock of Trinity Episcopal church has pointed out the same time for two years. Above it the sun and stars and moon and planets and clouds pass; below it the life of a large city goes and comes ceaselessly. But that clock is supreme in its motionless fixity, satisfied that, for the fraction of a second, every twelve hours it indicates the correct time by virtue of its immobility. Of this clock it may be said in exoneration that it is a refutation of the adage that Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do. Here are two idle hands that work no active mischief. They also passively show that they are not permitted to fulfill the purpose for which they were created. Trinity's pulpit and Trinity's clock are at variance. The one reminds men of the uncertainty of life, of the swift passing away of this brief existence; the other calmly, stolidly shows that time flies not, that it is 9 o'clock yesterday, today and forever. So why should mortals worry about a future when it is perpetually the present?—Pittsburg Bulletin.

AN ESSAY BY A KING.

One autumn morning, as the sun had just lifted its golden orb above the horizon, without, however, its rays having as yet warmed the cold air, I beheld standing by the roadside some birch trees, already covered with yellow leaves. Their day was drawing to a close; their life of bloom, though brief, had been a lovely one, a life passed in the glorious nature in the north.

When the rays of the vernal sun had melted snow and ice, when unchained rivulets prattled pleasantly, and the lark struck its notes in the azure sky, tender buds had come forth from the cold branches and twigs, the buds became leaves; they throve in the balmy spring breezes.

The young trees clad themselves in the green color of hope. So long as summer, the golden tressed goddess, ruled in the north, they enjoyed their own blooming loveliness. In innocence and simplicity they caressed each other, and offered a delicious shade to the wanderer fatigued by the fierce sun.

Now, when summer—the too brief one of the north—has fled, behold! with what humility they bear their fate and shed the treasures of their crown.

In their decadence, in their misfortune, they stand yonder as if none the less admiring the silent morning hour. They seem as if speaking to the traveler, who hastens by to his daily calling after his Sunday rest. And they awaken in him wonder, and call forth thoughts that are less of this world.

Brother! Man has also his spring, his summer and his autumn. Spring is his youth, summer his manhood and autumn his old age. But in the heyday of man's springtide there may be autumn; in his autumntide a gleam of dawning spring.

Sorrow may change morn into eve, spring into autumn. The tree of life struck by the storm raises itself again with difficulty, or requires, at all events, time to do so. It might, indeed, be an impossibility but for Samaritans ready to give a helping hand. Even the solitary desert palm may be shaken by the sirocco till it falls, be it ever so tall and strong.

But in the depth of autumn there may, God be praised! also be spring. Behold the charming birch trees in the grove yonder! They are going to rest through the long winter night, contented with their summer life, for they hope that when winter has exhausted its fury a still more glorious sun and a more enchanting song than the howling autumn storms shall summon them to a new life, to fresh joys! And such is their existence, an unbroken chain of births and deaths.

And we? We, who are often ungrateful when the world goes against us—we, who grumble and rebel against the wise dictates of Providence and in self conceit wish to build up a world ourselves, which we imagine would be a better one—what ought we to remember?

Is not the promise sown in our hearts of resurrection and spring, after the autumn of life and the grave of winter? Is it not surer and more blessed than that of any other creature in the realm of nature?

Have we not been endowed with the gift of living in sympathy here below and of walking together along the road of life in love and friendship? And is not this gift a greater treasure than all those which the man of pleasure deems priceless?

Why do we, then, despair? The spring following upon our winter's grave will not depart from us, for it is eternal. Far more glorious is it than an earthly spring. The sun is God, and we are angels therein.

Should we believe that friendship formed here below shall also follow us thither? Why should we not believe that it shall become even stronger than here?

Aye, friendship, which has united mankind through all ages, in which they have lived, labored and struggled to reach the same goal, although by different roads—that friendship will certainly remain with us when the haven is reached, and it shall, on a brighter spring morn, and to a more glorious spring chant, follow us into the eternal spring, and be the most cherished and joyful recollection of our past life on earth—of a chilly autumntide!

Early Objection to Coal.

The discussion of the probability of there being a deposit of coal in the Thames valley and under the city of London, of which there seems to be considerable evidence, recalls some interesting facts connected with its earliest use in that city. When coal was first introduced into London as a fuel very serious objection was taken to its use. It appears that in the beginning of the Fourteenth century brewers and smiths of the city, finding the high prices of wood pressing hard upon their returns, resolved to make some experiments with coal, but immediately an outcry was raised against them by persons living near the breweries and forges; the king was petitioned and a law was passed prohibiting the burning of coal within the city. Those who tried it, however, found the new fuel to be so much superior to wood that they persisted in its use. But so determined was the government to suppress what was regarded as an intolerable nuisance that a law was passed making the burning of coal in London a capital offense, and it is recorded that one man at least was executed under that law.

It would appear that the ladies were most bitterly opposed to the use of coal for domestic purposes. They considered the smoke to be ruinous to their complexions, and would not attend parties at houses at which the objectionable fuel was used. Some persons went to the length of refusing to eat food of any kind that had been cooked on a coal fire.—Hardware Trade Journal (England).

Indorsed Sawyer's Check.

Senator Sawyer tells a very good story on himself. There was a man up in the Oshkosh country, named Ben Hutchinson, who was a great boaster. If he cut one log he was sure to report a hundred. One season he did some logging for Mr. Sawyer, and for his pay received a check on the National Bank of Oshkosh for $120, payable to his order. Mr. Hutchinson had never had such an experience before, and he showed the check to his friends with a great deal of unction before he took it to the bank to get it cashed. When he did so the teller, of course, made him write his name on the back of the paper, and that was an incident of still greater importance in Mr. Hutchinson's life. When he went to his home up in the woods he said to everybody that he met on the way:

"Old Sawyer can brag as much as he's a mind to about his money, but the bank made me indorse his check before they would cash it."—Chicago News.

Privileges of a Royal Baby.

The king of Spain has fallen out of his high chair and taken the skin off his royal nose, has he? He may thank his stars that he is not a year or two older and can do such things without having dispatches sent to this country saying: "First, that he was in a state of beastly intoxication; second, that he had been fighting the tiger all night; third, that he was knocked out of the chair by the indignant father of Donna Sangreazul." Fall out of chairs while you are young, Alfonso, for when you are older you cannot without arousing the gentlemen who live by twisting the British lion's tail and plucking the feathers of all the imperial and royal eagles.—Boston Transcript.

PLUNKETT ON WIMIN.

LOVE OF DRESS OFFSET BY SACRIFICE IN TROUBLOUS TIMES.

How Fashions Changed and Were Followed—The Women of Richmond During the Battle of Seven Pines—How Their "Goodness" Was Shown.

"A girl will suffer agonies and smile all the time just to be in the fashion," said Plunkett, as he took his seat and stuffed the tobacco in his pipe.

"In their courting days," ventured Brown.

"They will draw their corset strings so tight that they pant like a lizard and er fellow can span erround em, and they will force a number four shoe on a number seven foot and skip erround as frisky as er lamb, while they are suffering agonies that would put any man in the hospital."

"In their courting days," said Brown.

"TOTING" LOADS OF DRY GOODS.

"I can remember," said Plunkett, "when it was the fashion to be pale and sickly looking, and the girls would poultice their faces and hands with meal dough to bleach 'em, and they'd be so fincky that they'd eat a pea in two for a mouthful and swear they had a bate when they had only eat a half biscuit. And then pretty soon the craze got on the red order, and the poke berries were gathered and rubbed on their faces, and when they'd get hot and perspire the pokeberry juice would streak 'em up the same as an Indian, but it was the fashion, and whatever is fashion is right."

"If it's some other fellow's sister," suggested Brown.

"One time," resumed Plunkett, "they had a fashion to look slim and bean polelike, without any bumps on theirselves, and six yards of calico would make any of 'em a dress, and then ergin they took a craze to be fat and chuffy, with big bumps on theirselves, and then it took a good sized dry goods store to furnish cloth enough to dress one of 'em, and the cotton they used to make the bumps would fill a good sized hamper basket; I've seed little puny wimin tote enough dry goods on their selves to weigh down a strapping fellow.

"I know that war's er bad, bad thing," resumed Plunkett, after a short pause, "but when I call to mind the simple ways of our Georgia wimin in them hard days I feel like the country was blessed by its coming, for we would never have learned their goodness in times of peace.

"The pretty bonnets that were made from the scraps of the worn out dress of peaceful days sheltered faces free from foibles, and the homespun garments covered forms unwarped by the strains of fashion. They dressed in tears and moved as in the presence of death, as pure as angels and as self-sacrificing as the men who fought their battles."

"You're right," said Brown.

"Speaking erbout the wimin in the war," said Plunkett, as he scratched his head and knocked the ashes from his pipe, "makes me think of the day that the Seven Pines battle was fought in front of Richmond. I was there that day, and it was the hottest weather I'd ever seed. Two of the finest armies that ever stood facing of each other were there—McClellan and Joseph E. Johnston. The Yankees could see the flags waving on the capitol of the Confederacy, and it was understood that it was going to be the day that would decide the fate of Richmond and of the Confederates.

HOW BANDAGES WERE MADE.

"As soon as the first streaks of day broke in the east it was saluted by the boom, boom, boom of the big guns captured at Manassas—called Sherman's battery. There were two guns in that battery called Long Tom and Laughing Charlie. They had a queer ring to their boom, and it was these guns that saluted the day as it peeped up over the hills and announced ready for the Confederates.

"Richmond began to stir. The wimin and children lit outen bed, the bells began to ring and the whistles to blow and the people flocked to Main street till there was not standing room on the walks. The fight had commenced, the big guns were roaring and the little guns were like a fire in a cane brake. Trains rolled in from Petersburg and Lynchburg with re-enforcements. They lit from the cars and started at a double quick down Main street and out to the fight. Knapsacks begin to be thrown to the right and the left, and the gutters were filled. Wimin and children went to piling them up and stood guard over them, but it was no use, they were never called for, and it was mighty few that unslung their knapsacks on Main street that day that lived to see the end.

"As the day advanced the hotter it grew. Every vehicle in the city was pressed into service to go for the wounded, and as they rolled in the cry for 'water, water, water,' was heard everywhere.

"The wimin of Richmond were the first to discover what was needed. Every bucket and dipper was pressed, and the old men and children went in a run to and from the water plugs, while the wimin went for provisions. Tubs and buckets were placed all along the curbstones on each side of the street filled with water, and baskets were held by the wimin, and each soldier was given a sandwich as they double quicked down the line.

"The wounded were coming in by thousands. The news spread that Joseph E. Johnston was shot and Lee had took command. The doctors were out of bandages, and the wimin tore their underclothing and sheets into strips to bind up the wounds.

"This young generation are the sons and daughters of such wimin as these. As it was then so it will be ergin, I reckon, so let 'em rip. But it does make me mad to see 'em fools erbout the fashion."—Atlanta Constitution.

Indian Moccasins.

The shoes or moccasins worn by the North American Indians are nearly all alike in their general structure. The moccasin, a slipper made of soft deer skin, without a heel, is common to nearly all of them. Many of them have leggings either detached or connected with the moccasin or shoe so as to form a boot.

Some of the Indians ornament their moccasins with beads, quills or embroidery. Among the southern Indians, where no protection is needed from the cold, a shoe is made consisting simply of a sole of thick hide bound on the feet by thongs.

Among the Apaches an odd attachment is found on the boots or moccasins. This is a little projection of the sole in front of the toes, generally made in the shape of a little round pad. This is called a cactus crusher and has its purpose. When the Indian walks through growths of prickly cactus the crusher beats down the prickers in front of his foot. Some shoes of odd form, with elongated heels and toes, are used among the Navajos and other southern tribes in their dances and ceremonies.—Washington Star.

It Makes a Difference.

It is told of the present czarewitch that one day, reading "The Lady of the Lake," he came to the line, "Long live the commons' king, King James!" and exclaimed, with sparkling eyes: "Yes, the kind of the common people! That is the only king of a king that I would care to be." His father used to make such remarks, too, before he came to the throne not since.—San Francisco Argonaut.

"What's the matter with you?" asked Sergeant Bendall yesterday as Carl Dunder entered the Woodbridge Street station with a grin on his face.

"May pe I vhas green like some grass, eh?" chuckeled the old man in reply.

"I have often said so."

"Und I doan' come in der house vhen he rains, may pe?"

"Well, what is it?"

"I beat a schwindler py his own game—ha! ha! ha!"

"It isn't possible."

Alabama's Natural Bridge.

High up in the crest of the mountains on the Birmingham, Sheffield & Tennessee railroad there is to be found one of Nature's wonders. It is a natural bridge, as complete, as perfect, as symmetrical, and in some essentials more remarkable than the great natural bridge of Virginia. The bridge lies between the stations of Lynn and Delmar. It is about fifty-eight miles from Sheffield and twenty-nine miles from Jasper. Its length from abutment to abutment is one hundred and seventy-five feet. Its width is twenty-five feet, and the thickness ranges from four to six feet. It is of pure sandstone, and has no doubt stood the climatic changes of ages. Leaning over the bridge you see in the ravine which it spans, some sixty-five feet below, the shimmer and sparkle of many springs of clear limpid water which bubble from the sandstone soil, and, joining, flow down the ravine. A singular feature is a subdivision or smaller bridge, constructed on the same pattern, perhaps even more perfect in its outlines, which leads from one side of the bridge proper.—North Alabamian.

LOVE AND DUTY.

"O lassie, ere the bugle call
Shall summon us to part,
Accept a soldier's love, and cheer
A Highland laddie's heart;
For I have brought from sunny climes,
Across the distant sea,
This costly scarf of Indian silk
To pledge my love to thee."

"I cannot seal our plighted troth,"
The maiden coyly said,
"Till I have proved thy love to-night,
I may not with thee wed.
To-morrow is St. Andrew's day,
And where thy banners wave
My sire was slain, and I must plant
A flower upon his grave."

The church bell chimed the midnight hour
As, through the falling snow,
A soldier kept his lonely watch
With measured steps and slow;
But 'mid the gloom a maiden sped,
In secret, hurried flight;
She waved her lover's scarf, and passed
Unchallenged through the night.

At daybreak in the snow were traced
Strange footprints where she stept,
And through the camp a murmur ran,
"Some traitor guard has slept."
At night another soldier's grave
Was measured in the snow;
For love's sweet sake his duty failed,
Yet love would have it so.

Stalking the Emu.

Mr. Powell gives an interesting account of how the natives of Australia hunt the emus of that land. The method is ingenious, but it sometimes exposes the sportsman to the risk of himself being hunted in turn.

A black, on spying emus feeding on the plain, will cover his back and head with an emu skin, allowing it to hang down well on the side towards the unsuspecting birds. In his right hand he will carry, hidden by the skin, a boomerang and one or two throwing sticks or "waddies." Then his left arm will protrude beyond the skin straight out to the elbow, and the forearm will be bent up, with the hand at right angles to it, thereby making a capital imitation of an emu's head and neck.

Now and then this hand or head will be brought to the ground as if for feeding; and as the black walks along, he imitates every motion of the bird, whilst at the same time, by means of the big toe, he drags a spear along the ground.

A friend of mine was once riding across one of the vast plains in Queensland. As he and his companions were just rising a ridge, and as their eyes cleared the summit, they saw one of the very wild blacks of the district walking quietly along toward a small scrub in the middle of the open. They pulled up to see what he would do; his sharp eyes, however, soon detected the white men, though their heads only were visible to him, and he dashed into the scrub.

Almost immediately from the opposite side of the scrub darted out what to them appeared to be an emu, driven out by the entrance of the black, so they gave chase, but quickly discovered it to be only the black, acting emu, and never expecting that the white men would give chase to what was in those parts a very common bird.—Youth's Companion.

Interesting Ruins Around Delhi.

The Kotub Minar is a magnificent pillar of red sandstone, the largest in the world, being 238 feet in height. It is situated eleven miles from Delhi among a pile of ruins, including those of a Hindoo temple and palaces. Here is an iron pillar twenty-two feet long which one of the former kings is said to have placed there to keep an imaginary serpent pinned to the earth. After a number of years he had it taken up, and, sure enough, the base was found clotted with blood. He at once restored it to its place, where it has remained until the present day. In these ruined halls some beautiful bits of sculpture are discovered which would delight the antiquarian and artist. On the way back to the city numerous tombs are visited, among them those of Krushroo, the author, so the natives allege, of the "Arabian Nights," and that of Jehanara, the daughter of the queen, to whose memory the finest monument in the world is erected, the Taj at Agra. Both of these tombs are plain in comparison with others, but the marble screens which surround them are as beautiful as one would wish to see, that delicate tracery work, which seems to belong to India only, being most prominent.—Delhi Letter.

Poisons as Stimulants.

Every virulent poison known to botany or chemistry, says Dr. Felix L. Oswald, can be used for purposes of stimulation. The Yakoots of northern Siberia fuddle with poisonous toadstools, the Syrian mountaineers with arsenic, the miners of the Peruvian Andes with verdigris, the Chinese and Turks with opium, the Syrians with a decoction of hemp seed, the Malays with the acrid juice of the betel nut. In a few starving villages of Dalmatia, foxglove leaves (digitalis) are used for intoxication purpose. The great preference for alcohol for centuries—and even since the first dawn of historic tradition—may be explained by the fact that it is by far the most universally accessible of the virulent stimulants, rather than by any attractiveness of its taste, or by hereditary desires. Even the drunkard's children, contrary to common belief, are nauseated by the first taste of fermented or distilled liquors.—New York Telegram.

Causes Baldness.

One great cause of baldness is the habit some people have of changing the style of hair cutting half a dozen times a year, or nearly as often. They insist on the "short pompadour" in the hottest months, a less pronounced crop in the fall, and then wear their hair longer as the weather gets colder, gradually approaching a shave again by the time the thermometer gets up in the nineties. Now all this may be very comfortable, but it is very bad for the hair and scalp. It is best to wear the hair short all the year round, brush it freely and trust to nature for the only really effective substitute for pomade.—Barber in Globe-Democrat.

A Collection of Horseshoes.

Miss Libbey, author of "Miss Middleton's Lover," may be seen almost any day riding in Prospect park, Brooklyn, and she has at least eighteen horseshoes, which she has picked up at various times, in her room in Putnam avenue. One of them she prizes more highly than all the rest. It stands on an ebony easel, and attached to it, by a crimson silk bow, is a card bearing the words:

"Maud S.'s shoe. Presented to Miss Laura Jean Libbey with compliments of Robert Bonner, New York, Sept., 1887."—New York Herald.

HAVING THE EVIL EYE.

One of the Most Familiar Superstitions Among the Italians.

Shortly after his election Pius IX. who was then adored by the Romans and perhaps the best loved man in Italy, was driving through the streets when he happened to glance upward at an open window at which a nurse was standing with a child. A few minutes afterward the nurse let the child drop and it was killed. No one thought the Pope had wished this, but the fancy that he had the evil eye became universal and lasted till his death. In Carniola, if you tell a mother her baby is strong and large for its age, a farmer that his crops are looking well, or a coachman that his team is good, all three will spit at your feet to avert the omen and, if you understand the custom, you will do the same as an act of politeness. A person who wandered through Upper Carniola and praised every thing he saw would soon come to be considered the most malevolent of men. In Naples the same feeling exists. The terms of endearment which mothers of the lower class use to their children and the pet names they call them by are often so indecent that it would be impossible to reproduce them in English, and always so contemptuous that they would be offensive in any other relation.

The well-known habit of Neapolitans to offer a guest any thing he may praise has probably the same origin. It is, of course, now to a very large extent only a form of courtesy; but even now another feeling lurks behind, at least in a good many cases. Your host has been delighted at your admiration of his possessions; he would have been disappointed if it had not been so warmly expressed as it was; but still he is a little afraid of the ill luck the kind things you have said may bring. By offering the objects you have liked best to you, and receiving your certain refusal to accept them, he puts them in a bad light, and thus counteracts the evil effects of your praise. He says to fate, you see their value is not great after all.

This superstition, however, is by no means confined to Naples or Italy; it is said to be common in China and Japan, and among negroes and red Indians. Even in England it is unknown. In fact, in all countries when visiting a sick acquaintance it is better to say: "I am glad to hear you are a little better to-day," than "I am glad to see you looking so much better." Nor is the belief by any means confined to the lower classes. A person who is highly educated, very intelligent, and by no means prejudiced in religious matters, was once asked whether the words acted as an evil charm or whether they merely foretold evil. The reply was: "I don't know; but I do know from experience that whenever any body tells me I am looking well I fall ill within three days; and the more intimate I am with the person that says it the worse the illness is." There may be a connection between this superstition and that of the evil eye—we are inclined to think there is—but they must not be confounded, as one is often found in districts where the other is unknown.—Saturday Review.

THAT SOUP PHRASE.

Fortunately It Is Gradually Losing Its Hold on the Public.

The reasons why we do not and never have indorsed the phrase "He fell in the soup" are manifold. When it first came into general use it was harsh and grating, and now that it has become old, rheumatic and moss-covered, it is positively, diobolical in its discordancy. "Fell in the soup" was primarily intended to convey the meaning to the auditor or auditors that a man or a woman, or a collection of men and women, had in some way become downed, or more elegantly speaking, been compeled through force of circumstances or events to acknowledge the corn. While this was undoubtedly the object of the phrase, it has manifestly failed in reaching the goal of its intentions. It is not graphic, and that is absolutely essential to any real claim to the public consideration. There have been so-called improvements suggested such as "he fell in the consomme," "in the mulliga-tawny," and "stumbled into the tureen," but none of these are one iota better than the original. In some unaccountable manner, however, the phrase came into quite general use, but most assuredly not through any real worth of its own, but because of the peculiar fancies of the American people. In the first place it is important that a phase should be so constructed and composed as to instantly convey to the uninitiated the idea intended to be expressed. "In the soup" fails manifestly in this regard, especially when addressed to an individual ignorant of the idioms of speech of our country. How many people would understand by "in the soup" that a person had failed in his undertaking? None, unless they had previous acquaintance with this combination of very uneuphonious words. We are glad to note that this really obnoxious phase is gradually losing its hold on the public, and our sincerest hope is that "in the soup" will fall so deeply into the bouillon as to become tangled in the vegetables and unable to clamber over the side of the tureen.—Minneapolis Tribune.

—Several Caro (Mich.) gentlemen recently saw a large rat carry a hen's egg on its back. They say that it twisted its tail around the egg and carried it safely until it was hit with a stone.

ABOUT SHYING HORSES.

Careful Driving the Best and Only Reliable Cure.

A horse that after shying reassures himself and makes no effort to get away, but calms down as soon as he perceives that he was falsely alarmed, is pretty certain to make a safe beast. Horses can be cured of shying only by the experience which they gain when carefully driven. The practice of flogging after the event, besides being cruel, is an extremely unwise one. But if the animal can not be induced by coaxing to pass a particular object, the whip must be used. When your steed stops from fright and refuses to go on, it is a good plan to speak reassuringly to him and at the same time tap him gently with the whip as a reminder that there is power behind him which he must obey. I believe that some horses never shy, but such a one is rare indeed. It was only the other day, however, that I was told, and on good authority, of a four-year old colt that showed no fear of a train of cars in motion the first time that he saw them, and I have myself, on at least two occasions, driven green horses past a pile-driver in action without their being frightened in the slightest degree. These same horses would jump a little when a dog rushed at them suddenly and unexpectedly. Practically, then, it is possible to find a horse which won't shy—that is, an animal so sensitive and discreet that he can be relied upon never to shy dangerously.

I can tell a story which will illustrate my meaning. I was once driving a game and intelligent, but rather snappish chestnut mare. At one point in the journey it was necessary to cross a long covered bridge. For some reason the mare paused at the entrance and was evidently in great alarm, but after a word or two from me she made up her mind to venture across. She laid her ears flat flack upon her head and rushed over the bridge at the fastest trot of which she was capable. Once across, her fears subsided, but so great had it been that she broke out in a profuse sweat. In thus acting the mare showed the very highest courage, and the manner in which she comported herself on this one occasion was a sufficient guaranty of her safety as a driving horse.—Horse Review.

TRIMMING APPLE TREES.

Work That Should Be Done in the Fall Instead of Spring.

I have seen many inquiries in the papers as to the time to trim apple trees. I write, giving my views, which are based upon actual observation and experiment for many years. I would decidedly recommend to trim in the fall during the latter part of October or during the month of November. Now for the reason why. After the season's growth of fruit and wood of the trees has ceased, the bark is firm, and but very little of any sap is in the wood, and a limb cut off at this season will immediately dry over and become seasoned and hard, and the next spring when nature puts forth her efforts to heal the wound, the bark will close over the dry and seasoned part, and no rot to the detriment of the tree will occur, whereas, if trimmed in the spring, the sap will keep the wound wet all summer, and the next summer, and the next. Now for the proof of my last assertion. I have only to step into my neighbor's orchard, which I did only Saturday last, and closely examined the ends of limbs that were cut three years ago this spring, and I found them rotten and wet, to the extent of wetting the bark to a slight degree on the outside of the tree. Some of the smaller limbs are nearly healed over, while those of an inch and a half in diameter will take another season's growth to enclose the rotten stump, which ever must be a detriment to the health and growth of the tree, and I claim, will in some future day be the cause of the death of the tree. In my own orchard where I trimmed in the fall, no such condition of the stump exists; it is hard and dry, and will heal without rot.

My observations for many years have been in accordance with what I have stated and commenced on the "Old Farm," while I was yet in my teens. My father's orchard was nearly all natural fruit in my early days, and bore enormous loads of apples, that frequently would split a limb off from the side of another, in the fall, when the fruit had attained its full size, and the wounded limb would always dry up and not rot, even if it did not heal. I have written thus lengthy to give those who have not been able to give the subject their attention, the benefit of my experience. I would add, don't spoil your young and thrifty-growing orchards by trimming in the spring.—Cor. Farm, Field and Stockman.

In the Romantic Riviera.

Half the enchantment of Italy is gone when we lose sight of the Mediterranean, says a correspondent. It is along the shore of that sapphire sea that the romance and the glamor of Italian landscape are to be found. There are spots between San Remo and Bordighera, between Monte Carlo and Nice, which make the soul ache with their loveliness, saddened almost to despair by an ideal beauty which seems to accentuate the ugliness of life; and it is only with that sea for a foreground of the picture that the light and color of the South can be felt in all their exquisite variety. Rome thrills and vibrates with the spectral past, a city of fountains and phantoms; Florence is a vast repository of art; Venice is a dream of vanished greatness carved in stone and glorified with frescoes that are as vast and wonderful as any dream; but the western Riviera is a happy holiday ground which Heaven has left to mankind out of a long-lost fairyland

Perhaps no better index of the moral tone of a nation can be found than its literature. That is, the reading taken up by the great mass of people to pass their leisure time and, of course, what is most interesting to them. While fashion may serve to bring a certain class of literature into prominence it is the interest of the reader which gives rise to the fashion. To enjoy a book the mind and feeling of the reader must be in sympathy with what is read. It must appeal to a sensibility that the reader is imbued with. When a novel describes situations, passions, desires, emotions that the reader has experienced, it is perused with avidity—devoured. In the latter part of the fourteenth century "Froissart's Chronicles" were written and read with the greatest interest, being a poetic history of the age of chivalry, then at its height. Noble thoughts filled the mind of every youthful aspirant for knighthood and he found congenial sentiments in the "Chronicles." At the time when the Italian, Boccaccio, wrote the "Decamerone" Naples was as noted as now for immorality and the taste of the times was such that the most licentious passages of that forbidden work were written at the request of Queen Joanna. Early in the eighteenth century Fielding wrote "Tom Jones," filled with coarseness but not licentious, which was widely read by the middle classes—country squires, who found in it a portrayal of their own times. A little later was published "Peregrine Pickle," in which Smollett details the intrigues of society and is said to have been paid by Lady Vane for introducing her "peccadilloes" into the work, making it, de facto, an outgrowth of the times and a mirror of public morals. The novel had a great sale. A change in the moral tone appears to have been brought about. "Pamela" and "Clarissa Harlowe" appeared and the productions of Richardson were extolled from the pulpit; purer thoughts and nobler aspirations were engendered in the young and better lives lived by their elders. At the same time Goldsmith wrote "The Vicar of Wakefield," and Johnson, "Rasselas." In 1801 "Castle Rackrent," the first of a series of pure, moral novels was published by Maria Edgeworth, and the style suiting the morals of the time, the authoress became deservedly popular. The efforts of Thackeray and Dickens were directed against old abuses, and their works being the outgrowth of public opinion, they accomplished their ends. "Vanity Fair," "The Virginians," "Barry Lyndon," "Pickwick Papers," "David Copperfield," "Oliver Twist," masterpieces all. In our own country during the first half of the present century Irving charmed the world with the sweetness of his prose, solely the outgrowth of his surroundings, and Hawthorne found multitudes of readers for "Twice Told Tales," "The Marble Faun" and "The Scarlet Letter." Indicating a radical change in the public taste came James, Howells, and others; but what a rapid transit from these to Amelie Rives! The novel reading public was captured by "The Quick or the Dead?" Because it was forbidden? not at all, but because it pandered to the depraved taste that demanded it. Rives did not create the taste; she was but the fungus growth of the corruption of the times. And close on her footsteps come a number of others that dilate upon the basest emotions of humanity and depict them in all their vileness. Laura Daintrey became coarser than her prototype and now a number of similar works are securing such a vast circulation that pure minds must become appalled. A description of the basest passions in all their nakedness is dished up without the pretence of a cloak. "His Private Character," by Albert Ross, is only exceeded in lecherousness by his former novel, "Thou Shalt Not." "Hermia Suydam" has many readers. "A lady from Louisiana" has written "Clip Her Wings, or Let Her Soar," wretched rot and deadly. But probably the worst yet is written by Abi S. Jackman, a young girl of New York. "Fatima, a Dream of Passion," and what a great blessing for the innocent hand into which it may fall had she never awakened to relate such a degrading volume of rot—it is nothing else. Again let it be repeated, all this is the outgrowth of the times. The hot bed of pollution surrounding the young, without the saving guidance and ennobling teaching that comes from God. A great tidal wave of returning morality will strike the people and the vile school owning Amelie Rives for its founder will sink to that perdition where it belongs. It is solely the fault of the people that such works are produced and a proof of the growing atheism of the times. M. G.

LAND MATTERS.

The following circular has been issued by the General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 5th.

REGISTERS AND RECEIVERS:—Gentlemen: Information having reached this Department that parties are endeavoring to make filings on arid lands reserved for reservoirs, irrigating ditches and canals, and for the purpose of controlling the waters of lakes and rivers and their tributaries in the arid regions, I am directed by Hon Secretary of the Interior to call your attention to the Act of Congress approved October 2, 1888, U. S. Statutes at Large, vol. 25, page 526, as follows:

"For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid regions of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. And the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation. And all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States, and shall not be subject after the passage of this Act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law: Provided, that the President at any time in his discretion, by proclamation, may open any portion or all of the lands reserved by this provision to settlement under the homestead laws."

The object sought to be accomplished by the foregoing provision is unmistakeable. The water sources and the arid lands that may be irrigated by the system of National Irrigation are now reserved to be hereafter, when redeemed to agriculture, tranferred to the people of the Territories in which they are situated for homesteads. The act of Congress and common justice require that that they should be faithfully preserved for these declared purposes.

The statutes provide that all lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by the Geological Survey as sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigating purposes, and all lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals are since the passage of said act absolutely reserved from sale as the property of the United States, and shall not be subject after the passage of the act to entry, settlement or occupation until further provided by law, or the President, by proclamation, may open said lands to settlement.

Neither individuals nor corporations have a right to make filings upon land thus reserved, nor can they be permitted to obtain control of the lakes and streams that are susceptible of uses for irrigating purposes.

You will, therefore, immediately cancel all filings made since October 2, 1888, on all such sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigating purposes, and all lands that may be susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, whether made by individuals or corporations, and you will hereafter receive no filings upon any such lands.

This order you will carry into effect without delay. Respectfully,

W. M. STONE,
Acting Commissioner.

The following telegrams on the subject were sent and received:

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,
August 28, 1889.

HON. COMMISSIONER GENERAL LAND OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.—All lands in this district east of the Sierra Nevada Mountains are arid lands and susceptible of irrigation by means of reservoirs, canals, or ditches. Don't know if some have been selected be Geological Survey. Shall we receive any more filings on them?

REGISTER AND RECEIVER.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
August 29, 1889.

REGISTER AND RECEIVER, INDEPENDENCE, CAL.—Filings allowed for land that may be selected as sites for reservoirs, ditches or canals on land susceptible of irrigation thereby will be at the risk of the parties filing, under the act of October 2, 1888, and circular of August 5, 1889.

W. M. STONE,
Acting Commissioner.

Challenge Accepted.

I hereby accept the challenge offered by Marshall Naylor to run "Sidewinder" against "Darby," the conditions being as follows: The race to take place between the hours of 2 and 5 o'clock p. m. of Monday, September 23, 1889, on the race track at Independence, under the management of the 18th Dist. Agricultural Association. Distance, one mile and repeat. Purse, $400—$200 a side. Both horses to carry not less than 118 pounds. Pacific Coast Blood Horse Association rules to govern. I have this day deposited with J. C. Irwin, as stakeholder, the sum of $50 as a forfeit. The party to the agreement failing to deposit the additional sum of $150 with the said stakeholder on or before 12 o'clock m. of Saturday, September 21st, to forfeit $50. Said sum of $50 will remain with J. C. Irwin till September 1st, being ample time for the backers of Sidewinder to make their challenge good. IRV. H. MULHOLLAND.

Independence, August 23, 1889.

The Crop Outlook.

The threshers have been in this vicinity during the past week. In an interview with Mr. W. H. Wells he said that the grain crop would be lighter this year than last although a greater acreage was seeded. He attributes this state of affairs to the unusual heat this season. The grain was ripened before it had fully matured and the heads were not filled out. Mr. Wells says that grain sowed last fall is fully up to an average crop, but very little grain in the valley is so seeded. It has often been argued that winter sown grain is the best, and the observations of Mr. Wells who is a careful man and in a position to judge, bears out the fact. The threshers will finish up here this week and return north.

Death Of Lieutenant-Governor Davis.

Lieutenant-Governor Davis dropped dead at his residence in Carson on Thursday of last week from heart disease. He had been unwell for some months past, and physicians gave as the cause heart troubles. Gov. Davis, or "Hank" as he was familiarly called, was formerly conductor on the Central Pacific road, and was well known and highly respected and liked by a host of Nevada people. He leaves a wife and two children, who are at present in the East, also a sister, Mrs. Mary Fisher, State Librarian at Carson.

"Two of a Kind."

Many old Inyoites will remember Mr. Fred. Smith, the photographer of Bishop. He left this County several years ago and has since been in Nevada. A personal mention in this paper recently of another Fred. Smith, brother of Arthur Smith, has called forth the following letter:

EUREKA NEV., August 19th 1889.

EDITOR INYO INDEPENDENT—Dear Sir:—I had supposed that long ere this the worthy citizens of Independence had forgotten me wholly. But I was aggreeably surprised to notice in the local column of the INDEPENDENT handed me a few days since in Winnemucca by our mutual friend Chas. H. Groves, a notice to the effect that I had returned to Independence the week before after an absence of six years. I am not a drinking man, neither am I absent minded—being married—and to my positive knowledge I have not been in Independence for seveal years. The present Editor of the Eureka Sentinel is a former compositor of the INDEPENDENT, M. G. Foster. During my rambles through Nevada I have met some old time residents of Inyo. Among the number are John Clarke of Bishop Creek and his son Eddie of the same place. I noticed the other day in the Salt Lake Tribune, that Inyo County Nevada was rapidly filling up, etc. Now when did Inyo cross the line and swell the number of Nevada's counties? It must have been quite recent. On account of the drouth this year Nevada is very dull as well as exceedingly dry. From Winnemucca west for a long distance, there is no water running in the Humboldt, and in some districts the water which lodges in the deeper holes along the river bed is entirely gone also, and cattle are dying by the score. Here, just now, it is quite moist, as we had rain almost continually all day Saturday, Saturday night and Sunday. The mining interests have a bright future predicted for them by those who are in positions warranting such predictions. The citizens of Eureka are looking forward anxiously to the sale of the Black Diamond mine of this place, as the forerunner of another mining boom. It is believed by many that the sale will be consummated very soon. It is hoped that such will be the case, by all.

CHAPTER VI.

A DAY OFF.

Jane Graves was putting on her hat and faded plaid shawl for another dreary day's work. She hated it with all the passion of her nature. She saw nothing in it but slavery and degradation, and in her impatience thought she would rather die than drag out her life thus. Somebody must do the work, but not such as she, surely.

"Come here, my dear."

She had been lingering aimlessly, only that she dreaded to turn her feet toward the factory, whose tolling bell rang sternly in her ears. Now she approached her mother's bed with a gentler expression on her face.

The thin hands were laid on her arm, and the sick woman drew the girl's head down on the pillow beside her own.

"Was I ever so pretty as you, I wonder?" she said wistfully. "They used to say I was the prettiest in the village." And the sunken eyes brightened at sweet memories, the sweetest in the world to a woman.

"It did you little good, mother," said the girl in a muffled voice.

In a moment more she started up—

"There, mother, I am late again; a quarter day's pay lost, and a scolding gained."

The sick woman's eyes opened wide, and the girl waited one sad minute more, to see how terribly white the poor face looked even against her pillow.

"I had something to say, I thought," said the woman eagerly, "but I can't remember, I am so sick. But perhaps it wasn't anything. You may go now, dear; I am sorry I kept you."

The girl pinned her shawl about her. What good of looking in the glass? It could only tell her she was pretty, as her mother used to be, and remind her what a fool she was to expect a different fate. Fifteen years, and she might be sick and broken on this very bed, perhaps telling her own unhappy child how pretty she used to be. The girl shuddered at the picture as she went out of her mother's room.

"Oh! I remember now," called the sick woman.

"Did you want the tea put near you?" asked the girl, coming back wearily.

"It is not that—but—but you are not to go to work to-day. Somebody is coming to see you. He wants you to live with him."

"What, to marry me?" exclaimed the girl in astonishment.

"He didn't speak of that," smiled her mother, languidly, "but I can't talk any more, I am so tired."

Jane Graves had learned one lesson of poverty, not to hope. So after this strange announcement of her mother's she only laid off her hat and shawl, and waited. After looking idly out of the window for a while, and seeing nothing that had not worn itself into her very soul years ago, the vague woman instinct stirred in her and she moved about the house arranging things. She found a little map that hung in the sitting room a little awry and straightened it. It was a dingy map of China that had come once with a pound of tea, and she wanted to throw it away, but the wall looked too bare without anything. She took down a couple of ugly little gilt chromos her father had placed on the mantelpiece and tore them up in disgust. There seemed nothing else to do, there was so little to arrange. She was not sure but it was better in the mill—perhaps it was a blessing the poor were kept so many hours in its grim walls, where at least there was but little chance to think. What was there to long for in such homes and such leisure as this?

She stepped to the closet and took out a well thumbed book and sat down. She turned two or three pages, and then counted how many times she had read them before, and she felt sick with the foolish hopes and dreams the oft read book had used to wake in her.

She laid it away with a sigh and picked up an old newspaper. How slow the forenoon went.

She read down the advertising columns. How many beautiful things in the world, and all for sale! Somebody must have the money to buy them or the stores wouldn't be running. Where was it all? Did anybody work any harder for it than her father and herself? Jane Graves opened her little pocketbook and shook it over the table; but it was as empty as the day she bought it.

Then there came a light tap on the street door. This must be the "gentleman," this tall, elegant figure in a checked summer suit; and he actually lifted his hat to her.

"My name is Ellingsworth."

He needn't have told her; he had figured in the girl's fancy for years as the very impersonation of rank and wealth.

"I called about a maid. Mr. Graves gave me leave to speak with his daughter. Is she in?"

"I suppose I am the one. Will you come in?"

She watched him as he crossed the room to the nearest chair. How much lighter he walked than she could; and one might have thought from his unconsciousness that he had been used to just such a miserable room as this all his life. He showed no surprise at her being the prospective maid servant; no doubt he knew it all the time, and the way he spoke was only a part of his good manners. But then she could not imagine his showing surprise at anything.

"There will be but little to do," Mr. Ellingsworth continued, looking at her face and not seeming to see how ill she was dressed. "There is only my daughter; you may have seen her, yes? and myself. The wages will be small," and he named them and smiled apologetically, as if he expected her to decline. "Your father spoke to me as if you did not like the factories."

Out at service; well, why not? Could it be any more degrading than the life she lived? and such wages, too. Why, she could dress quite prettily then; and her girlish heart fluttered. And she could leave ugly things and rude people, and breathe perfumes and have only graceful surroundings; what matter if they were not hers?

She would be lifted right up in the very atmosphere she longed for. Yesterday she had envied the Ellingsworths, to-morrow she could share their beautiful life with them. Why not?

She lifted her bright eyes to his face. It was in half profile at this moment, and she could see his hair was just touched with gray. How could men in this world ever grow old? He was smooth shaved, showing in full effect the delicate, cynical curve of his thin lip and the clearly defined outlines of his chin. He must have been very oddly affected by the poverty pictured so unmistakably about him; but there was not the smallest sign of it on his well bred face.

"I will go," she said abruptly; "when do you want me?"

"I shall be away for a fortnight," he said, rising, with his own admirable smile. "You can come when I return."

She rose too, but could think of nothing proper to say. But how poverty stricken she would look in her factory clothes. Her spirits had fallen already.

"By the way," Mr. Ellingsworth turned, as if a sudden business item had struck him. It was a peculiar expressionless monotone he used sometimes when on delicate subjects that seemed to have as little personal quality as a printed page. "I always pay in advance; be kind enough to accept your first month's wages and our bargain will be closed."

The girl found herself alone, looking at the crisp, fresh looking bank bills he had placed in her hands. "How thoughtful these rich people are. They have time for it, I suppose."

Her wardrobe was very simple. There hung over the back of the chair the dull check of a merino, chosen long ago to endure the most service with the least show of it. On the bureau before the mirror was a paper box holding a discarded ribbon or two, pink or cardinal, and two or three pieces of cheap jewelry the girl was too proud to wear.

"It won't take me long to pack," she said aloud.

She suddenly took a pretty attitude of listening. She had closed the door into the sick chamber in a moment more and stood in the middle of the sitting room when Curran came in.

"Why, you don't look very sick, Jennie. I have to walk to Lockout by 8 o'clock, but thought I would look in just a minute."

"I am going to leave the mill." How preoccupied he seemed to-night. "I am going to leave the mill, Mr. Curran," the girl repeated with beating heart. He might not like her new plan, and at the very thought of this disapproval she felt all her bright hopes taking to themselves wings; and the old dreary picture of factory gates and soiled calico dresses came back.

"Going away, little girl?" He seemed to speak with a slight effort, as if his mind was not on what he said. "Well, I suppose you can't be any worse off, but we shall miss you."

And was that all he had to say when he thought she was going forever out of his life—had he no reproaches for her?

"I am not going far," she began hurriedly.

"There would be no use going far." He had seated himself on the other side of the table from her, and rested his face on his hand. "It is just the same everywhere. Wherever there are a thousand souls ten will grind the rest. I don't suppose the rich mean to be so unjust, not all of them; they don't stop to notice that they are getting all the good things in the world. It never occurs to them to wonder why the great earth seems to produce only for them."

"Why, Jennie, sometimes I get so tired trying to stand up against it all, so sick of my own heartache, that I can make nobody share with me." He had risen to his feet and was walking moodily across the room. That very night he must pour out all the precious energy of his soul into dull, stolid ears, that seemed so slow to understand. A hall full of strange faces would look up coldly at him, and his hot words would be quenched as they fell from his lips, in the unmoved depths of their hearts. It seemed so vain, all he could do or say, and he felt so tired to-night, longing, instead, to rest his head on some gentle breast, and be soothed with some foolish words of comfort and tenderness.

The girl had risen, too, and stood resting the back of her hand on the table. But her eyes dared not lift to his. She tried to speak, and her lips trembled so that her voice came strange and unfamiliar.

"I am sorry for you. Is there no one, no woman?" she half whispered.

"Women do not care for such as I," he said, smiling a little bitterly. "They love light and pleasant things. I am too serious. I should only frighten them; they could not understand."

Then he came toward her with a softer light in his eyes.

"You are a good little girl, Jennie." He had taken her trembling hands, which only trembled the more. "I shall miss you very much. What is the trouble with your eyes, Jennie, you can't look at me? I am going now."

Then she raised her eyes, like lightning, to his face.

"Oh, let me comfort you," she cried. "I would die for you. I will ask nothing back but a smile now and then. Nobody can ever love you like me."

His face was troubled, but cold and impassive as rock. He still held her hands, as she sank in a heart breaking flood of tears at his feet.

After a moment he bent down in pity, and gathered her trembling form in his arms. How the sobs seemed to shake her. He smoothed back her wavy hair from the low forehead, and even kissed her wet cheeks. But all he said was:

"Poor little girl, poor little Jennie."

For an instant she lay still as a nestling child. Then she sprang back from him, and fled into her mother's room, and wept and moaned for shame and heartache, until the calm of weariness came over her, as nature's blessed gift to her hopeless children.

CHAPTER VII.

A TEST.

"Isn't your father going?"

It was the same evening, and Philip Breton was assisting Bertha into his beach wagon for a twilight drive.

"Father has left town for a few days. Didn't you know? Suppose you let me have the back seat. The world is large enough to afford us a seat apiece to-night."

Bertha adjusted her wraps and the horses stepped off down the street as gayly as if their driver had not been disappointed.

There was not very much conversation today; indeed there never was unless Philip afforded it. Bertha considered she did her part in looking well, smiling prettily at his witticisms, with now and then a remark, if she felt inclined. But today Philip was moody and silent. So Bertha gave herself up to the sensuous delight of riding, and only spoke in mild exclamations of admiration of the scenery as they left the village behind and followed up the winding river.

"Curran," he exclaimed, and stopped his horses close beside him. The man turned, and one might have thought he did not recognize the occupants of the carriage, except that there was the least bit of a flush on his face, which bore the lines of interrupted meditation. Then he bowed slightly to Philip.

"And you don't recollect me, I suppose," smiled Bertha.

"I am not so stupid," he said, letting his steel blue eyes rest admiringly upon her.

"We are going to Lockout, too. You must get in with us."

"No, I won't crowd you; don't move." And he turned a little away from them as if to continue his walk.

"Certainly you must!" said Bertha; "see, I have a whole seat to myself and it is so stupid. Please."

And Curran took the seat she offered him, holding back her wraps till he was seated, and then releasing them.

"Do you think I shall ever learn to weave cotton cloth?" asked Philip, to call his attention to their day's work together.

"I presume so, if you really mean to. But it is lucky you haven't got your board to pay meanwhile."

But Curran did not smile, and was very ill at ease. He seemed to be lifted, body and soul, into the very life he was accustomed to rebuke. The beautiful horses of the rich were harnessed today to his pleasure with their gold plate trimmings. What right had he here? He said nothing of it, but felt intensely the falseness of his position. The delicate springs hurt him, and every sign of lavish wealth in the dress of his companions. He wanted no interests with the rich; his life work must be against them; he desired no association with a luxurious manner of life which he ought to upbraid. There must not be one chain of gold to unite him with the wealthy class in whom he saw the enemies of the people.

And yet he was taking delight in this woman's presence, a new delight, such as the women of the poor had never given him. And was not she the very essence of luxury and refinement? He hated himself for it, but for all he tried to look elsewhere he kept seeing the sparkle of the diamonds on the whitest hand he had ever seen. He enjoyed the lilies of the valley set in mosaic at her throat, which showed its creamy white against the delicate ruffles, and the comb with its band of Roman gold almost the shade of the rippling hair it restrained. But were not these the very extravagances the poor had to struggle to earn for her? He ought to be fulminating withering sentences for such as she.

"I will get out at the rocks and walk the rest of the way," said Curran at last, as they could catch a glimpse of Lookout in the distance. "The workmen I want to talk to would hardly understand my coming with a carriage and pair."

The "rocks" came but a mile from Lockout and the horses trotted so well that the spot was reached in a few moments more. The road at this point had been cut through a side hill of sandstone by dint of great blasting and the jagged edges jutted out angrily at the passers by.

"There must be a wonderful landscape on the other side of the rocks," said Bertha, as Philip stopped his horses for Curran to alight. "Have you plenty of time?" she asked, before the workman could express his thanks.

"An hour to spare."

She looked wistfully at the envious rocks that shut them in and then at Curran's grave face.

"I would so like to see that view from the top of the rocks if I had some one to help me."

In a minute more Bertha was climbing the rocks with her strange escort, and Philip sat holding his horses quite a little distance back.

"You didn't talk very much during our drive," said Bertha, as she stood with her companion looking off down the valley. "Is it so wicked of us to be rich?"

He shot a sudden deprecating look at her. "Don't force me so far. I cannot say it now."

Bertha smiled. "Then leave me out of it, say Philip instead."

"He is enjoying the fruits of terrible injustice."

"But would his father have been rich unless he had deserved it?" asked Bertha.

"Is it a just reward of merit, then, that a thousand human creatures should well nigh starve, and be be rich? If he has deserved to be rich, you must say they have merited starvation."

The girl liked to hear his earnest, thrilling tones, and watch his eyes flash and his nostrils dilate with such rare passion.

"Is it just," he went on, "that no matter how unweariedly a laborer works, his idle neighbor, as surely as the sun sets, should lay intolerable tribute on his profits so that he must stay forever poor? Is a day's work worth nothing? Then why does it bring in some capitalist thousands of dollars for a stroke of his pen?"

Bertha understood but little of what he was saying, but she could look intently at him with wide open blue eyes, which had a pretty trick of changing expression as if in closest sympathy with a speaker. Curran felt no one had half listened to him before, that at last every word told, and he was strangely excited by the sweet mystery of their common inspiration.

"Great wealth is made up of 10,000 trickling streams, drained from the paltry earnings of as many defrauded workmen. Mere cunning scheming ought not enable a man to turn aside the great river of plenty, which flows for all men. Why these shrewd business men, whom so many praise, have so ingeniously placed their chains on the laborer, that the harder he struggles to escape from poverty, he only turns the faster the wheel that grinds out fortunes for his masters, and draws him in at last to be crushed."

He hesitated for her to ask him some questions, and perhaps it was already as plain to her as to him. At any rate, she only looked off to the west where the glow of sunset was fast fading, and then back into his face regretfully.

"I suppose we ought to go down," she said.

"Why, yes, I had forgotten whether it was night or day."

He took her hand gently as if he touched a holy thing, and his face softened like a child's. He would not have let her fail for the world. She had taught him, how he did not stop to think, that there was a rare and exquisite strain of joy in life. She had spiritualized womanhood to him; he suddenly saw in it an essence so pure and fine it might redeem the world. An hour ago, he had been so wretched, and now a vague, sweet hope he cared not to define was born in him. As he stood upon the road bed and reached up his hands to help Bertha down, their eyes met for a moment, and then she trusted herself to him in such gentle surrender that a mist floated before his sight. She almost fell, and he must needs gather her perfect form in his arms to save her.

Philip had been idly snapping his whip and looking up the road. He thought he saw in the distance a number of men with guns hurrying in his direction and before them—yes, it must be a dog; an odd hour of the day for hunting. He might as well have his horses turned about; he could see Curran and Bertha clambering down from the rocks. So it happened that at the moment Bertha came so near falling—in fact, did fall, into Curran's arms—Philip was sitting with his back toward them, faced toward home.

But by this time the hunters with guns were nearer; the blacksmith had rushed out of his shop to look at the dog who bounded along with his mouth to the ground dropping foam as he ran.

The dog was mad. Bertha saw the great wild creature, and grew pale as death, and pressed back against the rocky wall in despair. Curran saw him too, and had not even to make up his mind to die to save this woman. It was a matter of course. He stepped out directly in front of her without one word, and bending forward, waited. The mad dog might pass by. But no, in an instant more the beast was upon him, and like lightning Curran had reached out his hands of iron and caught his shaggy throat as in a vise.

The creature rose upon its hind legs and snapped ravenously at his captor, great drops of foam, specked with blood, dropping from his jaws. With one rapid glance Curran saw the men with guns, running at full speed, and almost at hand. If he could hold him but one moment more he might yet be saved, if those glistening teeth, distilling poison and madness, would spare his flesh one moment more. His arms and wrists were corded like a giant's; his head thrown back to escape the venomous fangs, while he listened with fast sickening heart to the sound of approaching feet. He heard, too, the quick breathing of the woman behind him; thank God, he could save her from such a fate, and she might think kindly of him sometimes, even if he must die like a dog, since it was for her.

But now his arms trembled with the terrible strain upon them and the dog struggled more fiercely, so that the man felt his hot, fetid breath on his cheek, and in an instant more the deadly jaws seemed closing over his arm. Suddenly there came a loud report and a cloud of smoke, and the mangled creature fell upon the ground in his death agony. The madness had gone out of his big, brown eyes which looked up pitifully at the man he would have slain.

"They were just in time with their guns," exclaimed Philip, rushing up and wringing his hand.

But the man made no response, nor even looked around for one sign of gratitude from the woman he had risked his life for. He had no answers or smiles for the admiring crowd that had seemed to gather so quickly when the danger was over, but his face grew quite pale as he walked up the road. At the blacksmith's shop a thought seemed to strike him. He hesitated a moment and then went in.

THE LATEST IN JEWELS.

Filigree jewelry is bidding high for favoritism again.

The armlets now so much in vogue are invariably fastened with jeweled pins.

A very beautiful scarf pin top is a crown of platinum with a filigree gold leaf on either side.

A scarf pin head of modest pretensions is a heavy gold loop with a bar of rubies running from end to end.

Another use found for the much utilized clothespin is that of a book mark, which comes in both gold and silver.

Among the most artistic ring settings are five or six circlets of semi-precious stones arranged so that the colors blend.

Some of the puff combs lately introduced have a braid of gold and are topped wit. semicircles of garnets or pearls.

Numbered among the fanciful designs in scarf pins is a hand in Roman gold holding a brilliant diamond in a very frail setting.

A bass viol in bronze, with an impish boy astride it, drawing a bow over the strings, is the newest odd pattern for a paper weight.

Decidedly novel as an Easter attraction is a circular plush placque, bearing an egg of sterling silver, the placque serving as a pin cushion.

It would be difficult to excel in beauty as a queen chain a tiny gold obelisk with hieroglyphics on the surface represented by numberless rubies.

Ingenuity has conceived a silver cane head that shall contain a small wax candle and matches, the candle to be raised by the aid of a side attachment.

Topping a mother-of-pearl double pronged hair pin of recent manufacture are pearls and diamonds alternating and producing quite a recherche effect.

A notably rich and elegant brooch is a more than ordinary large opal, pointed top and bottom, encircled by a filigree gold frame set closely with rubies.

Quite an attractive little chatelaine ornament is that which simulates in appearance a hazel nut, but which on closer observation is found to contain cologne.

Some very choice patterns of filigree gold brooches recently seen contained one formed of tiny circles around a frame of small squares inclosing a magnificent ruby.

CRANDPA EDWARDS.

He Talks About His Fifteen Thousand Dollar Lottery Prize.

Mr. T. F. Edwards, or "grandpa," as he is familiarly called by everybody who knows him, is still at work, keeping his engine bright.

He says he is getting sort o' used to being wealthy now, and his money don't trouble him much.

"That's the first Lonisiana State Lottery ticket I ever bought," he remarked to a group of friends yesterday. "I hadn't any more idea of winning anything than I had of finding $15,000 in the street. Some folks seem to think I'll never get the money, but they are badly mistaken, for I've already got the 'cere, right down there in the Capital City bank, and what's more I haven't spent a cent of it yet.

"I've made up my mind to keep it and make it support me and my old lady for the balance of our days. I'm going to buy us a home—a nice, cosy little place—and then I'll invest the balance in real estate—Atlanta real estate, because I think it the best hole a man can put his money in, if he ever expects to get it out again.

"The only trouble about the money is the way the real estate men run after me. They think because I'm a poor man and never owned a house and lot in my life, that I'll be in a hurry to buy one, but I'm just going to wait until the excitement dies down a little, and then take a look around before I buy. The old lady will have something to say about it, too. It strange, but it seems like she takes just about as much interest in that fifteen thousand dollars as I do! I reckon it's all right though, for she's the better half, and I expect she'll get the biggest part of it.

"We have never seen the money yet, but we're going down to the bank some day and ask Mr. Hemphill to let us look at it—some of it anyhow."

It will be remembered that "Grand-pa" was the lucky winner of $15,000 in the recent drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery.—Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, July 3.

STONE IN THE KIDNEY.

I was first taken with sharp pains in the lower part of my bowels in the region of the bladder. Shortly blood appeared mixed with my urine, and a few weeks later I had an attack of gravel, I tried a number of doctors. One said it was gravel, another inflammation of the bladder, and another stone in kidneys. For three months I was under the care of an eminent doctor at Albany, but constantly growing worse, went home to die. At this time I was induced to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., and am now robust and strong. A remedy which can do this for one so near death as I was should be known everywhere. I hope this statement will cause others afflicted as I was to use the Remedy.—C. W. Brown, Petersburgh, N. Y.

THAT CANTANKEROUS OLD WOMAN

Described in the nursery ballad, who "lived upon nothing but victuals and drink," and yet, "would never be quiet," was undoubtedly troubled with chronic indigestion. Her victuals, like those of many other elderly persons whose digestive powers have become impaired, didn't agree with her. This was before the era of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters or some one of her numerous friends and relatives would undoubtedly have persuaded her to try the great specific for dyspepsia, constipation and biliousness. This would have been a measure of self-protection on their part, for she would soon have been cured and ceased to disturb them with her clamor. The most obstinate cases of indigestion, with its attendant heartburn, flatulence, constipation and uneasiness of the stomach and of the nerves, are completely overcome by this sovereign remedy. Chills and fever and bilious remittent, rheumatism and kidney troubles are also relieved by it.

Master of the Steamship Kanawha.

About a year ago he observed a strange change in his feelings. He felt tired instead of vigorous; nervous instead of strong. His appetite became poor and his sleep broken. He tried to overcome these feelings, but they would not go. He then noticed pains and irritation in the water channels, and that the fluids passed were often thick and with a scum on top or a brick-dust sediment at the bottom. All these were the sure symptoms of that fearful disease, Catarrh of the Bladder, which has always been considered incurable, and they continued until the Captain was in a terrible condition. But he is the picture of health and vigor to-day, and he owes it entirely to that wonderful medicine, Hunt's Remedy. Capt. Greenwood says: "I am so certain of the great value of Hunt's Remedy, that I always carry a supply on shipboard for the use of my men, and I prescribe it whenever they are ailing. After curing me as it did, and restoring my wife, (whom the best physicians of New York said was dying of tumor,) to perfect health, I swear by it."

BIRTH OF A VOLCANO.

The Process as It Has Been Observed at Yzalco, in San Salvador.

Yzalco, in the little Republic of San Salvador, is in many respects the most remarkable volcano on earth, first because its discharges have continued so long and with such great regularity; again, because the tumult in the earth's bowels is always to be heard, as the rumblings and explosions are constant, being audible for a hundred miles, and sounding like the noise which Rip Van Winkle heard when he awakened from his sleep in the Catskills; and finally it is the only volcano that has originated on this continent since the discovery by Columbus. It arose suddenly from the plains in the spring of 1770, in the midst of what had been for nearly a hundred years the profitable estate of Senor Don Balthazar Erazo, who was absent from the country at the time, and was greatly amazed upon his return to discover that his magnificent coffee and indigo plantation had, without his knowledge or consent, been exchanged for a first-class volcano.

In December, 1769, the peons on the hacienda were alarmed by terrific rumblings under the ground, constant tremblings of the earth and frequent earthquakes, which did not extend over the country as usual, but seemed to be confined to that particular locality. They left the place in terror when the tremblings and noises continued, and, returning a week or two later, found that all the buildings had been shaken down, trees uprooted and large craters opened in the fields, which had been level earth before. From these craters smoke and steam issued, and occasionally flames were seen to come out of the ground. Some brave vaqueros or herdsmen, remained near by to watch developments, and on February 23, 1770, they were entertained by a spectacle that no other men have been permitted to witness; for about ten o'clock on the morning of that day the grand upheaval took place, and it seemed to them, as they fled in terror, that the whole universe was being turned upside down. First there was a series of terrible explosions, which lifted the crust of the earth several hundred feet, and out of the cracks issued flames and lava, and immense volumes of smoke. An hour or two afterwards there was another and a grander convulsion, which shook and startled the country for a hundred miles around. Rocks weighing thousands of tons were hurled into the air, and fell several leagues distant. The surface of the earth was elevated three thousand feet, and the internal recesses were purged of masses of lava and blistered stone, which fell in a heap around the hole from which they issued.

These discharges continued for several days at irregular intervals, accompanied by loud explosions and earthquakes, which did much damage throughout the entire Republic; the disturbance was perceptible in Nicaragua and Honduras. In this manner was a volcano born, and it has proved to be a healthful and vigorous child. In less than two months from a level field rose a mountain more than 4,000 feet high, and the constant discharges from the crater which opened then have accumulated round its edges until its elevation has increased 2,000 feet more. Unfortunately the growth of the monster has not been scientifically observed or accurately measured, but the cone of lava and ashes, which is now 2,500 feet from the foundation of the earth upon which it rests, is constantly growing by the incessant discharges of volcanic matter.--From "The Capitals of South America."

AN INTERESTING GROUP.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, James Russell Lowell and Margaret Deland.

Crossing the Boston public gardens a fortnight ago my attention was attracted to two gentlemen, who had stopped and were watching with interest the playful antics of some sparrows sporting in the water, dipping their wings in the cold surface bracing themselves for what was probably their first bath of the season in northern climes. The eyes of the shorter of the two men twinkled merrily as he pointed out the birds with the end of his cane to his more sedate companion. Genuine glee and interest was written on the features of the little gentleman as he followed the frolicsome birds at play, and for several minutes he stood there indulging in a constant running comment. Occasionally he would break out in a hearty laugh as one bird attempted to force his mate into the water.

The face of the other gentleman betokened only an ordinary interest and apparently failed to join in the more boyish glee of his companion. It was a beautiful spring morning, but the coat collar of the taller gentleman was turned up, a short coat of light material thrown open characterized the dress of his companion of shorter stature. Suddenly a pleasant faced young lady approached the couple from behind, and with a light and merry "Playful little creatures, are they not?" made her presence known.

The little gentleman turned quickly, and with a hearty, boyish laugh, stepped forward and shook the hands of the new-comer. The more stately gentleman mechanically stretched forward a gloved hand. It was an interesting group—Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, light of heart and with all the youthful ardor of a boy on a first beautiful spring morning; James Russell Lowell, stately, cold looking and stooped of shoulders; Margaret Deland, fresh of face and erect of carriage. I was sorry when the trio moved away toward Beacon street.—Cor. Philadelphia Times.

SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY.

—A new agricultural machine distributes manures and insecticides, and sows grain by means of an air blast.

—Helmholtz has shown that if an invisible jet of steam be electrified or heated it becomes visible, with bright tints of different colors, according to the potential or the temperature.

—It has been proposed to secure secrecy in telephone communication by breaking the transmitting current up, and sending one portion over one line and the rest over another line.

—A new artificial silk has been prepared from a pure cellulose octonitrate having great elasticity and softness. It is more lustrous than the silk of cocoons, and capable of being dyed by the ordinary processes.

—The installation of the electric motor as a means for stationary power is becoming more noticeable each year, and estimates carefully made rate the number of those in use at the present time for driving machinery in the United States at between 6,500 and 7,000.

—Satisfactory results are obtained with the new locomotive in which the periphery of the driving wheels, instead of being round, is composed of a series of plain facets, connected with each other by very obtuse angles. These flat surfaces are from one to two inches in length, and insure increased traction.

—The fact that the jostling to which storage battery cells are subjected when in use on railroad trains not only does not injure them, but, on the contrary, prolongs their life, is accounted for on the ground that a continuous movement of the electrolyte is kept up, thus keeping it uniform about the cell and preventing injurious local action.

—Dr. Eisenmann, of Berlin, has invented a piano which, by the aid of electro-magnetism, can sustain, increase and diminish sound. This has been attempted by other experts, notably Boehm, the inventor of the metal flute. Another novelty will be that by moving the electro-magnets the timbre of the tone is changed; for example, from that of a violoncello to a piccolo.

—A century ago, it is stated, only charcoal iron was produced, and of that only about 30,000 tons a year. Even Great Britain produced, in 1788, only 68,300 tons. To-day there are several furnaces in this country, each of which turns out annually as much as that, and a single railway now buys yearly more iron than both Great Britain and this country produced a century ago.

—By combining water, cane sugar, white of egg, carbonate of soda and gelatine, with the addition of about twenty per cent. of the finest olive oil, or other pure fat, a substance could be produced almost identical with cow's milk in its chemical constituents and in its appearance. But in its flavor it differs materially, and is but a poor apology for cow's milk prepared in the laboratory of nature.

—From an exhaustive study of the large collection of meteorites at Harvard College, the conclusion has been arrived at that many of the masses of meteoric iron now known are cleavage crystals, broken off, probably, by the impact of the mass against the atmosphere. It is found that these masses show cleavings parallel to the planes of all the three fundamental forms of the isometric or regular system. From all that appears, the theory has come to be entertained that the masses of meteorites were thrown off from a sun among the fixed stars, and that they were slowly cooled while revolving in a zone of intense heat.

INGENIOUS BEGGARS.

Two Incidents That for Their Ingenuity Stand Unrivaled.

Have you ever been accosted in the street by a seedy, dilapidated individual with a luminous nose and a husky voice, who opened on you something in this style: "Excuse me, sir, but could I have a few minutes' conversation with you? I have not always been thus," etc. Of course you have. You know in a minute that he is a professional beer worker. You have some respect for the haggard, brawny fellow who says frankly: "I am hungry and thirsty," and seldom let him go empty-handed. There are two incidents that occur to me that for their ingenuity stand unrivaled. The first one occurred at Chicago a year ago last winter. The writer, in company with a friend, was standing one Sunday evening on the steps of the Clarendon Hotel when a very tough-looking man approached with a week's growth of beard on his face and said: "I am a thief. I have just been released from Joliet prison. I want ten cents for a drink, ten more for a bed, ten for a cocktail in the morning, and ten for a sandwich, forty cents in all. My recommend is nothing extra, I am aware. Talk quick, will you give it, or shall I have to try further?" The supreme cheek of the man gained him the amount asked. The other incident was in Union Square Park, New York, as a party of us were coming from the theater. We were stopped by a ragged individual with a small kitten in his arms. He opened the conversation immediately and said: "Gents, maybe you think I am going to spar you for money, but I ain't. I am not hungry or thirsty and have a place to sleep, but I have no cash. I want a few pennies, not for myself, but to buy some milk for this poor little starving cat, which I found crying in this park." The party was for a moment stunned, but amid roars of laughter a purse of nearly a dollar was collected and given to the guardian of the kitten.—Albany (N. Y.) Argus.

PHYSICAL TRAINING.

The pulley and weights is almost as familiar a play-thing in English homes as the American swing, and far more useful for development of the muscles. It moreover possesses the advantage of being capable of use within doors when cold and storms prevent children taking exercise out of doors. The fine physique of British children calls for frequent comment, and this is due to the constant care of their mothers, not only in the use of the pulley, but by systematic rubbing and massage treatment of the growing children at night before they are put to bed. Our American girls need physical home training even more than their brothers. The unequal shoulders and other defects too common in figures of women in this country show the need of such training, indicating, as they do, weakness and want of development in muscles which should be in active use, and which can only be developed as the trainer develops the muscles of the professional oarsman. There is no danger that our girls will become hoydens which would compare with that danger to their health which arises from an insufficient development of the various muscles of the body in childhood, producing a puny womanhood and weak physique and nerves. It is a good thing to note the interest taken in this country in active field games like lawn tennis and the revival of many of the old-time games, such as battledore and shuttlecock, grace hoops and other games which train the eye to be accurate and the arm steady. Mothers can not be too careful in watching their girls. Boys gain by their more active out-door life a development of all their muscles, but girls are not nearly so sure to get the benefit of such out-door life.

Their shoulders more frequently become unequal from careless positions at the school desk or at play, and in many cases in this insidious way the foundation of a serious spinal disease is laid. English mothers of quite moderate means find time to watch the development of their growing children. This is the advantage of the nightly rubbing of the child and the daily bath, which is far less frequent in this country than it should be. At such times the mother can easily note any irregularity in the figure or projecting shoulder caused by a weakness of the muscles that hold the shoulder bones in place, or she can note the stooping tendency which is caused by insufficient development of the muscles of the chest. Then comes the beauty of gymnastic training at home with the simple pulley and weights. By this means nearly all the muscles of the body may be trained. Spinal disease is too frequent and too terrible a scourge to womanhood for any precautionary means to be neglected. A mother's care may save her child a life of acute suffering and develop her into the glory of a perfect physical womanhood. There is nothing better to strengthen weak muscles than a daily cold bath followed by brisk rubbing taken before breakfast. It is hardly to be hoped that the average mother will recognize the value of such means of health; this is impossible until people have become wiser, but the best medical experience sanctions it in spite of the old wife's tale about the danger and shock of frequent bathing in cold water.—N. Y. Tribune.

GRATUITOUS ADVICE.

Oh! young man, in your youth either split rails or work on a canal boat. Then when you grow older, the Presidential chair may be yours. Do not dream of organizing a youthful band of faithful followers to go West and slaughter Indians, for the red men, with the assistance of bad whisky and government ammunition, are killing themselves as fast as possible.

Always speak kindly to your sick uncle. He may make a will some day and, perchance, he might leave you one of the family spoons; or, even better, you might become the envied possessor of his antique oak boot-jack.

When your parents disagree on some slight subject preserve a discreet silence, and, if possible, leave the room, for when your father comes out second best, as he invariable will, he may take his revenge on your youthful hide.

Do not cry when you have to stay indoors and play with the little girls. As you grow older, you will find that a little girl is a great comfort, even though she consents to be only a sister to you.

Read your Sunday-school books but do not believe all they tell you. For if you did, you would imbibe the very erroneous theory that virtue and honesty are the only roads to riches and that the good young man alone succeeded in marrying the beautiful heiress.

In sharing candy or fruit with your younger brother, always bear in mind that too much would make the little fellow sick. Remembering this, you will always be justified in taking the larger share for yourself.

On the occasion of your father's birthday, do not seek to please him by investing your hoarded pennies in a pair of embroidered slippers. A little slipper in the hands of an angry parent is often a source of great discomfort to a mischievious youngster.

When your country cousin comes to visit you, do not take advantage of his ignorance by making him believe that the cable cars are run by thunder and lightning; for, when you return his visit next summer, he may repay evil for evil by telling you that a hornet's nest is a humming bird.—Time.

ABOUT LAMP CHIMNEYS.

Millions of Them Broken Every Year—Where They Come From.

Nearly 5,000,000 of lamp chimneys are smashed every year in this city and at least 50,000,000 bits of glass are thrown into ash barrels, streets, alleys, gutters, sewers, etc. Yet people venture out in thin-soled shoes, children in bare feet and horses without any protection on their hoofs.

Stranger still, one seldom hears of an accident arising from the presence of these bits of glass.

The street sanitary regulations of the city fortunately do much toward obviating such accidents, and most of the broken and cracked chimneys are deposited in ash barrels and find their way to the dump, where they are gathered up by rag-pickers and sold to junk dealers, who, in turn, sell the scraps, which are known as "cullet," to the glass works at 40 cents per 100 pounds.

The dealers in chimneys dispose of their broken stock, which is about 5 per cent. of that carried, in the same manner.

The breakage of lamp chimneys represents the consumption of that article. The lamp-chimney business, therefore, is of considerable importance to the public.

There are innumerable styles of lamp chimneys on the market—large, small and medium sized; long, short, round, flat and twisted; thin, thick, narrow, broad, square, globular, scalloped, colored, spotted, etc., from the baby chimney, 4 inches tall by 1 inch in diameter, to the great big fellow, 12 inches tall by 4½ inches in diameter, used on the largest lamp in the market, which throws a 360-candle power light and costs from 15 cents to $2 per dozen wholesale. They even manufacture combinations of chimney and globes, while every year brings into the market half a dozen or more of new styles of chimneys. Every new lamp requires a special chimney.

Nine-tenths of the chimneys made in this country are manufactured in Pittsburgh, while most of the balance are made at Steubenville, O., while a very few are made in the natural gas regions.

The majority of small ones are imported. Wherever the material in a lamp chimney is of greater cost than the labor the chimney is imported, and vice versa.

All the shapes used in this country are of American design, but are manufactured abroad and brought here and sold at much less than they could be produced here. It is labor that figures in the cost of manufacture more than material.

The odd shapes are all molded, while the ordinary shapes are blown and are made of lead glass and lime glass, both in this and the old country. There is a feature that the casual observer would not notice in selecting a lamp chimney with a square top. Two chimneys of almost identical appearance are placed side by side, one of which commands a higher price. A close observation shows that the top and bottom of the one is rough, while the other is polished and smooth. The smooth one possesses double the durability of the rough one. The rough one is cut off and cooled, while the other is polished. Only the best quality of glass can be polished this way.

People make a great mistake in imagining that a heavy chimney is more durable than a thin one. This is not the fact. The thin chimney is far more durable because of its expansion and contraction being more regular.

The non-breakable chimney, which is made chiefly in Illinois, is non-breakable in name more so than in reality, though it is much more durable than the ordinary chimney. The difference in the price however, does not warrant its purchase on the score of economy, hence very few are sold. The best grade of chimney is known as the pearl top, which is made like any other chimney, but while hot has a crimped ring welded to the top, while the ordinary crimped top is merely placed in a mold and shaped while hot.

These chimneys are much less liable to break than the others, and are considered well worth the one-third more in price. The great demand to-day is for fancy tops.

There are also a great many chimneys now used on gas burners. On the shelves of a first-class lamp store can be found fifty separate and distinct styles of lamp chimneys, while every grocery in the country handles them, mostly the common grades.

The life of a lamp chimney is as uncertain as that of a man. An expensive one is as liable to break as soon as a cheap one, as there are many causes calculated to crack or shatter them other than a fall or contact with another body. A draught of air, a damp chimney, a splash of water or a high blaze will any of them terminate a chimney's usefulness in short order.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

He Was Excused.

"Excuse me," he said as he bit off the end of a cigar and held out his hand to secure a light from the other, who was smoking.

"Beg pardon."

"I said excuse me."

"Oh, certainly. Always willing to excuse."

And he took the fresh cigar, lighted it, threw his old stub away, and as he began on the new one he walked off with the remark:

"Very good cigar, sir—very good. Of course I'll excuse you."—Detroit Free Press.

EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

Mrs. Fred Grant Advances Some Strange Reactionary Ideas.

It is said that Mrs. Fred Grant has some reactionary ideas on the subject of the education of women which she is carrying into effect upon her own little daughter. Mrs. Grant, who was a Miss Honore, is of French extraction, was herself bred in the convent, where, as is known, the most advanced ideas are not as a rule inculcated. But she goes even further back than do most of the modern convents. She has a perfect horror of the theory of woman's suffrage, and quite as much for the theories of those who advocate the higher education of women, in which she does not in the least believe. She holds that women should not be, nor even desire to be, any thing but wives and mothers, and not even wives and mothers according to the modern standard, but should strictly conform themselves to such rules as used to be laid down for them by the stern fathers of the Church. Following out this theory, Mrs. Grant has allowed nothing to be taught her little daughter which would tend to make her independent, self-reliant or forcible. The four rules of arithmetic are the strict limit of her mathematical education. Philosophy of any sort she is not even allowed to hear a suggestion of. She is never permitted to argue upon any subject whatever, and is trained to accept absolutely whatever is told her without question. Her education consists of the study of music, such literature as her mother thinks best for her to read, a little history, drawing, needlework, and the languages, and all this is taught her by a private governess, who lives with her and is warranted not to instill ideas outside of those elementary ones Mrs. Grant considers suited to female capacity. The Honores have always carefully kept up their French, and the Grant children have had, besides, a French nurse, so that they would learn the two languages together and know no difference between them. Mrs. Grant takes great pains with their pronunciation, and they really speak beautiful French, with the fluency and accent of natives. She is particularly pleased on their account that her husband should have a mission to a German-speaking country, and before his term at Vienna has finished they will undoubtedly be speaking the language like natives, as she means to surround them entirely with Germans as their teachers and attendants, in order that they may speak the tongue with that ease which can only be had from intimate association with the Teutons. The daughters is a pretty child of a brunette, French type, and resembles the Honores entirely, while the boy is a Grant.—Cor. N. Y. World.

ABOUT WHEAT CUTTING.

The Best Stage at Which to Begin Harvesting Operations.

Whether the acreage be large or small, it is important to harvest in good season. A few days' delay will make considerable difference in the quality of the grain, besides increasing the loss in handling.

Improved machinery has lessened very materially the work of harvesting a large crop of this grain. Every thing should be in readiness so as to be able to push the work as rapidly as possible. It is quite a system to start as soon as the grain is sufficiently ripe, and by having every thing ready this can be done while the work can be pushed along. The reaper or binder must be in good repair, as a comparatively small break may cause considerable loss. If the machine is an old one, or if it has stood out exposed to the weather, a thorough overhauling should be given, loose bolts be tightened up, screws and all working parts be adjusted. A loose bolt or screw may be the cause of considerable damage.

So far as possible, the best stage at which to commence harvesting the wheat is while the grain is in the dough, and just as it begins to harden. If cut too early the grain is liable to shrivel up in drying, and, if allowed to get too ripe, will often bleach and will shake out more in handling. If cut reasonably early the straw will make a much better feed so that it is very important to commence the work as soon as the grain is ready. It is best as far as can be done to keep well up with the work of shocking. There is always more or less damage done by allowing the wheat to lie in the bundle after cutting, while there is the additional risk of a shower, and if one comes the damage will be still greater. Wheat can be shocked up and stacked much wetter than any other kind of grain or hay, and will dry out with less injury; at the same time it is best to shock up and keep dry. If the bundles are properly set up and well capped, the danger of getting wet will be largely reduced. It is important in shocking up the wheat to set the bundles up straight and close together and evenly on all sides, so as to resist the wind and keep the rain from blowing in. If dry, wheat can be stacked very soon after cutting; yet when it is intended to stack as soon as it is sufficently dry care should be taken to shock up well.—St. Louis Republic.

RIGHT-HANDEDNESS.

Primitive man, being by nature a fighting animal, fought for the most part at first with his great canine teeth, his nails and his fists; till in process of time he added to those early and natural weapons the further persuasions of a club or shillalah. He also fought, as Darwin has conclusively shown, in the main for the possession of the ladies of his kind against other members of his own sect and species. And if you fight you soon learn to protect the most exposed and vulnerable portion of your body. Or, if you don't, natural selection manages it for you by killing you off as an immediate consequence.

To the boxer, wrestler, or hand-to-hand combatant the most vulnerable portion is undoubtedly the heart. A hard blow, well delivered on the left breast, will easily kill, or at any rate, stun even a strong man. Hence from an early period, men have used the right hand to fight with and have employed the left arm chiefly to cover the heart and parry a blow aimed at that specially vulnerable region. And when weapons of offense and defense supersede mere fists and teeth it is the right hand that grasps the spear or sword, while the left holds over the heart for defense the shield or buckler.

From this simple origin, then, the whole vast difference of right and left in civilized life takes its beginning. At first, no doubt, the superiority of the right hand was only felt in the manner of fighting. But that alone gave it a distinct pull, and paved the way, at last, for the supremacy elsewhere. For when weapons came into use, the habitual employment of the right hand to grasp the spear, sword or knife made the nerves or muscles of the right side far more obedient to the control of the will than those of the left. The dexterity thus acquired by the right—see how the word "dexterity" implies this fact—made it more natural for the early hunter and artificer to employ the same hand preferentially in the manufacture of flint hatchets, bows and arrows, and all the other manifold activities of savage life. It was the hand with which he grasped his weapon; it was therefore the hand with which he chipped it. To the end, however, the right hand remains especially "the hand in which you hold your knife"; and that is exactly how our own children to this day decide the question which is which, when they begin to know their right hand from their left for practical purposes.—Cornhill Magazine.

A DREAM OF GOLD.

How a Quarter With a Whole in It Was Found After Many Years.

In 1868 Lizzie M. Trask, of Vienna, was dressmaking in Lewiston. She came into possession of a gold twenty-five-cent piece with a hole in it; this she showed as a curiosity to her friends. At that time she had a little niece two years old, daughter of Jonathan P. Trask, now the wife of Leman Butler, trader in Mount Vernon. The little coin Lizzie once showed to her niece when she was a very small girl, telling her that she would give it to her when she was old enough to take care of it. Lizzie died twelve years ago. In her possession was a good ladies' wallet with several compartments. This wallet her mother used until her death seven years ago. Then James, a brother of Lizzie's had it, and it has been in constant use almost daily ever since, either by him or his wife. The little gold coin was never seen after Lizzie's death or before for several years by her friends, and its whereabouts were not known and in fact its existence had passed from their memory. A few days ago Mrs. Butler made her parents a visit, stopping with them several nights.

While there she dreamed that she saw her Aunt Lizzie's wallet and that it was faced with green and in a certain compartment she found the little gold coin which she saw so many years ago. On telling her mother her dream she was informed that Lizzie did have a wallet which answered her description and that her Uncle James had it. The wallet Addie had never seen. She then visited her uncle and told her dream to her aunt, who laughed at the idea of any thing being in it other than what she and her husband had placed there. But at Addie's earnest solicitation she produced it and as soon as Addie saw it she exclaimed: "That is the same wallet that I saw in my dream," and pointed out the compartment that held her treasure. She then took a needle, and, running it to the bottom, she drew forth a small piece of newspaper and in it was indeed a gold quarter with a hole in it, wrapped, no doubt, by the hands of her aunt at least twelve years before, where it had lain all this time, and no one knows how much longer, without the knowledge of any one until Addie's dream caused it to be brought forth.—Augusta (Me.) THE ARIZONA KICKER.

A Western Editor's Views on Various Matters and Things.

STOP IT.—There's too much poetry in this Western country—ten times too much. Every week fifty or more men and women in this locality, who ought to be engaged hoeing potatoes or making rag carpet, worry the life out of the best part of seven days to "dash off" a poem for the Kicker. Not one out of five hundred is true poetry, and not more than one out of a bushel is worth publishing. There should be a law applying to the country west of Omaha—a law to make it a penal offense to send a poem to a newspaper unsolicited. We are satisfied that this rhyme-jingling has retarded the growth of the West twenty years, and it will continue to work against us until there is a law to stop it.

NOT APPRECIATED.—The efforts of a hundred or more of our citizens to make up for the lack of natural scenery in and around the town by standing on the street corners with legs crossed and hands in pockets is not appreciated by those competent to judge of effects. It is pretty hard for a red-eyed old squat like Judge Harrison to pose in such a way as to pass for a noble cataract, and the efforts of Major Philbrick to pass himself off as a substiture for a precipice five hundred feet high brings ridicule on the whole county. Gentlemen, your proper pose is in a lock-step line. We are advising you as a friend.

WE CAN'T SEE IT.—Our contemporary down the street is tickled almost to death because Major Bilden has been appointed postmaster of this town, and because, as it affirms, the editor of the Kicker got left. We can't see any thing to laugh at. We were the best man by long odds among the twenty applicants, and if Wanamaker couldn't see it the fault was not ours. We expected to get the appointment and ought to have had it. The man who did get it doesn't know enough to run a peanut stand and if the Kicker doesn't make his life miserable for the next year then we don't want a cent. As for our old knock-kneed, bald-headed, squint-eyed contemporary who wears a grin on his phiz, we will see him later. We are fishing to get hold of the chattel mortgage given on his office three months ago, and if we succeed he will hear something drop.

WE STAND NEUTRAL.—The editor of the Kicker has been asked to express his opinion on the conduct of President Harrison in furnishing fat places to so many of his relatives. We stand neutral on that question, having an application on file in Washington to be appointed Indian Commissioner for this reservation. If we don't get the appointment we shall have a very decided opinion on Mr. Harrison's nepotism. If we do get it we shan't bite the hand which feeds us.

ONE MORE CHANCE.—Billy Dobson, proprietor of the Blue Front saloon and gambling house, was the first subscriber to the Kicker. He encouraged us and occasionally lent us money, and our gratitude has prevented us from drawing attention to his den of iniquity. We can't promise to hold off much longer. We shall give him one more chance to reform the place, and if he doesn't improve it we shall give him three or four columns per week of the hottest kind of language. Gratitude is all right up to a certain limit. Beyond that an editor owes a duty to the public.

PLEASE EXCUSE.—Our proof-reader was off on a drunk last week and our two printers were called to Tombstone to see their mother die. We were very busy in our grocery, harness shop, hardware and millinery store, and the Kicker did not present the appearance and interest we could have wished for. We had to chuck in six columns of old patent medicine ads, and the first page was the same matter as the week previous, but these things are trifles incidental to the business of a great publishing house. We trust that our subscribers will overlook all mistakes and encourage us to greater efforts by promptly renewing their subscriptions.—Detroit Free Press.

Manufacture of Celluloid.

The manufacture of celluloid is largely carried on in France. A roll of paper is slowly unwound and at the same time saturated with a mixture of five parts of sulphuric and two parts of nitric acid, which falls on the paper in fine spray. This changes the cellulose of the paper into pyroxiline, or gun cotton. The excesses of the acid having been expelled by pressure, the paper is washed with plenty of water, and all traces of acid are removed. It is then reduced to a pulp and passes on to the bleaching trough. Most of the water having been got rid of by means of a strainer, it is mixed with from twenty to forty per cent. of its weight in camphor; a second mixture and grinding follows. The pulp is spread out in thin slabs, which are squeezed in the hydraulic press until they are as dry as chips. They are then rolled in heated rollers, and come out in strips, which are ready to be worked up into any desired form.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

SATURDAY SEPTEMBER 7 1889

THE INYO TRAGEDY.

S. F. Chronicle, Sept. 1st.

An opinion was filed by the Supreme Court yesterday in the case of The People vs. W. T. C. Elliott.

The defendant was convicted of the murder of John B. White and sentenced to death by the Superior Court of Inyo County. It appeared from the evidence that the defendant's wife who was a niece of the deceased, had a short time prior to the killing obtained a divorce, and she was given the custody of the only child, with the privilege to the defendant of visiting it at intervals; that the deceased had been residing with his niece as her protector; that a few days before the killing White, without sufficient provocation, brutally attacked and beat the defendant, who was living in a cabin belonging to his divorced wife; that the time for which the defendant was allowed by decree of the Court to occupy the cabin was about to expire, and the uncle showed great anxiety for Elliott to get out, and announced his intention of removing him therefrom at once; that deceased came to the cabin for the purpose of removing defendant, when the defendant picked up a butcher knife and in defense of himself he inflicted the fatal wound. The defendant moved to change the place of trial, as public sentiment was strongly against him, some talk of lynching having been indulged in; but the Court denied the motion, with the result stated.

Several points were made in the appelate court as grounds for a reversal, but the principal ones considered were those in relation to the rulings of the Court on the admission of testimony and the instructions given by the Court in its charge to the jury.

The divorced wife was asked during her examination as a witness for the prosecution, "What was the business of John B. White, the deceased, on the Baker ranch, when he made his last visit there, at the time he was killed?" Counsel for defense objected on the ground that it was hearsay, but the witness was permitted by the Court to answer "that he was there for the protection of me and my children against W. T. C. Elliott the defendant."

The Court held that this was erroneous, and the substancial rights of the defendant were affected by it.

The trial court charged the jury among other things: "When the killing is proved, it devolves upon the defendant to show circumstances in mitigation to excuse or justify by a preponderance of evidence on his part, etc.'

This same instruction was before the court in people vs. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387, and People vs. Raten, 63 Cal., 421, and in both instances it was approved; but in the present case following the People vs. Bushton, opinion filed August 1, 1889, the court holds it erroneous, as in its judgement it is only necessary that the defendant should raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt or the mitigating circumstances.

For the error as the admission of the evidence, and that in regard to the instruction, the judgement and order are reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.—

Game Laws.

A copy of the Fish and Game Laws of California compiled by S. P. Maslin, has been received at this office. In his preface the author says:

"This compilation embraces all the sections of the Codes and all the statutes of the State of California, now in force, relating in any manner to the preservation and protection of the fish and game of this State.

Each chapter contains but one statute or excerption from the Codes, with full reference notes, as to the date of passage and amendments, and no one page contains more than one chapter, thereby allowing ample space for notes, etc.; and the book has been printed in a small and compact form so that it can be easily carried in the pocket.

Altogether the hope is entertained that the volume will be found useful, not only to the professional fisherman and hunter, and the county officers whose duties it concerns, but also that large army upon whom the State must ever in a great measure rely for the protection of her fish and game—the sportsmen of California."

The following sections are taken from the Statutes.

SEC. 626. Every person who in the State of California, between the first day of March and the tenth day of September, in each year, hunts, pursues, takes, kills, or destroys any quail, partridges, grouse, or rail is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who, in any of the counties, of this state, at any time, takes, gathers, or destroys, the eggs of any quail, partridge, or grouse is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who, in this State, between the first say of January and the first day of June, in each year, hunts, pursues, takes, kills, or destroys doves, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who, between the fifteenth day of December in each year and the first day of July in the following year, hunts, pursues, takes, kills, or destroys, any male antelope, deer, or buck, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person in the state of California who has in his posession any hides or skins of deer, elk, antelope, or mountain sheep, killed between the fifteenth day of December and the first day of July, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who shall at any time, in the State of California, hunt, pursue, take, kill, or destroy any female antelope, elk, mountain sheep, female deer, or doe, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who shall at any time hunt, pursue, take, kill, or destroy any spotted fawn is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who shall take, kill, or destroy any of the animals mentioned in this section, at any time unless the carcass of such animal is used or presented by the person slaying it, or is sold for food, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Every person who shall buy, sell, offer, or expose for sale, transport, or have in his posession any deer, or deer skin or hide, from which evidence of sex has been removed, or any of the aforesaid game when it is unlawful to kill the same, provided by this and subsequent sections, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 631. Every person who shall at any time net or pound any quail, partridge or grouse, and every person who shall sell, buy, transport, or give away, or offer or expose for sale, or have in his posession, any quail, partridge, or grouse, that have been snared, captured, or taken, in or by means of any net, or pound, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Proof of posse sion of any quail, partridge, or grouse, which shall not show evidence of having been taken by means of other than a net or pound, shall be prima facie evidence in any prosecution for a violation of the provisions of this section that the person in whose posession such quail, partridge, or grouse is found took, killed, or destroyed the same by means of a net or pound.

SEC. 632. Every person who, in the State of California, at any time takes or catches any trout, except with hook and line, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Any person or persons who shall at any time take, procure, or destroy any fish of any kind, by means of explosives, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Inyo Academy.

The Academy at Bishop will re-open for the Fall term next Tuesday morning. Rev. G. W. De La Matyr Financial Agent, is in correspondence with a competent teacher in the East, whom he expects to secure for the principalship. That the school may begin on time, Rev. E. McEvers, A. B., who was formerly a teacher, and had many years experience in that line in schools and colleges, has consented to conduct the institution until the arrival of the new Principal. It is the intention of the Board to spare no effort to give the Academy the highest possible standing, and to furnish good tuition to students at as low a figure as practicable, so as to meet the demand for a school of higher grade in this Valley, and present inducements to bring patronage from other localities in the mountains.

Agricultural Park.

The new race track at Camp Independence is nearly completed. Mr. Vagt has labored unceasingly to have it ready in time for the coming fair, and has been at a great expense to arrange conveniences for horsemen. The soil is excellent and the location is all that could be desired, there being plenty of shade and good water. A number of flyers will be in training there next week and the place will assume a lively appearance. The Fort people should be deeply grateful to Mr. A. W. Eibeshutz, whose untiring efforts in their behalf secured them the agricultural park.

Excursion Rates.

"To those desiring to attend the California State Fair the Carson & Colorado railroad will issue from Saturday, September 7th, to Saturday, September 21st, 1889, tickets from Bishop, Alvord, Independence, Lone Pine and Keeler to Reno and return at $20, passengers purchasing tickets at Reno to Sacramento and return at $9.40. These tickets will be void after Monday, September 23d, and have no stop over privilege."

The Breton Mills

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy and published by arrangement with him.]

When the crowd came up and followed him in, they found him before the glowing forge. His sleeve was rolled up, revealing an arm almost like the smith's, but how closely he was studying it. Just below the elbow were the marks of a dog's fangs, out of which slowly oozed two great drops of blood. No one dared to speak; all looked on him as a man devoted, and half expected to see already the signs of madness on his calm, pale face. The men with the guns had come in with the rest, and stood under the rows of horse shoes that lined the blackened walls, with horrified eyes riveted on the print of the poisoned fangs. The blacksmith stood by his anvil, hammer in hand, as if frozen, and even Philip Breton was stunned and baffled at the sudden revelation of the fate stamped on this man who had given his life for Bertha's. Philip had been devising how rare a gift of undying friendship he could give him in token of his gratitude, and now a terrible death must be his only reward.

But the face of the victim was as composed as if death had already claimed him. He did not seem to see one of the silent forms that thronged the little shop. Then he looked carefully at the wound in his arm and pressed out the drops of poisoned blood. In another instant he had reached out his right hand toward his forge and grasped the end of a bar of iron that shone at white heat where it touched the coals. He drew it out before one could catch his breath and held it close against the death mark in his quivering flesh. A sickening hiss brought a cry of sympathy from the astonished crowd, but his lips never moved till the cure was completed. He threw back the iron, and grinding his teeth in his agony turned on his heel and went out.

At the door was a face paler than his. Bertha Ellingsworth had seen it all. As he looked at her white face and golden brows and lashes, Curran thought of wreaths of strands of gold on the driven snow. But her eyes had a new fathomless expression in them, and her lips were parted as if to speak, if there were only words sweet and gentle enough. His face flushed with a delicious gladness deeper than his pain, as she made him hold out his arm for her, and touched it with mysterious tenderness, and bound her handkerchief about his charred and aching wound.

"And you can't disappoint your audience? How brave you are. But you will come to me to-morrow?"

"If you wish it." The crowd had gathered outside the door, and stood a little way off, curiously watching them.

"I wish I could repay you," she said, looking wistfully up at him.

But Curran's face flushed crimson, and he drew back from her as if he had been stung.

As she looked at him, a flush slowly came into her face, too. "Would you like to kiss me, just once?"

The man turned and drew her to his heart, and her eyes fell till their long golden lashes touched her cheek, as he stooped and kissed her pouted red lips.

CHAPTER VIII.

HIS MISTAKE.

It was quite dark when the carriage turned the last bend in the winding road homeward and the lights of Bretonville came into view. The lights in the windows of the poor danced out to meet the tired horses as gayly as any. There might have been a sobbing woman behind the cheriest of them all; nature shows no sympathy for human suffering. If her poor children have no rest and joys their hearts must break; that is one of nature's laws. Neither can light lose its gladness and cheer because gladness and cheer are so absurdly out of place in poverty stricken homes. Homes indeed! As if the circles that were gathered within most of those windows deserved the name of home, with never a smile of contentment to light up a face, or a word of hope to make music for a dulled ear. Home to such as they is the place where the cravings of hunger are quieted and the tired cords and muscles are relaxed for a new strain; where they can complain and where they can sleep and die. But save the word to them at least, for a time when it shall be a reality.

Suddenly the sound of fire bells fell upon Philip's ear and startled him out of his melancholy revery. The same instant he saw a little cloud of smoke above the brick mills, and then a bright tongue of flame leap up toward it. The bells pealed out in short nervous strokes as if in tremulous fear, and at their impulse the young man's blood coursed through his veins in uncontrollable excitement. It was but two minutes more when Philip drew up short at the mill yard gates, to escape the engine which swept by with a rush, dragged by a crowd of shouting men. The people hatless, coatless, and some even barefooted in their haste, poured out of every street and alley way, and into the wide open gates, everybody talking and nobody listening.

But Bertha had hardly spoken during the drive home, and now seemed very little interested in the disturbance.

"The mills are on fire," cried Philip, dropping his reins and turning his excited face toward her.

"So I see," she said coolly, "and hadn't you better drive on?"

"Why, I ought to be here." He looked nervously at the hurrying crowd and back into Bertha's cold beautiful face. "Couldn't you wait in one of these tenements? These are all nice people."

But she made no motion, and only looked at his flushed face in annoyed surprise. "What are you thinking of? I stop with these people?"

"Or drive on home without me. The horses are gentle and you are such a good driver, you know."

Philip was growing terribly restless; the people came faster and faster, and his eager eyes followed each man and woman into the gates with increasing anxiety. Even Bertha noticed the curious looks the passers by gave to the carriage that blocked the way.

"I couldn't think of it," she said in measured tones that reminded Philip, even at such a moment as that, of her father's. "You had better drive along; there, not so fast. Why will you run the horses? You almost frighten me."

It took but a few moments to reach Bertha's home, but it seemed a long time to Philip, who kept looking back over his shoulder at the flames which to his excited fancy seemed rising higher at every glance. He stopped the horses at Bertha's door at last, and leaping to the ground, assisted her to alight. The horses were panting, but there was no time even to give them breath, and in an instant more Philip was back in his seat. But Bertha stood as if she had something to say, and he waited before he drew up the reins.

"You will make a mistake in leaving me to myself to-night."

He thought there was a mysterious touch of self distrust in her voice that was soft and almost tender as she looked fixedly at him. Ah! he had never seen her so lovely; as if the warm passionate woman soul had been born in her; and he longed in his rapture to to fall at her feet and kiss them. He was forgetting the mill in flames as he drank in the new sweet hope she seemed to give him. He could not leave her thus with that wonderful light in her eyes. No doubt the fire was subdued, and how little he could do at best; there were so many stronger than he.

But suddenly a tongue of flame leaped up into the black sky like lightning.

"I would so love to stay, darling, but the mills are on fire—my father's mills. I might save them. Don't you understand—it would be infamous in me to"——

"I only said you make a mistake."

Till he dies Philip Breton never will forget that scene; the darting flames beckoning him away, and this beautiful woman, for whose first fond caress he would have given everything but his manhood and honor, inviting him to stay. And in her changed face he thought he saw such sweet promise of love if he stayed and such sure presage of evil if he went.

"Good night," he said with faltering voice as he drew up the reins.

"Good night," she answered slowly as she turned to go in, and he thought he heard her other sentence over again, "You make a mistake."

It was Number Two mill on fire, but all that ingenuity and strength could do seemed doing as well without Philip. The men were as busy as bees. Fifty manned the brakes of the hand engine, and pumped as vigorously as if there was no such thing as lame backs and aching muscles, while on top of the engine beside the bell, which rang with every stroke of the brakes, stood their foreman keeping time with his arms and whole body, and encouraging them with his hoarse, excited voice. Then there were three hydrants in full operation and a crowd of men to keep the hose in condition, and four more in rubber suits to hold the nozzles and direct the streams of fast flowing water where it would quickest subdue the fierce flames. There seemed nothing for Philip to do. He was worth no more than the crowd of chattering women, who stood as near the fire as their rough voiced men would let them. How old their thin white faces looked, half hid by the shawls tied about their heads. It was a great event in their dull, monotonous lives; the very foundations of their world seemed shaken, and they could not talk fast enough to express their crude thoughts at the breaking up of old associations.

"Carry the hose up to the next story," shouted the foreman.

"The ladder is not long enough," answered one of the men in rubber suits.

"Can't you climb? Who can, then?"

This was Philip's opportunity, and he hurried up the ladder two rounds at a time. Then he swung himself off on the lightning rod. Its sharp edges cut his tender hands, but in his eagerness he did not notice it. In a moment more he had pulled himself up to the window sill and burst in the sash. Then he reached down for the hose and a cheer went up for the rich man's son who was not afraid of work.

He heard his father's voice below thanking the men for their devotion, as the sullen flames seemed to give way before their tireless efforts. But it was no time now for idle felicitations. The fire seemed under control, but if the mastery were relaxed, it would leap high again in its fury, and the other mills must go too, for all they stood now so cold and proud. The smoke grew thinner in the window where Philip stood, so he could look down on the sweaty faces and bending forms of the men at the brakes. Everything depended on them, and how strong they sent the water through the hose he held, and forced back the fire inch by inch from its prey. If they could only keep it up a few moments more the mills would be out of danger. Each stroke of the brakes made the hose throb against his side almost like a giant's pulse. God grant them strength a few moments more.

"Wise boys ye be, to clench the nails in yer own coffins. Ain't this mill yer jail and its bosses your jailers? Is there a fool of ye all, but knows old Breton who grins so nice to-night on ye, but knows him for a tyrant, who grinds us to powder?"

Philip saw a short, burly man whose hair was cropped close to his round head, shouting and gesticulating wildly, as he made his way up to the engine and then leaped upon it. The brakes stop moving and the fire sends up new tongues and leaps along the smoking beams and rafters in fresh fury, while the men listened breathlessly to this stranger. The women too gather nearer, and look in curiosity at their husbands and brothers who drink in so eagerly his poisoned word.

"I spose ye thought ye didn't work long enough for yer ninety cents a day. But ye hev. Ay, boys, that big heap o' brick stands for that old man's meanness; it's the machine to crush ye. It's the way he bleeds ye. But how sweet he is to nigh. Ye never noticed it before, did ye? He's seed you a starvin' on the wages he paid, and yer purty darters gone to the bad for the want of a few things all gals kinder like. Some on ye, too, has got old and cripples in his service. He aint ever guv a mite, has he? Now it's your turn."

And the man shouted loud above the hissing, crackling flames that leaped out of a dozen windows in wild glee. "Let his mills burn fur a warnin' to such as he who make so much sorror and misery in this cye purty world that if Satan tortured their cruel souls forevermore, it wouldn't be a feather in the balance. Let him know the despair of a poor man for once."

It was almost madness that glittered in the fellow's darting eyes, and his voice grew hoarse and terrible as he pointed his thick fingers at the mill half hid in smoke, lit up in spots with forks of flame.

"Let every plank of it go. It's only served to make him richer each month, and ye poorer. Such a machine as that don't deserve to stand. Let his riches he's used so poor turn to ashes this night. Tears and prayin' couldn't git equal rights for us; the fire will do it, though."

Ezekiel Breton elbowed his way into their midst.

He had lost his hat, and stood pale in his agony in the presence of the men who thought he had wronged them. He was conscious of no guilt; he had only made his money as others made theirs; fairer, indeed, than mere money lenders, who added nothing to the world's productions. He knew, of course, the poor suffered, but a man can't be too squeamish, and the same road was open to them that he had taken. And as for wages, who could blame a man for getting help as cheaply as he can? That is business.

Mr. Breton knew but one argument for them.

But not a face relaxed; he looked fearfully from one to another, and then up at the grinning face of the stranger, "only save my mill." The old man put up his hand to his white hair in a piteous gesture as he glanced at the sheets of flame and lurid smoke that shut off the sky above his devoted mill.

"See the fire grows every second, we are lost unless you go to work; I will pay ten dollars an hour."

The brakes began to move slowly up and down. Philip felt the water throb through the hose as it touched his side, but it was only one fitful spurt, for the stranger, who seemed to hold the mills at his mercy, had found his voice again.

"Keep yer money, old man; you will need every penny of it, for you've cheated yer last out of yer help in them mills. Yer mill hez got to go."

Philip saw his father turn toward his mills, the pride of his life, and look as fondly at their grim walls as a man on the woman he loves, and the tears of futile agony wet his cheeks. That moment the young man aged ten years.

The crowd fell back again, and another speaker mounted the strange rostrum. He looked young for such a crisis, but there was a new suggestion of power in his lips and the sullen crowd wondered what he thought he could say to persuade them.

"I suppose," began Philip slowly, as if every minute might not be worth a fortune, "I presume," and his voice sounded dry and hard, "you will want your wages as usual, next pay day. Is there any one of you foolish enough to imagine you will get them if the mills go?"

Then the young man glanced at the burly stranger, who, clearly enough, was taken aback by this new style of appeal to a crowd.

"Possibly this broad shouldered friend of yours is going to find a living for you. You have got to find it somewhere, and you won't have particularly good characters to recommend you to new tyrants.

"Mind, men, I don't say but it is quite fair, but mill owners manage their business about the same way. It is all very well to complain, but the first necessity is a place to work; if there isn't that, you surely can't have any rights. I may as well tell you, the mills are heavily insured, and you can't quite have the rare satisfaction of seeing that old man ruined. But I doubt if he will care to put any more mills under such extra risks. Some of your women and ignorant people, who don't see the fun of starving, may think you have done a poor night's work."

The stranger had disappeared, and the faces of the men, clustered about their engine, had lost their sullen cast. The young man's black eyes glistened in the new ecstasy of an orator's triumph.

"One thing I will promise. I will do what I can in your behalf. I know the lines of most of you have fallen into hard places, and I promise if I can see any way to lighten the burden of life on your shoulders I will help you."

The men returned to their work with a murmur of approval. Was it too late?

The brakes started up again. The men ran up the ladders again, with the hose in their hands, in the renewed battle with the fire. Philip had moved the crowd. He had chosen instinctively the only method for the crisis, while the flames crackled and flashed in high carnival. But was it not too late? The men were working with new energy; new hopes were in their hearts. The mill owner's son had promised to help them; he sympathized with their cheerless poverty, and who could do more than he?

If the whole line of mills went it would be upon their consciences, and the thought put fresh strength into their weary arms and more fearless courage into their hearts. But precious time had been lost and the wind had changed so that now the red, greedy tongue of flame lapped the frowning brick walls of the next mill, and lavished their hot, wanton kisses as if it were love and not hate whose fury would consume them.

When the moon was setting in the west, that night, Mr. Breton found his son all grimy with smoke, with clothes torn, and drenched in water, out of all semblance to the gentleman of elegant leisure. He stood by the smoldering ruins of Number Two mill.

"Aren't you coming home to-night, Philip, my dear boy? How proud Bertha would have been if she could have seen her hero to-night."

Bertha! What a strange influence her words and manner at parting had left upon him; as if, some way, in leaving her just when he did, he had lost her forever. God forbid! He could not shake it off; it was with him as he waited almost alone in the great mill yard; all the excitement and responsibilities of the night had not dispelled it. He looked down moodily into the smoking mass of crumbled walls and roof and blackened timbers, and watched for the little forks of flame that started up boldly, now and then, as if it were not yet too late for a new battle, and then seemed abashed at finding themselves alone in the dark, and sank back.

"You have saved the mills," said his father, wringing his bruised hand till it hurt him. "God bless you, my son. I didn't guess how much there was in you."

Philip looked up at the scorched walls off on the right, and the long pile of massive structures away to the left, unshaken by the whirlwind of fire. In a few hours more they would be alive with rushing belts and wheels, and with the feet of the men and women, telling how strange it was there was a place left for work today. Yes, he had saved them, "but at what price?" He spoke half to himself. If he only knew what Bertha had meant.

"What price? Oh, your promise to do what you could for the men and all that. It was guardedly put, my boy." And his father laughed appreciatively. "Inexorable parent must be considered, though, ha, ha. You will catch your death of cold. Well, if you will stay, good night."

CHAPTER IX.

WEAK MAN.

It was at dusk a few days after Jane Graves had come to the Ellingsworths that she stood at the dining room window.

It was almost in sight of her old dreary home, and yet another world; how strange that the two should be so near and not change or shadow each other. But Jane Graves was not the girl to trouble herself over hard questions. She breathed her new atmosphere in unmixed delight, while latent senses awoke each day only to be gratified.

At this moment she stood in a very charming attitude leaning lightly against the window casing, her prettily rounded arm raised to play with the curtain tassel. Her master rather liked to linger in the dining room at read his evening paper. Occasionally he would glance at the girl who had such pretty poses; he had quite a taste for pictures, and then she afforded him an excuse for not a little cynical philosophy. Mr. Ellingsworth had one peculiarity that would certainly seem very commendable. He never spoke rudely to any one; it would have been impossible for his finely grained nature. She thought him polite and kind, and in her innocence imagined his was the usual manner of the well bred with their hirelings. The other servants knew that humiliation was a part of their required week's work, which their wages were considered to pay for; and expected to see the thunderbolt fall on this foolish girl who did not know how precious was the purchased privilege of being cringed to. But strange enough the thunderbolt did not hasten.

Suddenly the girl started, and a deep flush lit up her dark face. Up the walk, to the front doorway, came the man of whom she thought, with his own lordly stride as if he were a prince, indeed, as he deserved to be. Her heart was in a sweet glow; he had found her out, and had come for her. She would leave all these beautiful things with rapture for him.

Mr. Ellingsworth saw the man's figure at the front gate, and the girl's start, and smiled rather disagreeably. He had wondered before why her lover didn't come, and here he was at the front door, no doubt expecting to be entertained in the parlor.

Jane Graves glided into the hall. Suddenly grown shy at the maiden passion of her own heart, she slowly opened the front door. What would he say first? Would he take her hand which had grown so white and soft lately? Would he ask to kiss her, and with beating heart she stood in the open doorway.

A SMALL FORTUNE.

Charley Nester Draws a $15,000 Prize in The Louisiana State Lottery.

Beyond a doubt the happiest man in the city to-day is Charles P. Nester, the young book-keeper with A. Bauman. About a month ago young Nester invested one dollar in the Louisiana State Lottery, and at the June drawing of that concern he drew one-fortieth of the first capital prize of $600,00.

After being assured by telegraph from head quarters that his ticket, No. 61,605, entitled him to a share of the big prize, he immediately placed it in the hands of the Hocking Valley National Bank for collection. They forwarded it to their banking agents at Cincinnati, and the ticket was on its way to New Orleans long before many knew of the young man's good luck. Just one week from the day of sending, Mr. Nester was notified by the bank people that the ticket had been cashed, and $15,000, less $35, the charges for collection, had been placed to his credit, and was subject to his order at the Hocking Valley Bank.

The young man received the news with considerable joy, and he was busy for some time receiving the congratulations of his many friends. It is seldom that any one receives a sum of this size, either by inheritance or otherwise, and coming as is does, on the eve of his manhood, it will be a splendid starter should he wish to branch out in a business enterprise.

Mr. Nester is yet in his twentieth year, and is a son of the late P. Nester. Since quitting school he has been employed by different parties as book-keeper, and served as mail weigher in the postal service during the latter months of Cleveland's administration. He has only been investing in Louisiana State Lottery tickets for the last five months and then went in with a pool of ten or more and bought the tickets jointly. Last month he went in alone, and it is not likely that he will ever regret his action.

He has not yet decided what disposition to make of his money, but thinks of investing it in first mortgage securities and live from the interest.—Lancaster (Ohio) Eagle, July 4.

because, having taken Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to cleanse his system, tone it up, and enrich the blood, and finding that it always produces the desired result, he considers that he would be foolish to experiment with anything else. His motto is, "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good." That's why he pins his faith to the "Golden Medical Discovery."

in the kidneys. When inactive they speedily fall into disrepair. Those obstinate and fatal maladies, Bright's disease and diabetes, ensue with terrible certainty upon the inaction of the organs affected. Catarrh of the bladder, enuresis, gravel and strangury are also to be apprehended from a partial paralysis of the bladder, of which weakness and sluggishness are the causes. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fine tonic and promoter of activity for the renal organs, and one which can be relied upon to afford them the requisite stimulus without exciting them—an effect to be feared from the unmedicated alcoholic excitant of commerce. A further beneficent effect of the Bitters, by renewing activity of the kidneys, is to enable them to drain from the blood in its passage through them, impurities productive of rheumatism and dropsy. Nervousness, fever and ague, constipation and dyspepsia are conquered by the Bitters.

HOW I SAVED MY LIFE.

I was taken sick while at the dinner table with terrible distress in my stomach. Before this I had been hearty and strong. For fourteen days I kept getting worse, despite the efforts of two doctors. I lost forty pounds, and was satisfied that I could live but a few days. My trouble was Stomach and Liver Complaint, resulting in an attack of bilious colic. At this time I saw Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., advertised, and sent for a bottle. I also sent for my physician, and told him that I was going to try the Favorite Remedy. He examined it and told me to use it three days and let him know the result. In the three days I walked four miles. Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy has saved my life.—W. S. AN ADAPTIVE STEED.

A Typographical Blacksmith's Blunder and its Consequences.

I inserted the following advertisement in our village paper the other day:

WANTED—A small house for the season. Apply, etc.

and have had a great deal of soul-twisting sport out of it. The compositor, who works in a bait-factory five days in the week, performed a notable feat in re-creation, by making a "horse" out of a "house," and I've been holding a Tattersall's reception ever since.

Before the paper was printed, the top of a torn livery stable bill-head was handed in to me one evening, and following this informal card came the proprietor himself. Ere I could explain that it was a chalet and not a palfrey that I wanted, he had preached this enticing sermon:

"Cae 'r th' Mirror's proof-sheets blowed out th' winder, an' I seen into it that you wanted a small hoss. I've got one that's smaller than Uncle Tobe Benham, an' he's small 'nough t' feed seed cat'logues to a shoat. Small? Why, I let her out t' other day in a village cart to old Miss Welkin an' she didn't know more'n t' set right plum over th' axle. When that fat tarrier of hern jumped in behind, what does th' hull outfit do but turn a back han' spring, an' th' hoss, she came down flat on her saddle jest th' opposite of where she was, an' Miss Welkin shut up like a deer-knife 'tween th' seat an' th' gutter."

I ventured to hint that I had no idea of buying a horse, but the dealer evidently thought this a mere subterfuge to knock him down on price, and he kept right on:

"You needn't be 'fraid that she's too small, though," he said. "She's th' knowin'est thing you ever see.

"I've got three sets of harness fer her, each on 'em one size bigger than t' other. When I let her out to Mr. Freeson, the parson, she knows he's kinder dign'fied, an' she draws herself up, an' stan's on tip-toes, an' swells out, so's I have t' put on number one.

"Then when they's a funeral, an' things is kinder av'rage all 'round, she's what yer call nommal, an' number two goes; but when Sile Dyer hires her t' let his rickety boy go up t' Kensico for cider, you'd orter see her! She sort'r shrinks all up, an' draws her legs in, an' coughs jest as nat'ral as p'nsumption.

"Jest think how handy she'd be for you 'round th' place. She'll eat any thin'. Brigand, th' butcher, tells me that you always run a bit short toward th' last of the week. That's th' time she'll haul in, an' be contented with p'tater-skins an' old curl-papers. Then when things gits better, an' you have a fair dinner, she'll put on her nex' size, an' 'dapt herself t' what lobster-salad an' fixins you have left over; an' Mondays after th' Sunday dinner she'll expand, an' you won't have t' have no refuse carts a-comin' inter th' yard. She's sound an' kind, Mister Gotman, an' afraid of nothin'."

Here was a loop-hole of escape, and I crawled through.

"If I bought a horse," I whispered, "I should like one just like yours; but that last clause rather decides me not to make a trade. As my wife and children would probably drive it more than I should (here I edged him toward the door), I should have to insist on an animal that is not afraid of any thing."

"That's what I mean," he wailed; but I pushed him out on the front porch and locked the door.—Puck.

Queen Margherita of Italy.

Queen Margherita of Italy possesses many graces and accomplishments, and while she is well versed in classic and modern literature, she is also one of the best violoncello players of the day. Wishing to pay special tribute to Italian genius, she not long ago had published at her own expense, for the education of her son, an elaborate edition of Dante's works, containing much that has been written about the poet, with the reproduction of every picture inspired by him. She is also an ardent patron of the arts and industries of her country, and under her fostering care the manufacture of Burano lace, once apparently lost, was saved from extinction. Her alms-giving is munificent but practical, and in her religion she is neither a bigot nor a freethinker. Her attitude toward public questions has been so wise and politic that she is generally loved by the people, and the greatest criticism made of her by her enemies is that she does not dress in good taste.—Harper's Weekly.

Superstition's Curse Was on Him.

Swipsey—Yes, mum, I'm lookin' for work. I'm poor an' most starved. Can't ye get me some grub an' a job?

Farmer's wife (handing out a generous meal)—Poor fellow! Eat this, and then my husband will give you work at thirteen dollars a month. He needs a man.

Swipsey (at a safe distance)—'Xcuse me, mum. I'm ashamed to own it, but I'm a bit superstitious, an' I couldn't take the job 'cause thirteen is an unlucky number.—Judge.

A BUDDHIST CEREMONY.

Services for the Repose of Those Who Perished on the Oneida.

A peculiar ceremony was performed on May 4, 1889, at the Ikegami temple, Omori, in connection with the bones recovered from the sunken man-of-war Oneida, wrecked nineteen years ago in collision with the Pacific and Oriental steamer Bombay. The idea originated with a Japanese firm of wreckers, who purchased the wreck of the Oneida. They recently concluded operations for the recovery of salvage. During this work they found a number of bones. These remnants of what had once been human life were first taken to the American Consulate and thence removed to the hospital, where they at present remain. They will probably be interred in the plot in the Yokohama cemetery, where a memorial stands over the remains taken from the Oneida soon after the collision.

It was to these bones that the service bore a relation. The ceremony may not accord with American or European ideas, but the source from which it emanated and the sympathetic spirit which conceived it must command the purest admiration. It was the recognition of estimable sentiment manifested which prompted a large number of foreigners to attend at the performance of the rites at the ancient temple of Daishi-in. The promotion of the ceremony by the Japanese and the foreign presence accorded was warm evidence of the absence of national distinctions and of the possession of commendable mutual religious tolerance. The sympathy was manifested by modes curious to Western canons of religious observance, but the spirit which inspired it is one of the finer feelings none too common in the world to-day.

Included in the party of one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty who left Yokohama by train to attend the ceremony were C. R. Greathouse, United States Consul-General, Admiral Belknap, twenty American naval officers, American men-of-war's men, and the French and Russian Consuls-General.

When the guests had seated themselves in the beautiful temple seventy-six priests entered, intoning a weird chant to the accompaniment of native instruments, and afterward formed around the altar, where incense was burned and on which offerings of bread were placed. At intervals flowers were also cast on the altar by the chief priests. This portion of the service occupied about fifty minutes. At its conclusion Amenomori Nobunari fluently delivered an oration in English, explaining the significance of the ceremony and the belief of the Buddhist.

After the address the priests filed out from the temple and conducted the foreigners to a point in the grounds where there had been erected a tablet standing thirty feet high, on which were inscribed several Buddhist texts, the date when the Oneida was lost, and the names of those who went down with her. This tablet was dressed in a beautiful floral framework. Here the priests again formed round, burned incense and offered up prayers for those in whose memory the monument had been erected. This ended the ceremony. The foreigners were next escorted through the gardens, taken through the temple, shown its rich and costly relics of times and deeds which have passed forever, each presented with a bag of sweetmeats, and then they departed.—Japan Gazette.

A SCHEME SPOILED.

Mother's Method of Treating the Sick Boy Nipped in the Bud.

He looked very pale, tired and dejected as he threw himself on the lounge in the dark corner of the room.

"Mom, I'm so sick," he sighed, with a suppressed groan.

"My poor boy! What ails you?"

"Sick."

"What made you so sick?"

"Pa said at dinner time I would be sick if I eat another dampling, but I didn't believe him; I eat another one and I'm sick."

"I'm sorry; I guess I'll have to give you a dose of castor oil."

"I would rather be sick, ma, than to take oil."

"Not if I put it in porter; then you won't taste the oil."

"I don't want the oil."

"Won't you, dear, if I give you a cup of jelly to eat to take the taste of oil out of your mouth?"

"Give me a big piece of cake to eat with the jelly?"

"Yes, dear."

"And a big orange?"

"Yes, my poor sick boy."

"A big bunch of bananas and some candy?"

"Yes, dear."

Andy's father came in at this point and spoiled the boy's prospect of a feast of good things. Going up to Andy and inquiring what the trouble was, Andy's voice became very weak, and in an almost inaudible whisper he gasped "sick." In fact his voice was so weak his sire was obliged to stoop down to catch the word, and at the same time caught the fragrance of a "two-for-five" breath.

"Sick, hey? Been smoking, hey, you young Arab? (Cuffs him.) Smoking cigars, hey? (Boxes his ears.) I'll teach you to smoke. Come along here."

And he takes Andy into the back yard and with a shingle persuaded him to never try again to obtain good things under false pretenses, while his ma stood by ringing her hands in anguish at her dear boy's punishment and mentally voting Andy's father "a brute."—Detroit Free Press.

ALL ABOUT SHARKS.

It was reported the other week that a sailor engaged in scraping the sides of a troop-ship in the harbor of Sierra Leone was drawn into the water and promptly devoured by a shark. This is not an uncommon experience and the Standard reminds us that a boatman has been bitten in the short time it took him to dip up a pitcher of water while his craft was under full sail. We are assured that it is nothing uncommon for the ravenous fish to spring a foot out of the sea in order to secure their prey. For miles they will follow a vessel, on the lookout for any stray unfortunate who may tumble or be thrown overboard, and so deep do they swim under the surface that it requires the practiced eyes of the natives to detect their presence. Many of the West India harbors are so haunted by the white and hammer-headed sharks—the least amiable of the one hundred and fifty different kinds known to zoologists—that it is dangerous to bathe even a few yards from the shore without an outlook being posted.

Yet the West African negro has been known to face the brute, not only with impunity, but even to come off as victor in the end. All but amphibious, the swimmer cautiously approaches his enemy, and then, just at the moment when the great fish turns over to seize him—his mouth being so placed that it is necessary—the daring black plunges his knife into its white belly. The pearl-divers are also sometimes successful in their attacks on sharks which try to seize them, though, it is needless to add, such a mode of combat is possible only when the monsters do not come in numbers, and under the most favorable circumstances requires a coolness, a dexterity and a courage which are not to be acquired except by long experience in such perilous encounters. As a rule, however, it is seldom that a man who is so luckless as to drop among sharks ever appears again. There is a shriek, a white outlook is seen under the surface and a fin above it, a reddened crest tops the next swell which breaks against the ship's side, and the horror-stricken seamen know that their messmate will be seen no more.

It is a well ascertained fact that the skeletons of sheep, pigs, dogs and cattle which had fallen or been thrown overboard have been recovered many days subsequent to their being swallowed; and it is on record that in the stomach of a shark killed in the Indian ocean a lady's work-box was found, while in another the incriminatory papers which had been thrown away by a hotly-chased slaver were recovered from the maw of an involuntary witness thus curiously brought into court on the barb of a pork-baited hook. Ruysch, one of the most trustworthy of the old naturalists, affirms that a man in mail—homo loricatus, he calls him—was found in the stomach of a white shark; and it is recorded by Blumenbach that in one case a whole horse was found. It is undeniable that many have been killed with ample capacity for such undesirable contents; and Basil Hall tells of one out of which was taken the whole skin of a buffalo, besides a host of other trifles which had been dropped astern in the course of the previous week.

Sailors are full of superstitions which touch the superhuman sagacity and incarnate fiendishness of this fish—how, its senses being acute far beyond what we can have any idea of, it will follow ships for days when a death is likely to occur, and desert the wake of the vessel when no such good fortune for it is in the wind. Vatea, the shark god, is the lord of the ocean in the Hervey island mythology, and it is whispered that even the Christianized Hawaiians will still, when in the direst extremity, invoke Mooaru, the shark demon, to whom their pagan forefathers erected temples and offered sacrifice. The pearl divers of Ceylon employ shark charmers to protect them while engaged in their dangerous work. Marco Polo speaks of these officials under the name of the abræmani, who received as wages a twentieth of the divers' gains. At the present day they are called haibandi or shark-binders, and as the divers would not enter the waters without being certain of their services the chief operator receives a government subsidy of ten oysters per diem. The Tahitians deified the blue shark under the name of "Aukua maoo," dedicating it to shrines and priests, and in West Africa rabbits are sacrificed to "John," while, if not sharply watched, it has been affirmed that some of the tribes about the Niger delta will, at fixed times, bind a child decorated with flowers to a post on the beach at low tide and leave it to be devoured by the sharks which come in with the flow, drowning its cries with the noise of drums.—Newcastle (Eng.) Chronicle.

Lack of Courtesy to Wives.

A Western woman, talking of the lack of courtesy on the part of husbands to their wives, says: "When I think I have a hard time, I just think of the women who have no servants, but who themselves care for the children, wash, iron, cook, mend, churn, milk, carry wood and water, all for less than an Irish servant girl's wages. Of course men appreciate their wives, of course they do, but they keep their polite manners and courteous ways for—other men's wives. One time James thanked me for saving him room beside me at the concert, and then sort of apologized for being polite, by saying he thought it was my sister Mary."

The Arizona Kicker.

THE LAST STRAW.—For the last six months Maj. Davis, of this town, has lost no opportunity of abusing us and boasting of what he would do if we did not stop softly. The reason for this conduct lies in the fact that The Kicker not only called him a horse thief, but proved him a bigamist besides. Last Saturday the major, who has no more right to that title than a mule has to that of "professor," borrowed a shot gun and gave out that he had camped on our trail and meant to riddle our system with buckshot on sight. Word was brought to us, and although we were very busy at the time superintending our combined weekly newspaper, harness shop, grocery, bazar and gun store all under one roof, and the largest retail establishment in Arizona, we laid aside our work and went over to Snyder's saloon in search of the major. We found him, and we gave him such a whipping as no man in this town ever got before. He lies a broken and stranded wreck on the shores of time, so to speak, and the doctor says it will be six weeks before he will find any more trails or do any more camping.

SLIPPED A COG.—In company with the elite of this neighborhood we were invited to the adobe of Judge Graham last Thursday evening to witness the marriage of County Clerk Dan Scott to the beautiful Arabella Johnson, only daughter of the aristocratic Widow Johnson, of Bay Horse Hights. The widow had made a spread worthy of the days of Cleopatra, and Dan had on a new suit sent by express from Omaha for the occasion. Everything passed off pleasantly until 8 o'clock, at which hour the bride was discovered to be missing, and investigation soon brought out the fact that she had gone dead back on Dan and skipped the traila, whatever that is, with a bold cowboy named French Jim. She left a message to the effect that she could never, never love a man with a cataract in his left eye, and that meant Dan. There was a feast, but no wedding, and Daniel will have to try again.

EXPLANATORY.—As several versions of the incident that occurred in our office Saturday night are flying around town and have probably been telegraphed all over the world, we deem it but right to give the particulars as they occurred.

We were seated in the editorial chair, writing a leader on the European situation, when a rough character known around town as "Mike the Slayer" called in. As we had never had a word with the man, we suspected no evil. As a matter of fact we reached for our subscription book, supposing, of course, that he wanted the best weekly in America for a year. The slayer then announced that he had come to slay us, not because we had ever done him harm, but because the influence of the press was driving out the good old times and customs.

We retreated towards the door of our harness department.

He pursued us with a drawn knife.

We then felt it our duty to draw our gun and let six streaks of daylight through his body, and as he went down we stepped to the door and sent a boy for the coroner. It was a clear case of self defense, and the inquest was a mere formality. We lament the sad occurrence, but no one can blame us. We paid his burial expenses, and in another column will be found his obituary, written in our best vein and without regard to space. No other Arizona editor has ever done half as much.

NO HARM DONE.—The boys got after a stranger the other evening who was pointed out as a horse thief, and ran him all over town with the object of putting him up to a limb. In some manner he gave them the slip, and in their zeal they got hold of Judge Downey and held him up to a limb for over a minute before the error was discovered. The judge is gauging around with a sore throat and stiff neck and threatens to bring about fifty damage suits.

Take a friend's advice, judge, and hush up. You got off powerful easy, considering your general character. While it was a mistake, the boys were not so far wrong after all. We wish such mistakes would occur oftener.—Detroit Free Press.

The Price of Royalty.

Mrs. Smith—Yes, my daughter Lucy married a blacksmith, and they have a fine home and are getting along nicely. Mary married a butcher, and is very comfortably provided for. Jennie married a section hand, and they are happily situated.

Mrs. Jones—And your daughter Gladys?

Mrs. Smith—Alas! she married a foreign nobleman. I send her $2 per week and some discarded dresses, and by taking in washing she manages to support the family.—Detroit Free Press.

Doctors and Doctors.

First Citizen—Why don't you get Dr. Brownstone for your son? He must be a good physician, for he has a large practice among the Four Hundred.

Second Citizen—Oh, he wouldn't do at all. I want a brain specialist.—New York Weekly.

No Fireworks.

Ella—Well, Ada is to be married next week. I understand it is to be a very quiet wedding.

Bella (who abhors the bridegroom)—I should think they would want to keep it as quiet as possible.—Lowell Citizen.

They Are Never Fast.

First Omahan—I don't know what to put my son at. He shows a disposition to be a little fast.

Second Omahan—Make a messenger boy out of him. That will cure him.—Omaha World.

Poor Woman.

Mrs. Gabble—What an awfully worried, anxious, despairing look Mrs. Goodsoul has.

Mrs. Dabble—Yes, I guess she's stopped doing her own work and gone to keeping a girl.—New York Weekly.

The Reason.

"Van Brush's picture was hung on the line."

"Was it a marine view?"

"Yes."

"They probably hung it on the line to dry."—Harper's Bazar.

Overhead at Tuxedo.

Mrs. Rochette—What is that peculiar noise?

Miss Drissler—It must be that Mr. Auchnunter, of Philadelphia, playing tennis again. He always yells in that way when he gets excited.—Scribner's Magazine.

FACTS ABOUT BABIES.

In the course of a lecture delivered in New York the other day a distinguished female physician said that the inability of a baby to hold up its head was not due to the weakness of the neck, but to lack of development of the will power. The act of standing was instinctive and initiative, while facial expression and gesture were due almost wholly to imitation.

A baby's smile, she said, was the most misunderstood thing in infancy. A real smile must have an idea behind it, but the expression resembling a smile which is so often seen on a very young baby's face was without an idea and was due to an easy condition of the stomach or to some other physical satisfaction. The smile with an idea does not appear earlier than the fourth week. So, too, with the crying of a baby. The contortion of the features is due to physical causes. The baby sheds no tears, because the lachrymal glands are not developed for several weeks after birth. The chief pleasure of all children is to change from one condition to another by their own efforts. This is the beginning of the development of the will power, and is often attested in what has been called the "imperative intention of tears." This is not disclosed until after the second or third month.

A baby tests every thing by its mouth, its sense of taste being the surest and most reliable guide it has. The attention of all young children is difficult to attract and they must attain considerable age before they begin to notice. Then colors and sounds are most potential. Fear has been known to be manifested by a baby only three weeks old, and, in all cases, the sensation is produced by sound more than by sight. Children of luxurious and carefully-guarded homes are almost wholly without fear, but the children of poor and exposed parents always manifest it. Jealousy and sympathy begin to manifest themselves in the second year. Curiosity also begins to develop here and proves to be a self-feeder throughout childhood. A little later the ego begins to appear, and the baby has the first consciousness of itself. The ego first appears as a muscular sense, and the infant gradually learns to distinguish itself from surrounding objects. It is first the hand that is distinguished, and then the foot, and finally the whole body. Memory does not appear before the child is two years of age. All the reasoning of children is primitive and elementary and develops slowly. Darwin noticed an association of ideas in the mind of his child when it was only five months of age. The lecturer related experiences of babies with the first view of mirrors, and showed that their actions under the new conditions were similar to those of anthropoid apes and dogs under like conditions.—Boston Herald.

A BACHELOR'S LAMENT.

He Comments on the Want of Punctuality in the Fair Sex.

I have read an anecdote that runs something like this: A distinguished lawyer, observing that his wife always delayed ten or twelve minutes before she came down to dinner, and being loth to lose so much precious time daily, commenced the composition of a work, which he prosecuted only while he was thus kept waiting. The result was, at the end of fifteen years, a book in three volumes quarto, which has met with a large sale and is much esteemed. The anecdote is told as an illustration of the value of time, and to show how much might be made of the very crumbs and parings of this valuable commodity. But I have always regarded it in a different light. To my mind it stands up as an overwhelming reproach of the fair sex, for the troubles with which they visit us through their thoughtlessness respecting time. Three quarto volumes of sound law—as it probably was—written in fifteen years, during the various quarters of hours which madam spent in superfluous labors upon her dress! In what a strong light does this place the frivolity and non-punctuality of the one sex against the patience and assiduity of the other!

It appears to me that it is woman's chief study to be late. The trial of man's patience is with them a matter of the nicest calculation. It is not that, for mere sport, they like to see how long an unfortunate husband will wait, greatcoated and hatted, while they are adjusting their bonnet strings; it is not that they take a wicked pleasure in causing the poor man's dinner to cool and spoil, before they will consider themselves ready to come down to partake of it; it is not for these reasons that they keep the robuster sex dangling. It is only for the purpose of trying their consequence with the hapless lords of creation. It would be most unwomanish to be ready to go out exactly at the same moment with one's husband. He would not know he had a wife, if she were to study his convenience so far.

As for the troubles which sisters and daughters inflict, it is all one thing. The creatures are only trying on brother or father the powers which they are ultimately to exercise in full vigor on husband. The "natur' of the critter" is to give trouble to mankind, and it matters little on what particular kind of relative the instinct operates.—N. Y. Ledger.

VICTORIA'S DAILY LIFE.

A Peep at the Inner Scenes of the Queen of England's Household.

The inner life of the court has little in it to tempt a Sybarite—simplicity, dutifulness, conscientious performance of work are its characteristics. At nine her Majesty breakfasts alone, unless some of her children, grandchildren or personal friends are staying in the palace, and she is rarely without them. In summer, at Osborne, Windsor or Balmoral, this meal is generally served out of doors, in some alcove, tent or summer-house, after which the Queen drives in a small pony carriage, accompanied by one of the Princesses, or she walks attended by a lady-in-waiting or maid of honor, with whom she converses with friendly ease, and followed by two Highland servants and some favorite dogs.

Luncheon is served at two, the convives being Her Majesty's family or royal guests. Until this hour, from her short after-breakfast exercise, the Queen is diligently occupied with official correspondence and business of various kinds. Long training has made her a politician of no mean ability and breadth of view, her natural common sense forming an admirable basis for such a superstructure. It assists, too, in enabling her to choose her friends well and wisely, though the court surroundings are not calculated to help royal personages in forming a just judgment of character. Human nature puts on a somewhat too angelic guise, where every thing may be won by amiability and nothing by the reverse.

In the mornings the maids of honor (they are nine in all) in waiting for the time are with the Princesses, reading or practicing on the piano, singing or playing lawn tennis with them, as any young ladies, companions together, might. The lady-in-waiting accompanies the Queen in her afternoon drives and visits, which are most frequently to the poor and to humble workers, often to simple gentry or any one in trouble. Afterward this lady reads aloud to Her Majesty in her private sitting room.

The royal dinner hour is 8:30, and that meal is shared by those of the royal family then residing with the Queen, by distinguished visitors and some of the household in rotation, viz., lord and ladies in waiting, maids of honor, equerries and grooms-in-waiting, this latter official holding a considerably lower position than the equerry, though to the uninstructed it sounds like a distinction without a difference.

The Queen is a woman of strict business habits and steady application. The amount of correspondence she gets through is enormous. In the private portion of this correspondence Her Majesty is assisted by her private secretary, a lady-in-waiting, and a maid of honor, especially the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, one of the ladies, who is a valued friend.

When the court is at Windsor the members of the household in attendance are one lady-in-waiting (these ladies are always peeresses), two maids of honor, a lord-in-waiting, two equerries, one groom-in-waiting, also the keeper of the privy purse, the private secretary, assistants in both departments and the master of the household. The attendance is the same at Osborne and Balmoral, with the exception of the lord-in-waiting.

To attend to Her Majesty's toilet and wardrobe there are five maids, viz., three dressers and two wardrobe women. The senior dresser, who has been many years with Her Majesty, is specially charged with the work of conveying orders to different tradespeople—jewelers, drapers, dressmakers, etc.; one dresser and one wardrobe woman are in constant attendance on the Queen, taking alternate days.

Dress is a matter in which, even in her young days, Her Majesty does not appear to have taken much interest. At present her perpetual mourning allows of no crude color combinations. Some of us elders have a pleasant, if vague, recollection of Victoria Regina a good many years ago, say forty or forty-three, in a very simple and becoming bonnet tied beneath the chin, a wreath of wild roses under the brim framing a sweet, kindly young face. Ah, me! sorrow and experience have writ their cruel marks on hers and ours since then.—Cor. Philadelphia Times.

Outwitting An Arab Sheikh.

This old Sheikh demanded to be and was fed, and finally hinted, with unpleasant positiveness, that we had too many tents, and, as one would add greatly to his comfort, he thought we could make the rest of the journey without a dining tent. This was a blow to poor Dragoman Talhamy's patience; but they say a Syrian is never outwitted, and, after deliberate consideration of the plan, he offered to buy the tent of the Sheikh. So with great glee he told us of his bargain. The tent had cost him seventy-five dollars, and he bought it back from the Sheikh for a yard and a half of rope, two cakes of soap, two empty tin cans, and a box of matches; and we continued to eat in comfort.—Mrs. Elizabeth W. Brooks, in Christian Union.

—The following remarkable instrument is the last will and testament of Dolly Jones (colored), of Jasper, Fla., and was signed September 27, 1888: "Farder I want you to take them 2 cows and my biG Pot and 5 head of hoGs and keepe them as long as you live it is my Will for you to have them and do the best you can cos I must di and cant live you must mete me in hevean when dun with wourld."

An Anecdote With a Moral.

The doubts that many shrewd people feel as to the professional insight and honesty of even their pet physicians will get a trifle of confirmation from this little story. There was until within a few years an English doctor whose morning levees were crowded beyond description. It was his pride and boast that he could feel his patient's pulse, look at his tongue, probe at him with his stethoscope, write his prescription, pocket his fee, in a space of time varying from two to five minutes. One day an army man was shown into the consulting room and underwent what may be called the instantaneous process. When it was completed the patient shook hands with the doctor and said: "I am especially glad to meet you, as I have often heard my father, Colonel Forester, speak of his old friend Dr. L." "What!" exclaimed the doctor; "are you Dick Forester's son?" "Most certainly I am." "My dear fellow, fling that infernal prescription into the fire and sit down quietly and tell me what's the matter with you. How can I guess at it and do my duty by you?"—N. Y. Independent.

—Why a West Point resignation was requested.—Lieutenant—"Don't you know enough to salute your superior officer?" New Sentry—"I did, sir." Lieutenant—"I failed to see you." New Sentry—"Just as you came along I said 'ah, there!' but I guess you didn't hear me."—Judge.

COURT NOTES.

TUESDAY, September 10th.

Estate of A. Thiebaut, deceased—October 14th fixed as date for hearing application to mortgage real estate. Hearing petition for order of sale continued until November 1st.

Frank Shaw, of Bishop, was in town Monday night.

Manuel Diaz and J. G. Dodge of Lone Pine, were in town on Thursday.

Mrs. J. A. MacKenzie and her sister, left on Tuesday's train, for Boston.

Mr. Farrington is increasing his working force on the Union Mine at Cerro Gordo.

Dr. I. J. Woodin, A. D. Gilbert, W. K. Miller and several strangers were in Keeler last Wednesday.

Mr. R. L. Peeler was in town this week. He came over from Fresno on a visit and will return in a few days.

Mr. W. J. Lake is able to ride about on horseback. The broken leg only needs time to make it as good as ever.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Jiggens got back to Independence on Monday after an absence of some months in the lower country.

Everybody who can get away from Independence next Monday will attend the celebration of Mexican Independence at Lone Pine.

E. Robinson made a trial of growing sweet potatoes this season. They have done wonderfully well and will turn out a heavy crop of fine potatoes.

Miss Grace McAfee, a recent graduate of the Inyo Academy, has been granted a teacher's certificate, after passing a very successful examination at Hawthorne.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Walker came up from Olancha last Saturday and spent a few days in town. Mrs Walker always makes her visits too short to please friends who hold her in very dear regard.

Quail are very plentiful in the valley this season. Away up in the canyons the larger mountain quail are equally numerous. The shooting season opened last Tuesday, the 10th.

The apportionment of the assessment, of the franchise, roadbed, rails and rolling-stock, of the C. & C. R. R., for and to Inyo County, for the year 1889, is $158-683.00.

R. L Peeler, of Fresno, well and favorably known in this County, was here this week on land business. He leaves for home next Saturday, and will be accompanied by P. W. Forbes.

Mr. Rankle set out apple, pear and plum trees at his place near Kern Lake, and they are all growing well. The trees have now passed two or three winters without the least injury. The altitude is 6,300 feet above sea level.

Charley Laughton must have carried his fiddle with him from Carson to Washington Territory. He has been nominated for Lieutenant Governor by the Republicans of that new State. He held the same office in Nevada.

Judge Caleff, step-father of Sheriff Eldred, has returned to Inyo county after an absence of three years in San Bernardino county, where he was engaged in mining. The Judge and Mrs. Caleff are visiting with Mr. Eldred.

The fair at Bishop will occupy three days, the 9th, 10th and 11th of October. Good races are arranged for and there is every reason to expect an interesting meeting. Bishop has a fine track.

C. S. Swan has completed the reconstruction of the Court-room in the Court-house. The change is a great improvement; the Court-room now extends the entire length of the building from east to west.

All parties who want space in the Pavilion for exhibits should apply at once to Mr. Thos. Kehoe, the Superintendent. On making known to him what exhibits are intended to be made, he will assign the necessary space and location.

A special meeting of the Board of Supervisors will be held on Tuesday, October 8, for the purpose of taking action in the matter of refunding the county indebtedness, appointing a constable for the first Township, or any other business that may require attention.

Mr. Jacob Vagt requests that all who want to keep horses at the new race track will call upon him immediately, and let him know what kind of stalls they want. He is prepared to build stalls of any desired size, if notice be given him at once.

All the horsemen who have examined the new race track speak well of it. The ground is excellent and Mr. Vagt has done good work upon it. There is good shade, plenty of water and suitable buildings. Plenty of hay and grain, of the best quality at market rates.

The Los Angeles Herald says that a large supply of fine water has been found high up in the Death Valley mountains, within reach of mines recently located by Mr. R. B. Taylor, a banker of Riverside, and other parties. Eight mines have been located and the ore goes from $200 to $1,000 per ton.

A half blind invalid was taken into the mountains recently by Ira and Lon. Brown and they, with Billy Grant and Ed. Walker, took the tenderest care of him on a long excursion. To their kindness it is greatly due that health and vigor are restored, and he will feel life long gratitude to his kind friends.

The Fair Directors offer to put up one-hundred dollars for a footrace, on condition that outside parties donate fifty dollars additional, thus making the purse one-hundred and fifty dollars. The race to be run at Independence during fair week; four to enter and three to start. Entrance money ten per cent. of purse. Race free for all comers.

IN THE SIERRAS.

It was intended to publish notes of a trip into the heart of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, recently made by the Editor of this paper. But during the trip so much country was gone over; so many grand and beautiful scenes visited, that the notes of the trip have grown to proportions far beyond what could be condensed into one article for publication in this paper. A very brief and imperfect summary, of the trip is all that will now be attempted.

Leaving the home of Mr. W. Walker, at Olancha, a good trail leads into the mountains. About three miles from the house the trail enters a cañon, and the climb of the mountains begins. The track soon leaves this cañon and winds around the lower end of a great ridge that puts out from the main range; it then enters another great cañon and winds up this to the summit of the mountains. Part of the way is very steep; but the trail is quite safe everywhere, and women and lazy men can ride all the way to the summit, which is easily reached in four hours after leaving Olancha. The summit is eleven thousand five hundred feet above sea level. A short distance north of where the trail crosses the summit Olancha Peak stands up like a monument, having an elevation of twelve thousand seven hundred feet. Just below the watershed is Summit Meadow, winding away like a green river among heavily timbered mountain slopes. From this meadow the trail leads around down the steep mountain sides into Menache a distance of about four miles, all the way in heavy timber. Menache is a beautiful meadow, about six miles long by two miles wide. The North Fork of Kern River flows through it from north to south. It is surrounded on all sides by heavy forest that covers the mountains to their summits; except where bare granite peaks tower away above the timber line. This meadow has an elevation of eight thousand four hundred feet above the sea. Lovely springs abound all along the base of the mountains and many streams pour down their sides and flow into the river. The river and all the larger strems swarm with trout. From Menache excellent trails run in all directions among the mountains. These trails for the most part run through forests, affording delightful shade during the hotter hours of the day. At times the way lies near the summits of high ridges; and looking down a depth of two thousand feet or more, where streams dash in snow-like volume over an endless succession of cataracts, the views are very grand. The sound from these rushing torrents, coming up through the forest from the gulf below, makes music worthy of such scenery.

The Summer nights in this delightful region are lovely beyond description. For weeks together not the slightest breeze stirs the forest at night; and then its stillness is impressive and awe-inspiring beyond anything else in nature. The air is so clear and free from dust and disturbance, that the stars glow with a radiance that is magnificent. Every mountain is covered with a diadem of jewels that sparkle and glow with living light.

From Menache, by way of Templeton and Ramshaw Meadows, the distance to Kern Lake is about twenty miles. Ramshaw has an elevation of about nine thousand five hundred feet above sea level. This is a lovely camping place and fine fishing ground. From here to the base of Mt. Whitney the distance is twenty-five miles. A mile beyond Ramshaw, turning southward, the way leads to Kern Lake, distant about ten miles. This is one of the finest rides in the mountains. The trail is along Whitney Creek, in the forest, or over meadows all the way. Two fine natural bridges cross Whitney Creek; the road passing over the lower one. This bridge is about fifty feet long, by half that width, and spans the stream about twenty feet above the water At this point Whitney is a large stream, rushing down over a very steep and rocky channel, till it disappears like snow in the forest. About two miles below the bridges the stream is forded; and the trail climbs a ridge, till it comes out upon the summit, overlooking the South Fork of Kern River. Here is a view that is worth traveling, over oceans and continents, to see. It is not possible to convey any just conception of this scene, in words. It is indescribable, and must be looked upon to be duly appreciated, and to experience the sensations such grandeur alone inspires. Never was the word "awful" more appropriately used, than when applied to the scene from the summit of that ridge. The way to the bottom of that awful cañon winds in curves down the mountain side. Ia is very steep, but entirely safe. At the bottom of the mountain a narrow flat is crossed; and the river is forded. It is a noble, and very beautiful, stream; the water of a pale green in the deep pools. Standing on a high peak about ten miles above the ford, this great cañon appears like an enomous furrow, plowed deep into the bosom of the earth by Infinite Power. Walls of rock, from two to three thousand feet high, bound it on either side. Lovely little meadows are scattered over the floor of the gorge. Some of the cliffs that overhang are of very grand proportions and impressive forms. One of these is like the pulpits used in old cathedrals. Such a pulpit would be suitable for the delivery of the decalogue. At the base of this awful cliff is a meadow where the Israelites could have assembled to receive the law; but only the voice of Jehovah could be heard from that pulpit by a congregation at its base. A few miles farther up the cañon a large stream leaps over the cliff from the west; and appears to settle down slowly, like immense wreaths of snow, a distance of at least twenty-five hundred feet, in vertical height. Such scenes are not to be described; but only to be gazed at in silence and in awe. Three miles below the ford is Kern Lake; and here another succession of grand scenery occurs: but time and space forbid dwelling upon the subject, at greater length at present. The theme may be taken up again at a future time; perhaps in another form. Then an attempt may be made to give a better conception of the country. The ascent of Mt. Whitney, and the region of which it is the centre, are subjects that ought interest every Californian, and indeed every American. No other land offers so many attractions to tourists as this region of the Sierra Nevada Mountains.

Stupid Vandalism

On the summit of Mount Whitney copies of official papers were deposited by Professor Langley, when he was making scientific observations at the mountain a few years ago. These papers were put inside a tin cylinder, which was deposited in a monument of rocks erected on the mountain top. Parties who were recently on Mount Whitney say the cylinder has been opened and the papers cut and badly mutilated. It is very strange that anyone who would take the trouble to ascend Mount Whitney should do so foolish an act as this. The youngest person who would be able to ascend the mountain must be of an age when more wisdom would be expected than to find any gratification in the malicious destruction of public records, put in such a place. It is to be hoped that there will be no repetition of so shameful an act.

Old Forest Fires.

The sheepmen get the blame for starting most of the forest fires in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. But a trip through the mountains will convince any observer that fires are due to other causes. Near the head of Little Trout Creek, in the next valley southwest from Menache, is a group of five tamarack trees. The largest of these is about four feet in diameter and must be not less than one hundred years old, perhaps much older. The branches of all these trees overhang the charred remains of what was evidently a large tree. Nothing of this remains but a thin shell of about ten feet of the butt; the rest was completely burned up. This shell was standing where it grew till a few days ago. The living trees of the group show no trace of fire; yet the fire which burned the dead tree must have destroyed every trace of vegetation around it when it occurred. The seed from which the living trees grew may not have reached the place till long after the tree was burned. The conclusion is plain that there were forest fires in the mountains ages before any white man was there, and whether started by Indians or from natural causes it may not be possible to determine.

Some Nerve.

Patience on a monument smiling at grief; seeking the bubble, Reputation, in the cannon's mouth; these and other trials of "nerve" are trifles compared with a recent trial experienced by Billy Grant. An artist from Bakersfield recently met Billy at Kern Lake, and, like everybody who sees him, was delighted with the graceful and elegant appearance of Mr. Grant as an angler. The artist insisted on having a picture, and Billy consented; he took his station on a rock in the Lake; his ambrosial curls gracefully disposed upon his Jove like brow and his features beaming with the indispensible smile. —N. B. his feet were carefully hidden by beautiful ferns—At a signal from the artist Billy assumed his most graceful attitude and cast his line. In an instant a three and a half pounder swallowed the fly. What a situation! To move was to spoil the picture; and to keep still might lose the trout; and this to such an enthusiastic angler was a terrible trial. Respect for art triumphed: Tilly kept perfectly still with the big fish tugging on the line till the artist signaled "hold, enough." Such virtue couldn't fail of its reward; the picture is a gem, and Billy saved his fish.

Excursion Rates.

To those desiring to attend the California State Fair the Carson & Colorado railroad will issue from Saturday, September 7th, to Saturday, September 21st, 1889, tickets from Bishop, Alvord, Independence, Lone Pine and Keeler to Reno and return at $20, passengers purchasing tickets at Reno for Sacramento and return at $9.40. These tickets will be void after Monday, September 23d, and have no stop over privileges.

Anglers Attention.

The devotees of rod and line are requested to make proof of their skill by a display of dried trout at the pavilion during the fair. The Directors offer a premium of five dollars for the best display. It is hoped that Grant, Stewart, Crapo and other noted anglers will come in on this display; they can beat the State if they will but try, and will make one of the most interesting exhibits of the fair.

It had now grown almost dark, perhaps he did not see her plainly.

"Did you ring?" she asked foolishly, while her heart sank down, down, would it never stop?

"Is your mistress in?"

What was this—some strange mistake? Could he not see who it was held the door open for him?

"My mistress, Miss Ellingsworth? why yes, she is in the parlor." It must be a joke, but now he had frightened her enough, and how they would laugh together over it. She was attempting to smile, when she heard the parlor door open behind her.

"Yes, I am here." It was Bertha Ellingsworth's voice. The visitor passed in, and Jane Graves shut the outer door heavily and sank upon the floor, pressing with both her hands against her bursting heart. Then she leaped upon her feet in sudden madness and hurried along the hall to the parlor door. What right had this rich woman to steal away her lover? She would care only to amuse herself with him for a few days and then her servants would be told to shut the door in his face. Such cold creatures as she never love; passion they know nothing of, only the passion to break honest men's hearts. Why not warn him? Oh, but what was Jane Graves to him? he might remind her how he had spurned her from him once.

Jane Graves went back into the dining room, now grown dark, and threw herself into a chair. The poor cannot fight against the rich. Ah! but she could hate her mistress' white face. She could curse her in her thoughts with all the evils in the universe. The girl burst into a passion of tears.

"What is the trouble, little girl?" It was her master's voice. She had forgotten him.

The girl heard him draw a chair near hers, but she did not uncover her face.

"Was your beau unkind to you? Well, don't have anything more to say to him, then, Jennie."

Why! the elegant Mr. Ellingsworth was actually kissing his maid! What difference did it make? the one she loved had thrown her away, and trampled her devotion under his feet. She even let him draw her shapely little head to his shoulder, and take her hands away from her face. They hid her lips, he said. Then the door bell rang.

Mr. Ellingsworth was actually kissing his maid!

Mr. Ellingsworth answered the bell himself—a breach of etiquette not frequent with him, even under the liberalizing influence of village manners.

"Mr. Breton, charmed to see you," and there was not the faintest trace of ill humor in his perfectly trained voice. The old gentleman might have been the most opportune of guests.

But his daughter had not been schooled enough for such self control, and she started to her feet as her parlor door opened, almost in consternation. There was quite a study for character in the room at that moment. Curran had not arisen; his lips might have been closed a little tighter than usual, but his face did not even reveal surprise. Mr. Breton had reached the center of the room before he saw whom Bertha had been entertaining, but now he stood in astonishment—which he had no concern to hide—snapping his black eyes from the young lady who was soon to be his son's wife to this weaver in the mill, who did not seem so much out of place in this fashionable parlor, either. The crisis had come, and Bertha was entirely unprepared for it. Her heart was fluttering wildly, and for the moment she wished she had never seen the man whose presence embarrassed her. A moment before she had forgotten there was such a thing as wealth or rank, devoutly confident such a man as her guest could stand before kings; but the door had opened and let in the breath of pride and caste, scattering the halo about the poor man's head. Suddenly she looked with new repugnance at him she had just thought so sublime. Why did he not go? She was flushed with vexation at his stubbornness in delaying. Had he no sense of propriety, to court a social meeting with her aristocratic father, who would ridicule him without his guessing it, and the blunt mill owner, who would be sure to insult and browbeat him plainly? She expected to see him rise awkwardly and shuffle out of the room, perhaps pulling his forelock respectfully to the company that was not for such as he.

CHAPTER X.

WEAK WOMAN.

Curran glanced keenly at the face of his beautiful hostess, whose wonted serenity had all gone, then he rose to his feet, and stood, while she spoke his name in the briefest form of introduction. He did not seem offended by the stare of surprise Mr. Breton had for him. It was a new experience to the mill owner, meeting his workmen in fashionable parlors.

"Curran, is it? I was sure I had seen you in the mill, but you had on a white apron then." Mr. Breton laughed familiarly, but he did not hold out his hand.

Couldn't Curran see how rudely he was treated? Mr. Breton's laugh and tone rasped Bertha's finer sensibilities, so that she was at once indignant with him, and disgusted with Curran who seemed to bear it so unconsciously. Curran's brow was unruffled; he had only folded his arms across his breast, sometimes a sign of excitement with him.

"Mr. Curran had the good fortune, I believe, to do my daughter a great service." Mr. Ellingsworth's manner was the perfection of well bred rudeness. It expressed the infinite elevation and polish of the person who assumed it, far above the very natural feeling of disgust at the presence of so vulgar a person as this workman. It suggested irresistibly the great contempt such a person ought to call forth, but at the same time that Ellingsworth was unapproachable by even as vulgar a thing as contempt.

"Indeed?" exclaimed Mr. Breton, as he seated himself, "I will thank you, too, it was a good job for you, and I will see it don't hurt your interests any, either."

"How do you like your work?" went on Mr. Breton in his harsh mill voice. "I hope you ain't one of those who don't know when they are well off."

"I can keep from starving; that is well off, I suppose."

Mr. Breton was at loss but for a moment.

"But you poor people don't save what you get. You ought to economize."

Curran's eyes flashed dangerously, but he bit his lip and kept silence.

Mr. Ellingsworth saw a scene was imminent. How little tact Mr. Breton showed in patronizing the young man so provokingly before the golden haired goddess whom he had no doubt fallen in love with. Something must be done.

"Excuse me. Have you had any serious trouble with your wound, Mr. Curran?"

"I have only lost a few days; that is nothing," he answered quickly.

"But it must be considerable for a poor man?" broke in Mr. Breton, with his grand air; "I will direct my paymaster to make it up to you."

Curran glanced across the room at Miss Ellingsworth. He expected to see her face flushed with anger. She would leap to her feet in indignant remonstrance to shield him from such impertinence, all the generosity of her nature in revolt against such return for his devotion to her.

She was looking at him, but much as a girl looks at a strange animal she has been petting, when suddenly they tell her he bites. Curran turned away from her and ground his teeth. Then he looked at Mr. Breton.

"Can't your paymaster make up for the pain, too, as well as the lost time?"

Mr. Ellingsworth was at his wit's end. He saw the cloud gathering in the workman's eyes, and that his lip trembled with suppressed feeling when he spoke.

"How long have you been in town, Mr. Curran?" he said to change the conversation if possible into safer channels.

"Only six months."

"Why," volunteered Mr. Breton after an awkward silence, "that is about as long as the mill hands have been fault finding so loudly." The old gentleman looked sharply at him. "I don't suppose you would tell who has been making the trouble."

"Yes, sir." Curran had risen to his feet, the flush of offended self respect in his cheeks. When I came here I found the mills paying you 12 per cent. dividends, while the help who ground them out for you, were crushed almost to the earth. I felt bound to tell them, as I now tell you, that the owner has no more God given right to all the profit of their work than they to all the profit of his investment."

"And you are the man who has been stirring up this mischief here?" cried Mr. Breton, almost starting from his chair. He had caught him at last then. "And do you say that a man isn't entitled to the interest on his money? My money represents a thousand sach lives as yours; it ought to have a thousand times the pay." He had more terrible guns than of the batteries of logic for the rebel, but he could not resist the temptation to explode the fallacies of his class before he let him go.

The young man's eyes flashed beautifully.

"Your money represents a thousand lives, then, out of which you have sucked the life blood! And at how much do you value a human life? As much as $1,000 for a soul? A thousand dollars for all the joys and hopes and possibilities of a human life? Your valuation is too miserably small. I tell you," and Curran threw out his right hand in a magnificent gesture, "I tell you, a human creature ought to have for its service a good portion of the comforts and delights the world is so bounteous with. Anything less is slavery, a slavery worse than negro bondage. Do you call it pay that you give the hopeless men and women that weave gold for you on your looms? Rather say the daily recurring fact of hunger chains them to your mill."

Mr. Ellingsworth had sunk back in his seat in despair; he might as well resign himself to the situation since it seemed beyond his power to change it. Mr. Breton was likely to hear some startling truths before he succeeded in refuting this dangerous young man. Perhaps it was just as well, too; there is no sense in a man's making his money as the rich do, by one kind or another of imposition or injustice and then affect such ridiculous unconsciousness. There is no sense in being blind and stupid about how one comes to be rich, the comfortable fact remaining. What was the use of Breton wrestling with such a young giant as this?

"I pay my help market prices of labor. I don't propose to make them gifts." The old gentleman handled his cane nervously, but he could punish the man enough later. He felt Ellingsworth's sharp eyes, he must think of something to absolutely overwhelm the arguments of his workman. He ran over in his mind the smooth axioms of his class, and tried hard to recollect some of the perfect syllogisms of the political economists.

Curran stood, his elbow resting on the back of the chair he had been sitting in, in an attitude so dignified and agraceful that Mr. Ellingsworth glanced across at his daughter to see if she had observed it. It was not quite so inconceivable, after all, that Bertha might have taken a fancy to him. But then his whole associations had been with the poor, and what possible harmony, even for a moment—then Mr. Ellingsworth remembered the maid servant crying at this moment in the dining room.

"Naturally you prefer to let your half clothed ill fed hands make you the presents; they earn you big dividends; you throw them a crust of bread, the market price of labor you call it, and put the dividends in your own pocket."

"But it's my money made the mill, and my management runs it."

"As for the money," retorted Curran, "perhaps you inherited a part of it, saved by the tax laid on the poor of the last generation, or you borrowed it, perhaps, on interest, and made the help in your mill pay the interest every penny of it; how else could it be paid? You did not make your money; no man can till $2,000,000 out of his farm, or dig it out of a coal mine. You simply took it. Your new mills are paid for out of wages you ought to have given your help; you call them yours; the new machinery comes out of them. They are the real stockholders in it all."

Mr. Breton had sprung from his seat, but Curran went on unflinchingly. "It isn't earned, it is simply defrauded. The management is doubtless good, but no management could, in the righteous course of justice, bring such vast fortunes into the hands of a few men; while the thousands who work for them live and die with the consuming thirst for happiness never for one hour assuaged in their souls."

The old gentleman had come up close to him as he spoke, and as he finished, Curran looked down calmly into a face almost purple with passion. It occurred to him that Mr. Breton was about to have an attack of apoplexy. The hand that held his gold headed cane fairly trembled.

"You have earned your last penny in my mills!" the old gentleman shouted at him. "We ought to have laws to shut up such men as you."

"Mr. Ellingsworth," said Curran, as that gentleman rose to his feet, "I am very sorry to have brought such a scene into your parlor; it seemed unavoidable after what was said to me, and it seems likely to prove more unfortunate for me than for anybody else."

No one thought of anything to say. Mr. Ellingsworth vaguely wondered where the man picked up his neat way of talking, but then the wealthy, after all, have no monopoly of talent.

Curran cast a withering look of contempt on the mill owner. "I am sorry, too, to be deprived of the chance to win my daily bread."

He did not notice that the expression of the girl's face had changed, or that she had started to come to him, but there was a grandeur of wrath in his face and bearing that awed her. She stood in the center of the room, with heaving bosom and frightened, troubled eyes, watching him out of the door. Then her father came back through the hall with his sarcastic smile finely curving his thin lips.

How beautifully he had known how to preserve his own honor. It would have been base and ignoble in him to have crawled out of her parlor at the entrance of her father and Mr. Breton, self confessed unworthy to sit in their presence. And for all their wealth and power and vantage ground, careless of what it must cost, he had thrown their insults in their teeth and shown himself a grander man, a thousand times, than either of them.

The warm flood of returning feeling swept over her soul. She could not bear one more cruel word against him now. Before her father could speak she had hurried into the hall and shut fast the door so that she should not hear the bitter sentence that was just parting his lips.

What strange impulse moved her that she should go to the outer door and look eagerly down the street? But her insulted guest had not lingered. In a moment more she was at the gate, and saw his tall form only at a little distance. No doubt he was thinking sadly, or perhaps angrily, of her, as he walked, and he could not guess that she had repented, and was eager this moment to beg his forgiveness, with all the sweet words she knew. Bertha glanced back at the house in hesitation. She could see the slim outlines of her father's figure shadowed on the curtains. She could not hear what he was saying. It was this:

"But I don't understand," insisted Mr. Breton, wiping the perspiration from his heated face. "I don't understand how she can bring herself, a girl of her notions, to entertain a fellow like this. How long do you suppose this has been going on? Since the dog adventure, very likely. If I were Philip"——

"But you recollect I am only three days returned from my trip, and am entirely unable to tell you how many times she has met this very striking individual. Don't hurry yourself into mental decline by trying to explain on logical principles a woman's performances," smiled Mr. Ellingsworth. "And I wouldn't take the trouble to suggest misgivings to Phil. I would rather trust the girl's nature, and I think I know it, than depend on a jealous lover's reproaches. Why, my dear friend, I would stake my life on the girl's attachment to the traditions of her position. Our wives and daughters are thrice more intolerable, unreasonable aristocrats than we. If she had been guilty of a touch of foolish sentiment reaction is certain, and she will only despise the man the more because of her season of blindness."

"But supposing the reaction came too late," suggested Mr. Breton anxiously. "Then it better not come at all," he continued. "The very character you give her would make three people perfectly miserable—the man she refuses, the man she marries, and herself."

But the girl who had stood at the gate, in her slippers, and with no covering for her head but her golden hair fastened low on her neck, had hesitated but a moment. She could not let Curran leave her thus; perhaps she should never see him again, if he went away without one word from her to soften the blows she had let them give him. And then he seemed to be walking slowly, she could overtake him in a moment. The uneven walk hurt her feet, her slippers were so thin, and as she lifted her skirt to walk faster a rude briar tore her soft flesh, and then hung greedily to her to impede her steps. She stopped and called his name. She had hardly murmured it, but it seemed so loud spoken and so tender toned she blushed at herself, and dared not speak it again. She might run a few steps, and then he would hear her voice more plainly. But her dress clung so closely and her excited breath came so fast that she gained on him very slowly. There was no use, she must lose him forever out of her life; he must always think her cruel and ungenerous. She leaned against the fence and sent one more hopeless cry after him. It was more a sob than a cry, a piteous sob, trembling with gentle, heart broken reproach. Why, she was sure he must have heard that; she had never meant to speak so loud. What could she say to him when he came back to her. She must try to be very cold and dignified. But wasn't he going to turn? Why, her cry was piercing enough to go a mile on the still evening air. No, he was further away, he had not heard her.

Then she looked backed, and was frightened to see what a distance she was away from home. And as she stood looking, now at his tall form drawing unconsciously away from her, and then at the distant lights of her home, the first hint of the desolation that broods over millions of hopeless hearts, came upon her soul. Her slippers were torn, and wet with dew, and each step she took bruised the tender feet that had never known hurt or weariness. Her heavy masses of hair had been shaken from their fastenings, and hung at full length to her waist. She fancied herself some lost, friendless Magdalen, for whom the world, that fawns on the fortunate and proud, had only taunts and cruel blows. And were there women who had to face the world alone? fight their own battles with timid hearts? earn their own right to breathe, with sinking hearts?

"What was that, a step, a man's step coming toward her?" To her excited imagination at that moment her beautiful home and the elegant life she loved so well seemed things of the past.

She gathered her hair into a loose coil and let her dress trail on the walk to cover her feet. The man wore workman's clothes. She had hoped he might be a gentleman. She tried to keep on the outer edge of the sidewalk; she would have taken the road if she had dared. She looked away from the man, but she could see with beating heart he was coming directly toward her. But perhaps he did not see her, and he might turn aside yet. God grant he be an honest man, whose wife's loving face was in his thoughts at this moment. There were such men. But instead of moving aside the man stopped short just before her, and she raised her big, scared eyes to his face.

"Why, Bertha, I thought it was you."

Sure enough it was Philip Breton. He had come from the mill, where there had been some extra work, and wore his working clothes.

"Let me walk home with you," he said very gently, as if he had no right to assert any privilege with her.

"I came too far, and got frightened," she said dreamily, as she rested her hand on his arm.

Her hand was cold, but it sent his young blood tingling through his veins.

"I am so sorry." How he longed to catch her white hand to his lips, and warm it with kisses. But lately she had treated him with a new coldness, and her coldness he dare not meet. He dreaded to face it, it pained him so past endurance, and he had called on her but seldom since the night of the fire. But now his heart was full of eloquent love; so full he could not conceive of her not sharing in it. It was she called it forth, she must have something for him.

They had reached her gate. She would surely invite him to go in with her. Then she could tell him if he had done anything to displease her. He could remember nothing, but there might have been some unconscious cold word or tone, as if, poor fellow, he had not been only too tender with her.

"Good night," she said. She had lost the tremor in her voice fright had given her, and all the softness of heart of her loneliness.

"I thank you," she added, coldly, as he did not go, but stood looking as if he did not quite understand.

"Good night," he answered, with a great throb in his throat. He stumbled awkwardly, as he went down the steps; he could not see very well for the mist in his eyes.

FAVORED BY FORTUNE.

Sacramentans Play Lucky In the Louisiana State Lottery.

Dame Fortune, through the medium of the last drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, showered her favors into the laps of Sacramentans with lavish hand. The unprecedented streak of good luck has been the all absorbing topic of conversation, and a Bee reporter this morning started out to interview those who had been designated as the lucky ones. The first one encountered was, of course, George H. Lavenson, the Bee's handsome cashier. George was not at all backward in stating that he had been enriched to the extent of $7,500 by the Louisiana State Lottery. "Sam Gerson and I," said Mr. Lavenson, "bought five coupons, and I kept them in an envelope and did not look at them until the list of the drawing was published in the papers. Then I took the list and saw that No. 61,605 had drawn the capital prize of $600,000. I opened the envelope and the first coupon I took out bore the figures '61,605.' It knocked me silly, and for about three minutes I didn't know whether I was standing on my head or my feet. The coupon drew one-fortieth of the big prize—$15,000. We sent the ticket by Wells Fargo, and in less than two weeks had the money. It came in greenbacks—$4,000 in $50 bills and $11,000 in bills of smaller denomination. You know that, however, as I let you reporters feast your eyes on the money. I have 'squared myself' with the boys, have made some presents, and propose to put the remainder of the money where it will do the most good."

Samuel Gerson, the well known fruit commission merchant, confirmed Mr. Lavenson's story, and smillingly admitted the receipt of his $7,500.

"Yes, I got away with $2,500—one-fortieth of the third capital prize," said G. H. Stevenson, ticket agent at the Southern Pacific depot. "I received my money a few days since—five $500 bills—through Wells Fargo Express."

Another $2,500 was drawn by a young man of this city, employed in a shipping and commission house, who is equally as well known as any of those mentioned above. He got his money through D. O. Mills' Bank, but there are reasons which impel him to most strenuously object to his name being given.—Sacramento (Cal.) Bee, July 10.

What wrought the change? This woman's face
Is ruddy with a rose's grace,
Her eye is bright,
Her heart is light,
Ah, truly 'tis a goodly sight.
A few brief months ago her cheek
Was pallid and her step was weak.
"The end is near
For her, I fear,"
Sighed many a friend who held her dear.
I can tell you what wrought the change in her. She was told by a friend, who, like her, had suffered untold misery from a complication of female troubles, that Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription would certainly cure her. This friend "knew whereof she spoke," for she had been cured by the remedy she advised her friend to use. She is enthusiastic in its praise, and tells her friends that Dr. Pierce deserves the universal gratitude of woman-kind for having given it this infallible remedy for its peculiar ailments. It is guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case or money refunded.

IDLENESS IS A DANGEROUS FAULT

In the kidneys. When inactive they speedily fall into disrepair. Those obstinate and fatal maladies, Bright's disease and diabetes, ensue with terrible certainty upon the inaction of the organs affected. Catarrh of the bladder, enuresis, gravel and strangury are also to be apprehended from a partial paralysis of the bladder, of which weakness and sluggishness are the causes. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fine tonic and promoter of activity for the renal organs, and one which can be relied upon to afford them the requisite stimulus without exciting them—an effect to be feared from the unmodicated alcoholic excitant of commerce. A further beneficent effect of the Bitters, by renewing activity of the kidneys, is to enable them to drain from the blood in its passage through them, impurities productive of rheumatism and dropsy. Nervousness, fever and ague, constipation and dyspepsia are conquered by the Bitters.

HAPPY RECOVERY.

There is nothing I now enjoy that I do not owe to having used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., at a time when I was suffering all that a human being could endure. My troubles began in my kidneys, from which I never expected to recover. My physicians said I had Bright's disease. Later I had a bad attack of Gravel. Six years ago last June—how well I remember that day—I saw Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy advertised in our paper. After using three bottles I was well. I have never had a return of the disease, and though I am over sixty years of age I am vigorous and strong, as I was in my prime. What physicians and the many remedies I had taken could not do Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy did; it cured the disease and made me a well woman.—Mrs. Emiline P. Mazner, Burg Hill, O.

DRIVING COWS HOME.

There is one task in connection with the pasturing of cows that is generally deeply and indelibly impressed upon the memory of the boy who grows up on the farm. That is driving home the cows from pasture at night. As this task is often laid upon the small boy at a very early age, about as early, in fact, as he can let down and put up the bars, the impression it leaves upon the memory is not altogether pleasant. But the boy who can not submit gracefully to the inevitable and extract some pleasure out of the most onerous tasks is lacking in the usual resources of the ordinary Yankee boy.

Looking back through the glamor of nearly half a century, many of the disagreeable features of "driving home the cows" fade from view and the pleasanter side of the subject stands out in full relief. Although, at first thought, it did seem rather lonesome to start off alone, after an early tea, and go half a mile or more after the cows, the boy was seldom really lonesome. The familiar songsters of the season went with him as a guard of honor. They chirped and thrilled for him from every tree or mullein stock or fence corner. He knew where their nests were and visited most of them every night to see whether there was any more eggs, or whether the eggs were hatched or the birdlings were most large enough to fly. Then he knew where every woodchuck hole was and would approach them stealthily, to see if he couldn't catch some of the woodchucks away from home, and, although experience had demonstrated to him, repeatedly, that he could never kill one with a club before he would get into his hole, still he would continue to repeat the effort. A woodchuck will stand a great deal of pounding by a boy, with a club, unless you hit him in the right spot on his nose, when he will keel over very quickly. The small boy also knew where every black raspberry bush grew, especially the largest and most luscious and no fruit were suffered to rot upon the canes, and those melting blackberries that grew in the new clearing, under the very shadows of the tall sugar maples, were reserved for the palate of the faithful cow boy.

But, on the other hand, there are annoyances that sorely try the patience of the cow boy. Although nearly all the cows are near the bars waiting for them to be let down, that they may go to the barn and be relieved of their accumulated treasures, one or two, as if possessed of an evil spirit of perversity, will remain away on the further side of the field and the boy must go quite a distance just for that perverse cow. We fear when he does reach her, she becomes the subject of some pretty energetic remarks and if the pebbles don't fly at her, it must be because her cow boy is a decided exception. And then we fear that cow has to travel until she overtakes the others at a rate not altogether consistent with the largest yield of the purest milk.

And when the cows are all in the lane the tribulations of the boy do not entirely cease. Cows have a great respect for rank and authority. The boss cow generally leads and the subjected follow in the order of their acknowledged consequence. The leader elects to proceed with a slow and pompous dignity, and if any behind her venture to crowd, she stops and deliberately proceeds to administer punishment. The weaker drift to the rear and there is no use of the driver urging the rear ranks for they can proceed no faster than the leaders choose to permit. But the driver has one recourse, the ever handy one of the small boy—stones. If he can hurl stones so as to hit the leader he can quicken her gait and so relieve the blockade.

A great deals depends upon the manner in which the cows are driven home as to the profits of the dairy. They can very easily be so driven as to affect the yield of milk and its quality, also. If boys or men are permitted to frighten and hurry them, it is quite likely to render them unprofitable.—American Rural Home.

Gapes in Little Chicks.

In taking little chicks from the nest (turkeys also), by observing closely, you will almost always find on the forward part of crown and throat, tightly matted, vermin which come from the old hen. These deposit eggs at the nostril and around the mouth, so they will be inhaled or in some way get into the windpipe, and then hatch into a red worm, and as they develop prey upon the bird and strangle it to death. One might say, why do incubated chicks raised artificially get the gapes? Because they are allowed to become dirty and filthy, which breeds vermin. There are several remedies for gapes. The best one is not to allow the hen while sitting to become infested, nor while she is caring for chicks. When taking chicks from the nest, grease under throat and crown of head; be sure and get around the edge of beak and under the old hen's wings and near vent, with a mixture of carbolic acid and lard. This preparation must not be strong, or it will kill the bird—just enough to smell the acid. Repeat the application in a week or ten days. After the chicks are large enough to eat whole corn there is no danger.—Troy (N. Y.) Times.

—Experiments by the New York Dairy Commission show that oleomargarine will not dissolve and digest in the human stomach in its natural and ordinary temperature, and it is, therefore an unprofitable substance as food.

EDUCATION IN IOWA.

A Progressive State's Common-School and Collegiate Systems.

The system of education in Iowa, which has been a matter of earnest attention since the Territorial government was organized, may be considered under two aspects—the common-school system and the collegiate system. The liberality of Congress in granting lands for the purposes of education in all Western States, where the soil primarily belonged to the Government, can not be too highly commended. In addition to grants like 500,000 acres to aid in the establishing of a university, Congress granted later to each State in the Union a large amount for the establishment of an agricultural college, and a provision in the act for the admission of the State of Iowa gave to her five per cent. of all sales by the United States of the public lands within the State, to aid the university. But there was the grandest gift of all in the provision in the same act that the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of every township of the public land should be appropriated for the purposes of common schools, under the supervision of the State. In some respects perhaps the State has not managed these various grants in the way to realize the highest amount of money and the greatest benefits for the cause of education. But the State herself has supplemented these gifts with contributions of her own, and with taxes levied on the people of each locality for the support of schools, so that these contributions and provisions have created a system by which every child in the State of Iowa, from the age of six to sixteen years, may pass six to eight months of each year of his life in attendance on school without charge.

The rigid enforcement of this system has dotted the whole surface of the State with comfortable school-houses. And while, perhaps, teachers are not paid very compensatory salaries, and therefore are not always the most capable for the business, yet as a system calculated to educate every human being in the State up to a certain degree of attainment, it is difficult to see how it could be much improved. One of the incidents of this system is that most of the teachers are females, to whom the compensation is quite a blessing, who are generally better adapted to the education and training of children in their early youth than men, and who have, in the State of Iowa at least, done credit to the sex by their skill, their diligence and good conduct.

The purpose of this school system was primarily to educate the youth in the elements of an English education—reading, writing, arithmetic, orthography, geography, grammar, history. In some of the more ambitious towns and cities there has been engrafted upon this, and paid for from the same source, what is often called the high-school or grammar-school, in which are taught in addition to the subjects just mentioned, the dead languages, often Latin, sometimes Greek, and German and French. These high-schools in the larger cities are to some extent the equivalents of lower grades of colleges, and no doubt better education is frequently obtained in them than can be had in poorly endowed and struggling colleges, which perhaps should never have been started. It is, however, becoming a question, and a grave one, in the State, whether these high-schools are not a violation of the spirit and purpose found in the statutes, which were intended to establish what we understand by the word a "common-school system."

In regard to the other class of educational institutions—colleges and universities—Iowa has suffered in common with nearly all the Western States, and perhaps some of the Eastern States, by the efforts to create a college in every town of any size, and for every religious denomination, as well as the college and university established by the State. There is no more unfortunate delusion than that which possesses some men who desire to leave their property at their death to charitable and benevolent institutions than to devise a sum for the creation of a college, the amount of which will barely suffice to erect the first building necessary for such institutions, leaving the support of the professors, the establishment of scholarships, the purchase of laboratories, globes and maps, necessary to the conducting of any college, to chance or to solicitation, or to any of the means which may be supposed to supply these necessities of college instruction.

In addition to colleges thus projected, almost every Christian denomination in the State of Iowa has attempted to establish one of its own. And the Methodists, the early pioneers of civilization and religion, possessing the largest membership of any Christian church in the State, have thought it necessary to attempt the establishment of a college for each of its four conferences. The result of this has been, in the State of Iowa, that the efforts of the friends of liberal education have been divided and paralyzed. The colleges are unable to give salaries sufficient to command the services of competent professors; none of them have the philosophical apparatus which should be provided; all of them are struggling inefficiently, with one or two exceptions. The Congregationalists have in "Cornell University," at Grinnell a fairly successful college. "Iowa State University," at Iowa City, has not been without reasonable endowments by the proceeds of lands given by the Government and by some contributions from the State treasury, but has not been very fortunate in the manner in which it has been conducted by the trustees appointed by the State.

It is now, however, placed upon a footing which promises success, and with a new and efficient President (Schaefer), and with the confidence of the public, with an efficient medical department and a still more successful law department, it may be said to be fairly deserving the name of "university."

The agricultural college organized by the State five or six years ago, and supported by the proceeds from the sale of land and donated by the Government, has not developed great capacity for instruction in agricultural labor and science, either because no sufficient system of instruction has been devised, or because the intestine controversies among the trustees, presidents and professors have retarded its growth and obstructed its usefulness. The latter circumstance has been a source of regret to all who are interested in the institution.—Mr. Justice Miller, in Harper's Magazine.

IRISH LANDLORDISM.

How It Has Depopulated the County of Mayo—The Town of Castlebar.

"How thoroughly has Mayo been depopulated?" I asked.

"We have lost 37 per cent. of the population we had in 1841. It was then 390,000 about, and it is now 245,000; 26,000 houses in this county alone have been abandoned or pulled down."

"And what is the reason?"

He laughed a little bitterly. "Have you had to come into the wilds of Connaught to find out? Well, I'll tell you; oppression, injustice, cruelty and hunger. It is a wonder we have any peasantry left. Let me tell you the story of one estate which I know well—it is partly in Mayo and partly in another county, and the rent roll all told is about £1,000 a year. It was bought about 1750 by the ancestor of the present owner for less than £600, and really this estate did not cost that, for some of it has since been sold. There has been paid in rent by the tenants on the property since 1798 exactly £44,860, and of that sum not £1,000 has ever been spent by the owner on the place. The tenants have made all the improvements upon which the advanced rents from about £400 to about £1,000 a year have been charged. On the contrary, the present owner has seen the land but once, and his father never lived a year on the place. The rents have been spent in drunkenness and debauch at London and Paris and these poor people have been exiled in the vain effort to find money to support the riot and disorder, the courtesans and parasites, of a London exquisite. Now, you Americans don't understand this thing. You think we are trenching on socialism when we strike at the root of the disorder, the landlord system; but we are not. God did not intend that this people should agonize and suffer and die to please the pampered appetites and find funds for the vices of the man who described himself as owner of the land. Looked at in any light it is no hardship to expropriate a man like this upon paying him seven years' rent £7,000, making much more than £52,000 for what cost his family £600, on a bad title. That £1,000 takes more than the produce of the soil after the tenants have had their food. There are but few farmers on the place that are not obliged to do extra work to make up the rent—for the farms will not pay it. Nor is this an exceptional case. You will find thousands like it throughout Ireland, and God knows in Connaught we have our full share."

This town of Castlebar is a quaint old-world overgrown village. It has two remarkable memories, of which one hears from every citizen. The French army, under General Hambert, after landing at Killala in 1798 attacked and routed a greatly superior English force, a fact commemorated in the phrase, the "Castlebar races"; and here "Fighting Fitzgerald," the most noted duelist of modern times, was finally and most properly hanged as an appropriate finale to his adventures.—J. T. McEnnis, in Chicago News.

THE USEFUL THIMBLE.

Two hundred years ago thimbles were unknown in England.

The high rank Chinese thimble always has a mother-of pearl case.

Gold, silver, iron, ivory, steel, pearl, shell, celluloid, rubber and even glass are utilized in making thimbles.

With the thimble the Chinese lady always has a delicate pair of scissors of the finest steel, in a sheath of pearl, and a pearl needle-case.

Solid gold thimbles, elegantly carved, and frequently set with diamonds, are found none too good for many fashionable home decorators.

The wife of a prominent Brooklyn clergyman has a thimble that was carved from a peculiar stone she found on the shore of the Dead sea.

Thimbles made to order, with the monogram or initials of the person for whom they are intended set in precious stones, are by no means unknown objects d'art.

A lady in Boston has a thimble made from a piece of the old Washington elm at Cambridge, the tree under which Washington stood when he took the oath as commander-in-chief in 1775.

The thimble is claimed by the Dutch as an invention of their country, but it is known that it was in use among the silk embroiderers of China hundreds of years before it was used elsewhere.

The Queen of Siam has a thimble, made of gold, in the form of a lotus bud, the lotus being the Siamese royal floral emblem, and thickly studded with diamonds so arranged as to form the Queen's name and date of her marriage.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

CHINESE BURIAL PLACES.

Queer Modes of Sepulture Practiced in the Celestial Country.

The dead are for the most part buried, not as with us, in ground set apart for that purpose (though one frequently lights upon cemeteries duly chosen with regard to their "lucky" position), but they are simply laid down anywhere and everywhere. Few things strike the traveler more than the Chinese mode of sepulture. Burial mounds and coffins—the latter sometimes exposed in all their hideous bareness, at other times wrapped up in matting, like large chests of tea—meet the eye at every turn. The Chinaman, as is well know, maintains a sacred reverence for the spot where his relatives, and especially his ancestors, have been buried, and for his native locality as the religiously-desired place of his own ultimate sepulture. Whatever, then, interferes with the sacredness of the spot, and with the ministering services of the "wind and water spirits," is looked upon as anathema. Railways are considered decidedly uncanny. There is no denying the fact. But there is also no denying that the reverence of the average Celestial for the graves of his ancestors is only second to the reverence for the almighty dollar. This has been proved times without number in the neighborhood of the treaty ports where the foreigner has erected his own "uncanny" abodes, which frequently interfered with the "Fongshui" of burial places, or, as was often the case, necessitated the removal of the burial mounds or coffins; but a few dollars to the representative of the family almost invariably smoothed the difficulty. In a country, then, like China, where there are fertile plains of vast extent, and which, therefore, present few engineering difficulties; in a country where the cheapest labor in the world exists in an inexhaustible supply—labor which, from the wonderful aptitude for acquiring proficiency inborn in every Chinaman, would soon become skilled labor—the sum as which the Chinese assess the damage to the graves of their ancestors would add but a small amount to the mileage cost of the iron roads. It may be remembered that a few years ago a railway about eight miles in length was laid down between Shanghai and Woo-Sung, near the mouth of the Yang-tse-Kiang. It succeeded extremely well,—so well, in fact, that the provincial authorities became alarmed lest the success might be used as a precedent and an argument for further construction, and it was bought from the British house which had constructed it; and then, to the horror of the foreign community, the rails were torn up and shipped to Formosa, on the shores of which they lie rusting at the present moment. This railway was carried through one of the most densely-coffined districts I came across in China, but the "Fengshui" opposition was easily overcome. Besides, it is not impossible that the vermilion pencil itself may be called into requisition in the form of an edict dealing in a summary manner with the question of ancestor compensation.—Blackwood's Magazine.

FOR CONSCIENCE'S SAKE.

Refuse to Countenance Public or Private Frauds and Nuisances.

One of the conveniences of London life is the "penny 'bus," and of its disadvantages is the "pirate 'bus," which, advertising no rate of fare, double that of the legitimate vehicle, and so becomes a trap for the unwary. Mr. Gladstone one day entered an omnibus for a short trip, and took the precaution of asking the fare.

"Twopence and distance," replied the pirate driver, and the great statesman quietly left the vehicle. He would not patronize an institution which was accustomed to make money under false pretenses. It was not the payment of the extra penny to which Mr. Gladstone objected; he simply refused to throw the weight of that penny into the scale of fraud.

A principle of conduct, which has been formulated by Goethe, states that we shall always aim at doing that which would benefit the world, if all mankind did it likewise. Too common an excuse for remaining in some old rut of expediency is that the sample of one person will make no difference.

"Somebody will do it if I do not," we object, when conscience urges us to live up to some conviction by refusing to follow the crowd in perpetuating an evil. That may be true; yet the man who forsakes his colors, even though he be accompanied by a multitude of other deserters, must expect to be branded as coward and traitor.

"Why do you not employ your old boot-maker?" asked a gentleman of an acquaintance whom he saw limping. "I thought he suited you exactly."

"So he did for ten years, but at the end of that time I found he was overcharging me, because he thought I couldn't get along without him. I told him I could afford to pay twelve dollars for boots for which he asked other people ten, but that I could not afford to patronize a man who would do business in that way. So, for the present, I limp."

A lady who disapproves of a well-known firm because of its cruelly insufficient payment of its saleswomen, refuses to enter its doors, although many an article for which she longs may be found within. Others boast they get "bargains" from its counters, but she prefers to keep her soul unsmirched and her fingers clean from unholy traffic.

Refuse to countenance fraud or nuisance, no matter how old the institution, or how indifferent to it others may be. The action of the majority has nothing whatever to do with individual responsibility.—Youth's Companion.

ENGLAND'S NEW NAVY.

It may not be amiss to recall the main outlines of the naval programme which has now received legislative sanction. Seventy ships in all, comprising ten battle-ships, forty-two cruisers and eighteen torpedo gunboats, are to be built, the whole to be completed and fully equipped ready for sea in four and a half years from the time when the first vessel is laid down. The battle-ships will comprise eight first-class ships of 14,000 tons displacement and a speed of 17 1-2 knots, and two second-class ships of 9,000 tons displacement. Of the cruisers nine are to be first-class ships of that type—improved Merseys—with a displacement of 7,300 tons; twenty-nine are to be improved Medeas, with a displacement of 2,400 tons; and four are to be vessels of the Pandora class. These cruisers will all have an official speed of twenty knots. The remaining eighteen vessels are to be improved Rattlesnakes or Sharpshooters, with a displacement of 735 tons—perhaps the maximum that could with advantage be adopted for vessels of this special type—and a speed of twenty-one knots.

Thus the new programme, taken as a whole, provides an organized fleet of unprecedented power, capacity and speed, capable of acting in concert, and adapted to the requirements of modern naval warfare. Of the £21,500,000 which these seventy vessels will cost, £10,000,000 will be expended on the construction of ships by private contract, and the remainder on dockyard construction. The £10,000,000 will provide for the construction by private contract of four battle-ships, six first-class cruisers, seventeen second-class cruisers, and six torpedo gunboats, and it is intended that the contracts for all these vessels should be issued in the course of the current financial year. In the dockyards twenty ships will be laid down at once—four battle-ships of the first-class, one of the second class, three first-class cruisers, six second-class cruisers, and six torpedo gunboats. The remaining battle ship of the second class will be laid down in 1891, and the other vessels included in the programme will be commenced as soon as slips are vacated by the launch of the vessels which are to be laid down forthwith.—London Times.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS.

How They Are Carried Around the Globe by Migrating Birds.

Mr. Darwin found that the small portions of earth attaching to the feet of migrating birds contained seed. Nine grains of earth on the leg of a woodcock contained a seed of the toad rush. From six and a half ounces of earth rolled into a ball and adhering to the leg a wounded partridge he raised eighty-two separate plants of five species. Migrating birds often frequent the edges of ponds ere their departure, and in six and three-quarter ounces of such mud he raised under glass 537 plants. Seeds furnished with crowns, hooks, or prickles readily stick to the plumage of birds, which all such birds, and especially such wanderers as the albatross, might carry long distances. Applying these facts to the case of the Azores, Mr. Wallace found that most of the plants of the Azorean flora are well adapted to be carried by the methods just suggested—45 of the 439 flowering plants belonging to genera that have either pappus or winged seeds 65 to such as have minute seeds, 30 to those with fleshy fruits which are greedily eaten by birds, some have hispid seeds, and 84 are glumaceous plants well suited to conveyance by winds and currents. The only trees and shrubs of this isolated group are bearers of small berries, such as Portugal laurel, myrtle, laurustinus and elder, while those with heavy berries, which could not be conveyed by the means suggested—oaks, chestnuts, hazels, apples, beeches, alders, firs—are absent, common as they are in Europe. The character of the flora is that of the southwestern peninsula of Europe, and, if we assume that one-half of its species is indigenous, the other introduced by European settlers, there is still a rich and varied flora which Mr. Wallace thinks has been recently carried over 900 miles of ocean by the means just indicated. There is probably no better example of ocean migration than that offered by the Azores, and it is believed that the phenomena in question are still in progress, and that 900 miles do not form the limit of the distance to which this same ocean carriage of plants extends.—Edinburg Review.

The Krupp Works at Essen.

From the last report of Krupp's establishment at Essen it appears that in 1833 there were only nine workmen, and in 1848 seventy-four. In July, 1888, the establishment employed 20,960 men, of whom 13,626 were at Essen. Including the families of the workmen they support a population of 79,969 souls, of whom 24,193 lived in houses provided by the firm. There are at Essen 1,195 furnaces of various construction, 286 boilers, 92 steam hammers of from 100 to 50,000 kilos, 370 steam engines, with a total of 27,900 horse power, 1,724 different machines, and 361 cranes. Of coal and coke 2,735 tons are daily used, and 11 high furnaces of the latest construction produce 600 tons of iron per day.—Chicago Tribune.

BILL NYE ON A WHEEL.

He Relates His Thrilling Experience With a Real Bicycle.

Possibly it may not interest the readers of this paper to know it, but I have been, during the past three weeks, learning to ride the bicycle without a master. I do it in the evening, in the barn on my estate on Staten Island. That is why the barn is reputed to be haunted. Strange sounds are said to emit themselves from this barn and loud thumps; also wails of the damned. Boys who used to go there and shoot cats now go elsewhere. They cannot bear to wrestle with the supernatural or listen to the wail of a damned soul, they say.

I got a very large wheel, because I run somewhat to legs and could propel an enormous vehicle, if I could once maintain a good poise. I have forgotten what size the wheel is. It strikes me that it is seventy-two inches in diameter. I mean the large wheel, of course. The smaller wheel is less large. This small wheel is used mainly for tipping up and buzzing in the air when the machine goes over, which is quite often.

I have a stage leg which looks well behind the footlights, but is most too boneless to work well on a bicycle. It droops too much. So does the other one. When I get to thinking about the propulsive power, I forget the helm, and when I once more allow my mind to revert to the helm, I become rattled and fall off in an oblique manner.

I first began to ride the bicycle about a year ago, not in public, but as a means of personal relaxation. It was a smaller instrument than the one I have now, but good. It was in every way equal to this one and had a little flat oil can and an alarm on the withers, which could be rung in case I should be crossing a railroad at night and desired the engineer of an approaching train to save himself by instant flight.

This bicycle I gave to the physician who set my leg for me. He did it so well that I gave him the instrument, together with the wrench I had received while falling from it. He loans it to the boys of his neighborhood and is building up a good practice in compound and communicated fractures, hernias and concussions.

Last year he tried it himself, one evening at the twilight hour. He rode down Mr. Gryme's celebrated hill, and killed a child and a cow. He had forgotten how to play on the brake. He offered to replace the child with one whose mother he had treated professionally up to the hour of her death. But he could not manage it that way. So he settled for the child, and now keeps the bicycle mainly to loan to boys who otherwise might climb his fruit trees.

My new machine looks well. It is what we wheelmen call a full nickel machine. I have had my photograph taken with it. That is, in company with it. It is a beautiful picture. You can easily tell which is the bicycle. The portrait was made by a friend of mine who has a homeopathic photograph outfit. He is quite clever with it. He is a Wall street operator. His father was so before him. His father operated on Wall street before anybody else. He used to sprinkle Wall street. My friend does not make his living by photography. He makes his money honestly by speculation, but desires, of course, to have some means of obtaining a livelihood in case of reverses. So he is taking pictures by the dry plate process.

He got a good picture of my wheel and myself the other day. I wore my wheelman's uniform. I bought my uniform before I got the wheel, and looked so well in it that I concluded to buy myself a bicycle and learn to ride upon it.

I belong to a club, but do not figure in it very much, except at the festive board, where I frequently speak or preside. I also belong to an athletic club, which has made me quite robust. Formerly I had very poor health, but of latterly I am almost too healthy. I go to the evening sessions of my athletic club, and when I go home at night I feel real hopeful.

Bicycling is a noble sport. Some day I am going to go around the world and take my wheel with me in a shawl strap. Bicycling tones up the muscles, enlarges the lung area and teaches one self reliance. If I could only ride on my bicycle I am confident that it would benefit me. It certainly benefits the bicycle to ride on me, and it is a mighty poor rule that will not work both ways.

Our wheel club takes a spin, as we call it, every week to some remote point, eating lunch at the further point, and then returning in the gathering gloom. I go sometimes, in a hansom cab, and take part in the lunch.

I am a great admirer of manly sports, and used frequently to jar the back teeth of a sandbag of an evening or climb a horizontal bar and gently fall off again. I was expelled from my first athletic club because I used to fall on the mattress in the early part of the evening and remain there until time to go home, thereby preventing other athletes from practicing on the mattress.

My machine has no cog wheels or chain attachments. It is the old fashioned, hump shouldered bicycle, with steel running gears. This fall I am going fox hunting on it, if I can.

I swang the Indian clubs last year. It benefited me a great deal. Formerly I had operated a scroll saw and had made a lot of fayance and things, among which were a hollywood clock, with a wealth of holes in it, and other little articles of vertu, including a bas relief—bass wood—of myself. In swinging the clubs I obliterated these things, especially the clock; and so I regard the Indian club as one of the most beneficial things, in proper hands, of which we are at present informed. I also have a set of dumb bells, which I use to keep the door open in summer time, thus giving a free circulation of fresh air. In this way the dumb bell is a great boon.

It could also be pleasantly and profitably placed in the church towers throughout our land, thus adding to our general health by taking the place of the more clamorous bell of the dead past. The church bell, like the tin dinner horn, has outlived its usefulness, and I fear that the man who has to be reminded, by having the whole top of his head lifted off, that it is time to pray will have to be assisted out of his grave on resurrection day by means of explosives which will cost more than the result will warrant.—Bill Nye in Once a Week.

THE BED OF JUSTICE.

An Explanation of an Old French Royalist Custom.

Le lit de justice was, in French law, the term which at first denoted the throne on which the King was seated when presiding over the deliberations of his parliament. The expression came afterward to designate the assembly itself, and was applied to any solemn seance at which the French monarch appeared in person.

The first recorded "lit" was held in 1318, by Phillippe V le Long ("the tall"), and the last one was held by Louis XIV., at Versailles, on the 8th of May, 1788, or, according to various authorities, on the 5th of May, or in August or September of the previous year. The bed of justice was held only on affairs relating to the state and for the purpose of overruling the decision of parliament and to force it to accept the edicts or ordinances which it had previously rejected.

The theory of the old French constitution was that the authority of parliament was derived solely from the crown; consequently when the King, the source of authority, was present the delegated authority returned to the fountain head, and the King was arbitrary. Therefore, on these occasions, in acknowledgement of this doctrine, the parliament was logically incapable of resisting any demand or proposal that the King might issue, and, naturally, monarchs were not slow to take advantage of this power to overawe any parliament that exhibited signs of independence.

Thus Louis XIV., having in this manner overborne the opposition to his parliament, proceeded to exile that learned body to Troyes. The throne, or bed of justice proper, was placed under a high canopy, erected at these times; the officers appeared in red robes instead of black—their usual attire—and every thing pertaining to the occasion tended to make it a ceremonious and imposing affair.

But as Prudhomme said: "Malgre les lits de justice, la sonveraintе du peuple a prevalue contre la prerogative royale." And when some one inquired of Fontenelle the exact significance of a "bed of justice," he replied: "Cest un lit ou la justice dort."

The last "Lit de Justice" was assembled by Louis XIV. at Versailles August 6, or May 8, 1788. The object was to enforce the adoption of the obnoxious taxes which had been previously proposed by Callonne at the assembly of notables. The parliament had refused to register this ordinance and when compelled to do so by the presence of the king, made strong remonstrances and declared the registration illegal. This led to the assembly of the Etats generaux, and eventually to the revolution.—Notes and Queries.

Clocks a Century Ago.

A clock was an expensive luxury in those days. It is true that clocks had been in use, more or less, for more than a century, but they were large and costly, and the common means of telling the time of the day was by a sun dial or by a pole set in the ground about which its shadow traveled, thus indicating the time. The Connecticut makers first brought clocks within the reach of all. Toward the close of the last century Eli Terry, of Plymouth, Conn., commenced making the old-fashioned hang-up clocks, in which the wheels and teeth were cut by hand. These affairs cost $25 each. In 1807 Mr. Terry commenced making wooden clocks by machinery, which greatly cheapened them. Mr. Jerome invented the one-day brass clocks, stamping out the wheels from soft brass plate. In a few years by the invention of machinery, the price of these clocks was reduced to $2 each. In 1842 clocks were sent to England and from this small beginning Connecticut has become the center of the world's market for cheap clocks.—Chicago News.

—In the train—"Karl! Karl! mind your hat will be blown off if you lean so far out of the carriage." Paterfamilias (quickly snatching the hat from the head of the refractory youngster, and hiding it behind his back)—"There now, the hat is gone!" Karl sets up a howl. After a while his father remarks: "Come, be quiet; if I whistle your hat will come back again." (Whistles and places hat on boy's head.) "There, it's back again, you see!" While the parents are in conversation, Karl throws his hat out of the window, and says: "Pa, whistle again!"

—A Forcible Illustration.—"What do you do when people come in and bore you?" a warm personal friend asked of a merchant. "When they stay too long, the office boy, who is very bright and knows just when to interfere, tells me that a gentleman is in the counting-house waiting to see me on important business." "Ha, ha! That's a capital way to get rid of bores who don't know—" Just then the boy opened the door and sung out: "Gent in the counting-house, sir, waitin' to see you on important business."—Exchange.

—A photographer had been called to take the portrait of a person who had just died. Having arranged the camera to his liking, and hidden his features under the regulation piece of black muslin, he forgot for the moment that he was not in his own gallery, with a living subject before him, and called out, "Now, don't move, please, and look pleasant."—Funeral Director.

—They have new names for old things. A big thief is sometimes called rehypothecator, and gross plagarism, unconscious absorption.—Shoe and Leather Reporter.

SATURDAY SEPTEMBER 21.....1889

Corporal Tanner became a nuisance in office by talking too much; he was the same on the stump.

Deputy Marshal Neagle was discharged from custody last Monday, by Judge Sawyer, of the United States Circuit Court. Neagle was doing no more than his duty as an officer when he killed Terry.

The Trustees of the Stanford University have sought the world over for a President for that institution. So many and so varied talents are necessary to qualify a man for that position, that the Trustees can find but one person who is fitted to fill it, as it should be filled, and that person is Leland Stanford himself. It is believed he will accept the office.

According to the Los Angeles TRIBUNE, the old soldiers at the Home near Santa Monica, are treated much the same way that Union soldiers were treated in the terrible pen at Andersonville. The brute who inflicted such barbarous tortures upon defenseless men was afterward tried and hanged for his crimes. To illtreat these old soldiers, who gave their best days to the defense of their country, is even more barbarous than was the brutal treatment of the Union Soldiers in the South. If the charges are true, Treichel, the Governor of the Home at Santa Monica, should be shown no mercy.

No man can habitually carry a pistol concealed about his person without the fact becoming well known. When such a person makes any movement such as would excite suspicion that he is about to draw his weapon with hostile intent, he invites his own death. No man can be expected to wait till a deadly weapon is aimed at him before taking some action to save his own life. The fact that Terry habitually carried a deadly weapon went far to justify Mr. Neagle in killing him. The same reason would justify like action in other cases. No man is in so great danger of bodily harm as he who is known to carry deadly weapons.

When great labor strikes prevailed in the United States one set of political economists declared it was all owing to protective tariff. Now one of the greatest labor strikes ever known has occurred in England, and another set of political economists say it is owing to free trade. The truth is that labor strikes are not due exclusively to either of these causes. Men who employ others to work for them will always try to have wages down to the lowest possible rate, regardless of tariff or free trade; and workmen will try just as much to have wages increased. This is the real cause of strikes, and will continue to produce them till some just arrangement is made by which workers will get a fair share of the profits of the business they are engaged in.

It has been decided to close the Paris Exposition October 31st.

Mr. Ben Williams came down from Bishop last Wednesday and will stay till after Fair week.

Mrs. Eva L. Gunn got home at the end of last week from a visit of some months at San Francisco.

Grant says it it a whole lot of trouble to take care of a horse, anyway, and he would rather walk than do it. Sweet are the uses of adversity.

Religious Service—Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach tomorrow—Sunday—evening at 7 o'clock, Everybody is invited to attend.

Morales, the bandit, pleaded guilty to a charge of robbery and has been sentenced to State Prison for life. He was tried at San Diego.

Owens Valley farmers say that the potato crop will be very short this year. The unusual hot weather is supposed to be the cause.

As usual, the Carson & Colorado Co. have been very liberal in rates of fare over their road during the fair at Independence. See the schedule.

The Keeler Orchestra will furnish music for the Fair Ball. It is needless to add that they are noted for furnishing the best music in the county.

There are at present fifteen horses in training at the track, and this number will be considerably increased before the commencement of the Fair next Tuesday.

The footrace between Ed. Ober and Ed. Morton will take place during Fair week. The forfeit of $50 has already been deposited with stakeholder.

Doctor I. J. Woodin has opened an office at Keeler; he will be at the office on Monday and Friday evenings of each week; and till train time on Tuesday and Saturday mornings of each week.

Parties who intend to make exhibits at the fair at Independence are very earnestly requested to get their goods to the pavilion at the earliest time possible. If this is done it will save a great deal of unnecessary trouble and annoyance.

A great deal of interest is taken in the race to come off this—Saturday—afternoon between the Darwin horse "Darby"—not "Derby"—and the Big Pine horse "Sidewinder." The race will be run at 2 o'clock p. m. at the new race track at the Fort.

Thirty miners are now employed at the Union mine, Cerro Gordo. More men will be employed as room can be made for them. Mr. Farrington is staying at the mine and pushing mattere along as fast as possible. Mr. Jas. McDonald, long foreman of the Defiance mine, is now foreman of the Union.

The Bodie Miner says that a man named Lee shot Doctor Sinclair, of Bridgeport, last Sunday. Lee had been drinking and entered the office of Doctor Sinclair and began brandishing a pistol The weapon was discharged, but whether by accident or design is not certain. Doctor Sinclair was severely wounded in the left leg. below the knee. Lee is in jail.

The natives of Chili, residing in Lone Pine and neighborhood, celebrated the Seventy-second anniversary of the Independence of their country in an appropriate manner on the 18th inst. Many of the visitors who attended the Mexican celebration remained to participate. There were amusements of various kinds; the flags of the United States, Mexico, and Chili were displayed; and there was a dance to complete the day's celebraton.

The following order will be strictly enforced at the Pavilion during the Fair. On the mornings of Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, from 9 o'clock till ten o'clock, no one will be admitted to the Pavilion but members of Committees appointed to award premiums. The various Committees will meet at the Pavilion at 9 o'clock on the mornings named, and will decide how premiums shall be awarded.

The burning of bridges and snowsheds on the Central Pacific Railroad has completely stopped all freight traffic, and passengers had to traverse trails on the mountainside in order to reach trains on either side of the burned district. If the Carson & Colorado road were connected with the Southern Pacific there would be no detention of travel or suspension of freight traffic by such accidents. Trains could leave the Central Pacific at Reno, and go on to San Francisco by a route where no such accidents occur.

Race Entries.

The Secretary of the 18th District will be found at the reading room of the Norman House every day during the Fair, from eleven o'clock a. m., till noon, for the purpose of receiving entries for the races. At twelve o'clock each day the entries will close for races for the following day.

Eastside Canal.

For several weeks past the Eastside Canal has been pushed through hard, rocky ground. This has made the progress of the work slow. About two weeks more work will finish this hard stretch and then progress will be rapid till the close of the work. About twenty-one miles are already built, and less than half this distance remains to finish. The uncompleted part will not be difficult or expensive.

Membership and Admission

The price of life membership in the 18th District Agricultural Association is thirty dollars; annual membership five dollars. Only the holders of one or the other of these can enter live stock, produce or manufactures to compete for premiums. Membership tickets also entitle the holder his wife and minor children to admittance at all exhibitions at the hall and race track.

A Good Suggestion

The Bridgeport Chronicle-Union in an article on the 18th District Fair says:

"As Bridgeport is getting to be a horse-raising point we hope some of our stockmen will select some of their best horses and take them to the Fair, not, particularly, for racing, but to show what we can do in this line of business. An auction sale of stock should take place during the Fair, when good horses or cattle would naturally bring fair prices. The sale ot stock at Fairs is becoming universal, and it would be well to institute the practice at our District Fair this year, if even but one head should be sold."

Old Soldiers and Sailors.

At the last session of the Legislature an act was passed amending Section 2652 of the Political Code. This section provides for levying a road poll tax, and the amendment reads as follows:—The Board of Supervisors may annually, at any meeting held between the first day of January and March of each year, levy upon each male person over twenty-one and under fifty-five years of age, found in each road district during the time for the collection of road poll taxes for that year, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the Army or Navy of the United States at any time between the first day of April in the year of Our Lord 1861 and the first day of May 1865.

Mexican Independence.

The Sixty-eighth Anniversary of Mexican Indebendence was celebraten at Lone Pine, last Monday, with the customary ceremonies. A large number of visitors attended from other parts of the Valley and from the neighboring state of Nevada. A great deal of interest was taken in a foot-race between Manuel Diaz and Walter Ober. This came off in the afternoon, and was very closely contested. The distance was 125 yards and the Judges decided that Ober won by eighteen inches. The start was made by a pistol shot, and Diaz bounded away on the lead Ober soon overtook him and passed leading to the finish; time 13½ seconds. A good deal of money changed hands on the result, of the race. A ball at night wound up the festivities; the attendance was very large and everybody appeared to have great enjoyment.

Matched Teams.

BISHOP, Sept. 18th, 1889.

MR. C. MULHOLLAND,
Independence.

Dear Sir:—The 18th Dist. Fair Association off r a premium for carriage and buggy teams "best matched." What will govern the decision in this case, the best matched in color and markings, or best in training, gait, size and general makeup of a perfect, well broken team?

Some of the best teams in the county are not matched in color, but are in other desirable qualities.

All horsemen are more or less interested; please answer through the INYO INDEPENDENT. Respectfully, etc.

W. H. GEORGE, M. D.

Since the receipt of the above letter a majority of the Board of Directors has been consulted by the Secretary of the Association, and they agree that, other things bning equal, the team best matched in color would be preferred. This will apply more particularly to carriage teams. In the case of buggy teams, it will be seen by reference to the premium list in this paper that the word "matched" is not used. This would allow the premium in that case to be awarded to the "best team," irrespective of color.

Sanguine of Good Times.

Business men of Los Angeles are very sanguine of a great revival of mining in Inyo County. The Herald of recent date says: All the signs point to the fact that a great mining upheaval is on the tapis for California, for Southern California, for South-western Nevada and Utah, and for Arizona. The conditions of this great movement hinge upon transportation conditions already greatly improved and upon the imminent further greatly increased improvement of the facilities for forwarding supplies to hitherto remote regions, to be followed by abundant ores on the return trains. The intelligent investing public are already awake to the greatly enhanced mining situation, and developed mines of substantial merit already command the instant attention of investors. The Herald has frequently of late called the attention of its readers to the striking opportunities for mining speculation involved in the extension of the C. & C. Railway to the rich Cerro Gordo and Owens Lake region. This railway davelopement will shortly embrace a connection with Los Angeles. When this short strip of country is spanned meritorious mines without number will be worked, and the movement will extend for hundreds of miles eastward from the California line in Nevada and Utah. The truth is that we are about to start out on an era of unexampled ore development over extensive zones of territory, that will recoup the United States for the extensive shipments of the precious metals to Europe during the past twelve months, and guarantee to the Pacific Coast States a high tide of prosperity and development.

N. G. Fairman, of Panamint, was in Independence this week.

Mrs. Sallie M. Bell came down from Big Pine last Thursday.

Miss Grace McAfee is engaged to teach school at Fish Lake Valley.

There were some peals of thunder among the mountains last Thursday.

Manuel Diaz and Ben. Lasky were up from Lone Pine on Thursday.

Mr. Fred. McAfee came in from Fish Lake Valley last Thursday and will remain till after the fair.

On Thursday last the Bishop Creek Band was engaged to play at Independence during Fair week.

On Wednesday Mr. H. M. Yerington, President of the C. & R. R., went down to Keeler on a special tain.

Mr. A. O. Collins, of Warm Spring, and Mr. G. Sanger, of Big Pine, were in town last Thursday on business at the Land office.

Mr. McIver set out twenty acres of corn on his place on the Eastside Canal. It was the beginning of May before he began to clear the land of sage brush, and near the end of June when the corn was planted. Mr. McIver was too closely engaged pushing the canal along to give the corn much attention; the stalks are not tall, but the ears are very plump and heavy and the yield will be a fair crop. Grapevines set out among the corn are doing remarkably well, and the tract will make a fine vineyard. In another place on his land Mr. McIver has forty thousand grape cuttings set for rooting. These are doing well, and will be in fine condition for transplanting next spring. Young apple and other fruit and shade trees are also doing well.

Want Appeal.

Mr. J. L. Patterson, Superintendent of the Runover mine, near Daggett, was recently traveling on horseback toward the camp with five thousand dollars in his posession to pay the miners. He was met by a robber named Perry Dobson, who robbed him of his money and horse. Mr. Patterson was unarmed and did not suspect his assailant till the latter was close upon him and pointed a pistol at him. Mr. Patterson got a man named John Ackerman to accompany him and followed the robber. They overtook him at Coyote Holes last Thursday evening; he began shooting and they put nine bullets into him. This sent him to the Court of last resort, where there are no applications for a new trial. The stolen money wae found upon the body.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Excursion Rates.

To those desiring to attend the California State Fair the Carson & Colorado railroad will issue from Saturday, September 7th, to Saturday, September 21st, 1889, tickets from Bishop, Alvord, Independence, Lone Pine and Keeler to Reno and return at $20, passengers purchasing tickets at Reno for Sacramento and return at $9 40. CHAPTER XI.

UNGRATEFUL POPULACE.

Philip Breton sat late over the tea table, one evening some days after. His father had been detained down in the village, and had come home with a good deal on his mind. Indeed, the old gentleman, who generally laid aside his hardness outside his own doors, had sat in silence wrinkling his forehead very inartistically almost throughout the meal.

"Poor folks are always ungrateful," he exclaimed harshly at last as he shook his head severely at the maid servant who offered him the cake basket.

"Here I have whitewashed every house for them, and it was only to-night I heard some grumbling old woman tell her husband, she wondered how old Breton would like to live in one of his own tenements."

Philip said nothing. It had been his habit lately, when his father got on this theme, to keep silence. He was puzzled to know what to say.

"Why, look at it, Phil. The insurance on the burned mill won't make up for the lost time in rebuilding, and this is the time they select to ask for fire escapes. Yield them an inch and they want an ell. I suppose they think I ought to run the factory for a big benevolent institution. Every man that is poor curses me for it, and not one shiftless family in town, I'll warrant, but would lay the fault on my shoulders. By the way, Phil, you have been to college; you ought to know if there isn't any way I can stop the tongue of that tall brown haired fellow. Can't the law touch him? I have discharged him, but he does more mischief than ever."

"Discharged Curran!" exclaimed Philip. "You don't mean it! why, he is the man that saved Bertha's life," he continued hurriedly. "You must take him back at once—you must take him back at once, no matter what he has said."

"No matter what he has done either, I suppose," said Mr. Breton, with some heat. "Perhaps I know more of the interesting young man than you do," he went on, insidiously. "It may be as well for you if I open your eyes a little—what is it, Mary?"

"Three men at the door, sir. They want to see you, sir."

"I think they are workmen." The mill owner found three of his workmen in his study; all standing when he entered because they felt less awkward on their feet.

"Send my son in," he called to Mary. "He might as well learn how to meet this sort of occasion."

The delegation of workmen did not look very fierce. One of them kept gazing longingly out of the window, and smoothing his napless felt hat. Another, out of whose soiled coat pocket stuck the stem of a clay pipe, was studying the ceiling of the room with an intensity only explainable by his fear of his master's eye. They were two of the men who had peered into the parlor windows of this very house on the evening our story commences. The third was John Graves, whose eyes were fixed unflinchingly on the mill owner for whom he had a message. When Philip came in he was a little startled to see his quondam host, but the man had other things to think of than the possible identity of this elegantly dressed young gentleman with the ungrateful tramp he had kept once over night.

"There's a meetin' of the mill han's down in the hall, sir, and they sent us up to ask a favor."

Mr. Breton had seated himself before his long office table and pulled up a file of business letters.

"You have too many meetings," he said loudly. "You talk so much you aren't fit to work. Some of the noisiest of you will find themselves out of a job some fine morning; one man did the other day."

The two other men looked anxiously at their spokesman. If they had dared they would have begun to make excuses for coming. Their wives and babies must be fed, and talking about their rights wouldn't ever feed them. Let others who could afford to offend him go to the meetings. But the poor fellows were afraid to raise their voices, even in apology.

"But the willingest of us all don't want to be roasted to death, and it aint a bit pleasanter to us men folks to think of seein' our wives and children burnt up before our eyes. Our women aint quite so purty as those of the rich, but we prize 'em as much. We come to ask for fire escapes on the mills. So if there should happen to come a fire in day time, when the mills were full, the poor critters could git out." It was quite a long speech for John Graves in such august presence, and he delivered it in the monotonous Yankee drawl which carries high tragedy or low comedy without a distinction of accent.

"There is no danger," he answered with a gruff laugh, "and in business we can't spend much money providing against very unlikely events. Fire escapes would be a piece of useless extravagance." Mr. Breton looked sharply at his visitors over the file of letters. "It would make necessary another cut in your pay."

Bill Rogers fingered his pipe uneasily in the significant silence that followed, and finally drew it half out of his pocket through force of habit in distress. Then he found his voice.

"Yer jokin', squire; yer wouldn't cut us poor devils down again. The last cut seemed as if it would kill us, till we found how little it takes to keep soul and body together if a critter don't expect nothin' else. Why, squire, a dog has the best of some on us now; for folks let him steal." The tall man thrust back his pipe into the depths of his pocket, and his face hardened into a sullen expression as he added solemnly: "I cal'late another cut would fill all the jails in the country. Yer might as well give us the least we can live on here as support us in prison."

It was quite a long speech for John Graves.

The mill owner rose to his feet with a bustling movement of impatience. The unreasonable beings had no conception of the principles of political economy, but always had some particular hardship of their own to urge against its beautiful theories, as if what made the rich more rich must not in some way help the beggars even that cringed at their feet.

"Well, well, I don't mean to cut you again if you don't bother me too much. I have lost so much that I really can't afford another dollar of expense." He rang the bell for the servant.

There was a gleam of sarcastic humor in John Graves' black eyes.

"But wouldn't it now be quite a loss to burn up a thousand such good cheap factory han's? I wouldn't thought you could afford that. These fire 'scapes now"——

"Show them out, Mary," interrupted Mr. Breton angrily. "You might as well know, I could find a thousand as good and as cheap, in a week," and he shut the office door after them with a slam.

"But you have let those men go away thinking you had just as lief they would be burned to death," expostulated Philip, flushing with excitement.

"Nothing of the kind, sir, only that—but do you take sides with them? That is the last thing I expected, that my own son would take part against me." Possibly the old gentleman was a little ashamed of having spoken quite as harshly to the workmen as he had. It would be repeated all about town. And it was certainly incautious, but his very uneasiness made him the more provoked at Philip's suggestion. "I presume you picked up a few socialistic ideas at school. No doubt you would like to put on the fire escapes out of the money your mother left you." He rang the bell violently.

"Yes I would," exclaimed Philip, his eyes lighting up. "I will be very glad to pay for it all. It seems unjust, somehow, to crowd the men and girls into the mills as thick as they can work, and not provide so but that they all may be burned to"——

"Mary, bring those three men back," interrupted Mr. Breton.

"But they are on the street by this."

"It makes no difference," and the choleric old gentleman brought his fist down with a crash on the table. "Go after them if you have to chase them a mile. Bring them back, I say."

The little office clock ticked its loudest to break the silence until the door opened to let in the returning committee. What could it mean? Mr. Breton stood with his back turned to them, drumming on the window pane, while Philip, pale and uncomfortable, looked nervously at his father and then at the three awkward figures in the doorway, with the breathless servant girl behind them waiting for startling developments.

"You can report to your meeting," said Mr. Breton in a constrained voice, without facing the workmen, "that my son will put on the fire escapes at his own expense. That is all."

The men were astonished. So the young mill owner's son had begun to redeem his promise of the night of the fire. There were rough words of gratitude on their lips, their hearts were in a glow, after the first chill of disappointment, but there was an influence in the little office that hushed their eager speech, and they only ducked their heads in awkward acknowledgment and followed the maid out.

"Did you suppose," said Mr. Breton in a calmer tone as he left the window and took his chair by the long table, "that I was going to let you pay for those fire escapes? Not a penny, my dear boy, but you can have the credit of it, discredit I should call it." He opened the drawer and drew out a sheet of business paper.

"The Breton Mills," was printed at the top. He dipped his pen in the ink and wrote in the date.

Then he wrote the address, as follows: "John T. Giddings, Esq., Attorney at Law, 42 Loring street, Lockout."

"Please sit down, Phil. I am not much in the habit of talking of my business to anybody, but I presume it is your right to know this." Mr. Breton laid down his pen and clasped his hands behind his back. "I want to make this mill four times its present size; I haven't the money, but other men have. I am going to take those other men in with me, and then turn the whole thing into a corporation. Giddings is managing it for me."

Philip's face fell. A corporation! Then all his thoughts of some day letting a little light into the lives of the villagers, so far always in the shadow, his dreams which had lent a new dignity to his life, were all for nothing. A soulless corporation, with nobody to blame for an act of injustice! How it would rivet the shackles of the poor past any power of his hands to loose them.

"What is the trouble, my boy?" smiled his father, in his superior wisdom. "One would think you wanted the tough job I have had, over again. It is too much, too much for a man; why, I thought I was doing you a kindness. A man thinks, at first, he is strong, that he won't care for the murmurs and the threatenings of his help, but he gets tired. The amount of power, almost like God's, Philip," said Mr. Breton excitedly, "almost like God's, which a big fortune gives a man, is too much, too much." He came around the table, and put his hand on his son's shoulder.

"The people are poor and unhappy; we can't shut our eyes to it. Don't we all wonder," he went on in this new, strange mood Philip was fairly startled at, "don't we all wonder what life is worth to them that they are so hungry for the bread that keeps the breath in them? And they all blame the men who own the mills; they think it is our hardness and injustice. A man may know he is all right, that rich men have always done as he is doing, that the few always have the best of everything, and seem to deprive the masses of their rights. But it wears on a man; he wants to get behind somebody or something occasionally."

The little office clock ticked on restlessly, for another week, and Philip had come to feel that to be in love may be the most terrible misfortune of a man's life. His pride had not let him call again on Bertha for days of distress, days of hot, dry wretchedness, whose dawn was a new, pitiless reminder of his quenchless passion that met only insult. It was insult, as he felt it, for a lover has sensibilities painfully acute, and can detect the slightest change in a woman's relations with him, by signs too subtle for unstimulated observation. A hair's breadth variation in tone makes mysterious revelations, sweet or bitter to him; a shade of expression in the beautiful blue eyes, has a meaning clearer than words, to thrill him with hope, or plunge him into despair. And in those days, too, he found time to remember how unloverlike Bertha had always been to him, and the many times she had met his ardor with coldness, with all the instances of hardness and neglect she had meted out to his devotion, rose up in his mind like hideous sins that will not be forgot. How he had fooled himself, and yet he had been so happy in his delusion.

There came a light tap at the door. He closed the drawers and turned about in his chair in time to see Mary, the maid, enter with a letter for him. He glanced at the writing, and then was so angry at the sweet glow about his heart that he tossed the letter carelessly on the table.

The maid had lingered with a woman's unwearying taste for sentiment; but now she slammed the door on him and went bridling down the hall in high dudgeon.

"He's a pretty beau, he is," she muttered; "if I was that girl of his I'd teach him to treat my love letters that way."

But the maid did not see, for the door was shut, what might have better suited her ideas of propriety. Her young master had torn open the envelope and read the three lines of the letter before Mary had finished her disgusted soliloquy. Then he reread it a dozen times and behaved generally in as foolish a fashion as the most exacting sweetheart could have desired. But there were only three lines.

"I have not deserved it, I do not deserve it; but will you call before 7 to-night?

"BERTHA."

But where was his sullen determination never to see her again? Had he forgotten so soon that she had never loved him? But he remembered that moment that to-morrow was the day she had promised to let him talk of marriage to her. There was a new flash on his face, which any woman might have thought handsome now, and a new bright light in his eyes. Why, it was near 7 o'clock now. And he rose to go out.

"Bah!" It was his father who opened the door and came in, tearing a scrap of paper between his fat fingers.

But Philip thrust his letter into his inside pocket, and then made sure it was safe, as if it were a precious ticket of admission.

"My dear Phil, if there ever was a man fool enough to try and give the poor what they want, they would lead him the wildest kind of a wild goose chase, I can tell you. You'll see yet I was right about those fire escapes. Since they have got those the help are clamoring for something new every day. They devote all their spare time trying to think of some Right they are kept out of. I suppose the ninnies imagine the mills ought to be run in their interest," and Mr. Breton smiled at the absurdity of the idea conjured up. Then he tossed the torn bits of paper into the waste basket. "There goes one of their warnings, I have burned a dozen within a week. 'If I don't do this or that, my wills will stop,' they read. I wouldn't wonder if a strike was brewing. I only hope they will give me one more day. They might scare some of the capitalists if they should make a disturbance to-morrow, but after to-morrow it will be too late. They can do their worst; we shall always have the whip hand of them."

"Is your corporation actually going to be started to-morrow?" exclaimed Philip, breathlessly; "I didn't know but it was given up."

"I never give anything up, my son. But you can help me a good deal if you will. The hands trust you, they would do as you urged them. You understand how to talk to them. Yes, you do; don't stop me; didn't your ready tongue save the mill once, the night of the fire? Now, just you run down town, go into their meeting, if there is any, calm them down some way, I don't care how. Philip; all I want is one day more. If they should happen to strike to-morrow, good gracious, Phil, it might knock my corporation scheme all to smithereens. Little mercy they'd ever get after that from me, though. You see they won't gain anything either way, strike or no strike, but you see I might lose."

Philip moved toward the door in silence. To-morrow goodby to hope from any help of his, and his father expected him to——

"That's right, my boy; don't delay; I am expecting a man here every minute, and I"——

"But, father, I can't"——

"Yes, you can. Ah! good evening, Mr. Giddings. My son, Mr. Giddings, my lawyer."

"But I must say one word to you."

"No, positively not one moment, Phil; later on. Good night."

CHAPTER XII.

A NEW GALATEA.

Bertha rose from her chair slowly, like one in a dream, and looked long and earnestly at Philip as he came toward her. There was a red spot on either cheek, and her eyes seemed preternaturally large and bright. At first he fancied it was out of joy at seeing him. Then she smiled as if she had not thought of it before, but with a strange gentleness that was intensely pathetic.

"You don't come as often as you used, but you have always been very good and kind to me, Philip," she said vaguely, as if rehearsing the virtues of the departed.

His heart came into his throat, and he could not speak. Was this her coming back to him? It was more like a funeral. She motioned him to sit near her, and then started and seemed to listen.

"Have I been very cold and hard with you, Philip, when you wanted me to love you?" She laid her hot fingers on his hand, but her eyes wandered lingeringly around the parlor walls.

"It is nothing, my own sweetheart," he answered her anxiously; "only say you love me now."

She did not seem to hear him. "I must have made you suffer. I did not understand, you know, what it all meant."

She had taken his hand, and bent over toward him with a troubled look on her face. She rested one hand on his shoulder, and her lips almost touched his forehead.

"Do you forgive me?" she said softly, and yet her voice was as dispassionate as an angel's whisper.

"Why, there is nothing to forgive," Philip answered, his words of love frozen on his lips, there was something so terrible in the mysterious mood that was upon her. "But do you remember," he added with a forced smile, "what you promised for to-morrow?"

"To-morrow?" she drew back from him fearfully; "to-morrow," she repeated as if the word had some mystery in it. "Have I promised you anything for to-morrow?"

It was not Bertha Ellingsworth at all, as he had known her—it was rather as he had dreamed she might be. In the commonest of women are elements of character, germs of emotions, that in their height and fused together can glorify her to a creature of resistless power and dignity, with holy fire shining in her face. It is the sleeping goddess men worship in women, for worship is the truest form of love, and when that worship is lost the part of love for which a man would make a hero of himself and rise above every groveling taint in his nature is lost, too. A woman may sin and not repent; she may seem as shallow as the surf on the shining sand just before its ebb, but so long as a man believes in the goddess in her he waits on her folly, he strives to gild over her sin in ennobling reverence for her possibilities.

"Why, to-morrow was the day you promised to let me talk of"——

"I remember." She drew back from him and clasped her white hands for a moment over her forehead; "and have you been thinking a great deal of it?"

"Why not to-night, Bertha?" he begged in sudden fervor.

But she started to her feet like one in mortal terror. "Oh no, not to-night!"

Then she came near him again, and looked down with a new sad smile as he held her hand to his lips. "You don't mind very much, do you? I am not very much of a woman really," she said wistfully, "if it wasn't for the habit you have fallen into."

Then she glanced at the clock on the mantel.

She followed him to the door.

"How sad the moonlight is. I am afraid of it," she said as she held out her hand to him.

Then he heard a broken voice coming, it seemed a long way to his ears.

"Oh, Philip, aren't you going to kiss me good—good night?"

His passion he had thought crushed came over him in a storm. He gathered her yielding form in his arms as if he never would lose her again, and kissed her trembling, answering lips a dozen times and her wet, anxious eyes.

"Bertha, I will not go," he whispered hurriedly. "I cannot leave you so."

But she had gently released herself from his embrace. She tried to smile at him through her tears.

"No, no, you must go." Still he hesitated till a strange eagerness came into the blue eyes. "No, no, you must go. Goodby, Philip."

RECEIVED A SMALL FORTUNE.

W. G. Wallace Made Happy by the Receipt of $15,000 from the Louisiana State Lottery.

William G. Wallace, freight train conductor on the Flint & Pere Marquette Railroad upon whom Fortune smiled so broadly recently, is taking matters very cooly and to look at or speak with him one would not imagine he was the luckiest individual in several States.

"I had been investing in Louisiana State Lottery tickets about a year and a half, though not regularly," Mr. Wallace said to the Courier recently. "In June, while on my run east, I was importuned by a station agent on the line to purchase a Louisiana State Lottery ticket for the drawing that month. I hesitated at first, but he stuck to me, asking me to purchase as a personal favor, it being his first venture in ticket selling. Ten days prior to the drawing we met again and then giving him $1 I took the first ticket in the package he held. I did not look at the number, but placing the coupon in my pocket almost forgot about it. Two days after the drawing I visited Doc' Lyons' on Potter street and there read the list of numbers drawing prizes. The figures on top attracted my attention and it flashed across my mind that a piece of paper in my vest and the first prize were closely related. Comparing them I discovered with great satisfaction that I had drawn one-fortieth of the capital prize of $600,000. Excited? No. Rubbing my eyes to assure myself I was not dreaming, I went home to tell my wife the good news and started off to work the next morning. I gave the ticket to the East Saginaw National Bank for collection, and eight days after received $15,000, less $60 collection fees and express charges. It is now on deposit there. I am too young to quit work and in fact have no desire to."

Mr. Wallace has resided here six years, is married and has one child, and a host of friends who congratulate him on his good fortune.—East Saginaw (Mich.) Courier, July 16.

IDLENESS IS A DANGEROUS FAULT

In the kidneys. When inactive they speedily fall into disrepair. Those obstinate and fatal maladies, Bright's disease and diabetes, ensue with terrible certainty upon the inaction of the organs affected. Catarrh of the bladder, enuresis, gravel and strangury are also to be apprehended from a partial paralysis of the bladder, of which weakness and sluggishness are the causes. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fine tonic and promoter of activity for the renal organs, and one which can be relied upon to afford them the requisite stimulus without exciting them—an effect to be feared from the unmedicated alcoholic excitant of commerce. A further beneficent effect of the Bitters, by renewing activity of the kidneys, is to enable them to drain from the blood in its passage through them, impurities productive of rheumatism and dropsy. Nervousness, fever and ague, constipation and dyspepsia are conquered by the Bitters.

CONFIDENCE BEGOT OF SUCCESS.

So confident are the manufacturers of that world-famed remedy, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, that it will do all that they represent, in the cure of liver, blood and lung diseases, that, after witnessing its thousands of cures for many years past, they now feel warranted in selling it (as they are doing, through druggists) under a positive guarantee of its giving satisfaction in every case, or money paid for it will be refunded. No medicine of ordinary merit could be sold under such severe conditions with profit to its proprietors, and no other medicine for the diseases for which it is recommended was ever before sold under a guarantee of a cure or no pay. In all blood taints and impurities of whatever name or nature, it is most positive in its curative effects. Pimples, blotches, eruptions and all skin and scalp diseases are radically cured by this wonderful medicine. Scrofulous diseases may affect the glands, causing swellings of the neck, throat, jaw, causing "fever sores," "white swellings" or "hip-joint disease;" or the tissues of the lungs, causing pulmonary consumption. No matter in which one of its myriad forms it crops out, or manifests itself, "Golden Medical Discovery" will cure it if used perseveringly and in time.

MEDICINAL PLANTS.

They Grow in Great Profusion Near the City of Trujillo, Central America.

A considerable portion of the trade of Trujillo is in medicinal plants, more of which grow in the department of Olancho than in any other portion of Central America. The sarsaparilla vine grows wild, and one has only to walk a few steps beyond the town limits to run against its thorns. It is a climbing vine, and clings as close to bushes, trees, and rocks as the common ivy. Natives make trips into the woods at regular intervals, gathering its reddish brown roots in small quantities, which always command a ready sale to the seaport merchants, who separate it into two qualities, governed by the diameter of the root and its color and richness of juice. The pieces are cut in one foot lengths and shipped to foreign countries in twenty-five pound bales. The medicinal properties of the vine are not recognized in Honduras, and when the native thinks his blood needs purifying he physics himself with blue-mass pills until he salivates himself.

There is a plant called the cayamuela, which has the peculiar property of salivation. It is about four feet high, with a flexible stalk like our milkweed, having at its top a yellow lily. The pungent odor of the stalk when inhaled swells the face like poison ivy, and the leaves, if eaten, loosen the teeth. Cattle instinctively avoid it as the southwest of our country avoid "needle grass," which pierces and cuts their entrails.

The thick forests immediately back of the town are inhabited by hundreds of families of monkeys, and one frequently has a sense of fellow-feeling when in some solitary and secluded spot he sees an old and wrinkled patriarch perched high up in some tree, scrutinizing one's appearance with that ridiculous solemnity which only a monkey can affect. I have heard tales of travelers and surveyors in which monkeys in cocoa palms make themselves disagreeable by throwing cocoanuts at one's head with malicious intention, but it never has been my experience to find the monkey any more dangerous than the prairie dog of our western plains. I secured some very fine black, long-haired monkey skins, such as are made into $40 muffs and ladies' capes, for fifty cents apiece in silver.

In the many small Indian villages through which the mahogany roads passed I experienced nothing but kindness and hospitality for a very small price, twenty-five cents being one night's bill for the outfit, including four animals, two Indian servants and myself. Many of the men were away from home, in the mahogany cuttings, and most of the women, while keeping their vegetable gardens and corn fields in good condition, found time to manufacture ropes, hammocks, saddlebags, horse gear, and hats from the "pita," or fiber of a variety of cactus which covers the low lands in the greatest profusion.

The cactus leaf is cut and rolled and pressed between flat stones, to squeeze out all pulpy matter. The mass of fiber is then dried in the sun and separated into threads, to be twisted and fashioned as desired. I saw some very fine hammocks of a flexibility never seen among those sent to foreign countries, which sell on the spot for $25. They are nearly as fine as lace-work, and so skillfully are the different colors braided in that they look like embroidery a few feet distant.—Cor. Chicago News.

CONTAMINATED WATER.

How to Get Rid of Disagreeable Odors Emanating from Cisterns.

The cistern should be cleaned out. A very large quantity of filth collects on roofs and is washed into cisterns, and this quickly ferments and gives off very offensive gases which are absorbed by the water. A cistern therefore needs thorough cleaning every spring, and should be provided with a filter made of gravel, sand and charcoal, through which the water passes on its way from the roof. A simple filter of gravel and even of coarse flannel will arrest much of the matter which is washed from the roof, and after a dry time when this collects abundantly in the gutters, the use of a filter is very desirable. A filter may be made of a barrel prepared as follows: Bore in the bottom a large number of holes and lay a screen of fine wire gauze over these; on the screen place two or three inches of fine washed gravel; on this four inches of clean river or sea sand washed; then six inches of finely broken charcoal; on this lay four inches of the washed sand; then three inches of the fine gravel and a covering of small stones to receive the water, which is best run through a rose strainer to spread the force of the water and avoid disturbing the filtering layers. The barrel should be placed over the cover of the cistern. Every spring this filter should be taken apart and washed and put together again. Every care should be exercised to keep the cover of the cistern tight and to exclude dust, worms, mice, rats, etc., all of which are frequent sources of pollution of cisterns. It is recommended to put a bag of charcoal in the cistern to absorb the foul odors. This is exceedingly bad advice. It is only a temporary device; it only mitigates the evil for a time, and it misleads the people into danger. The foul gases from a corrupt cistern are a most serious danger to health and may very easily provoke attacks of malignant and fatal diseases. The cause of the evil should be removed and avoided.—Rural New Yorker.

NOTES FOR BEE-KEEPERS.

An Effective and Simple Way of Preventing After Swarms.

I have tried various plans to prevent second swarms by hiving in different ways, such as moving the old hive to a new stand, and hiving the new swarm or the new one over to the old; also hiving the swarms to themselves, and giving them a portion of the brood from the parent hives, etc. All of these have proved to be unsatisfactory to me, owing to the fact that these methods have a tendency to lessen the amount of surplus, since the old hive is so reduced that it is a long while before it becomes strong enough to work in the boxes. Hence we have only the new swarm to depend upon for a surplus, where we depend wholly upon clover and basswood for box honey. I always aim to keep every colony strong—the ones that have cast a swarm, as well as the new ones. My experience teaches me that light swarms during the honey season give no profit. I would rather have half a bushel of bees in one hive than divided by two, having a peck in each hive, when the honey season is at hand.

In hiving bees, the plan that suits me best is to return one-third of the swarm to the old hive, put the remaining two-thirds in a new hive, and add to it, as soon as may be, one or more two-thirds swarms (without queens this time), each time returning the third of the bees to the hive from which they came. The surplus queens, if good ones, may be returned to their respective hives after cutting off all the queen-cells. By this method the old hive is kept well stocked with bees, and work in the boxes is very little interrupted, and new colonies are made very strong, and are in the best of condition to store a large amount of honey in the boxes. As I do not desire a large increase of colonies, I strive to secure a large surplus, regardless of increase.

To prevent second swarms I go to the hives four days after a swarm has issued, lift out the combs one by one, and cut out all queen-cells but one, leaving the best one if I wish to rear a queen from this stock; if not, all are cut out, and a cell from some other is introduced. Then in four days more I again cut out any queen cells that may have been started, after which there is no danger of more being started. Now, when the young queen hatches and finds no rival, and the bees not being able to rear another, owing to the age of the brood, the young queen is permitted to leave the hive for fertilization, without the bees following her; and in due time she will commence to lay. But if the young queen is allowed to hatch before the other cells are removed, as recommended by some writers, even if the cells are removed very soon after the queen hatches, there is danger of a second swarm. But if all surplus cells are removed before the queen hatches, there is no danger of a second swarm; at least that has been my experience the past few years.

One night last season my son reported six second swarms that day (this being only his second season in having charge of an apairy, and he had forgotten my instructions of the year before; upon inquiry I learned that he had not removed the cells the second time; or on the eighth day, thinking that, if he removed them soon after the young hatched from the cells left in the hive, when looking them over the fourth day after the swarm had issued, it would be as well. But the result was six after-swarms in one day. I visited his yard next day and helped him cut out the surplus cells from all that had swarmed seven or eight days previously; and cautioned him to attend to this matter in the future, which he did, and the result was no more second swarms.—Gleanings.

MEASURING HAY.

Rules That Will Work Well Enough When Scales Are Not Obtainable.

There is so much difference in the quality of hay that it is impossible to decide the matter accurately. It is generally believed that 400 cubic feet in a large bay taking it right through, or 500 on a long, wide deep scaffold, will represent a ton. When the hay is cut early, is stored evenly over the mow, is well trodden when stored away, and is allowed to settle two or three months before measuring, perhaps it will hold out at the above figures. When grass is allowed to stand until nearly ripe before cutting, it will occupy nearly (if not quite, twenty-five per cent. more bulk, especially on a scaffold, than the early cut, and require about that many more cubic feet for a ton. Coarse hay, as timothy and clover, will not weigh as heavy, bulk for bulk, as that which is fine like common prairie or wild hay. It is much more satisfactory to both buyer and seller to weigh the hay when possible.

In estimating by measurement, multiply together the figures representing the length, width and height of the hay, and divide the product by the number of feet in a ton. For example, if the hay is forty feet long, sixteen feet wide and eighteen feet from the bottom to the top of the mow, and the bulk agreed is 400 feet to the ton, the mow will contain 40 plus 16 plus 18 equals 11,520 cubic feet; 11,520, divided by 400 equals 28 tons and 320 feet, or 28 4-5 tons. It would require considerably more than 400 cubic feet from the top of such a mow for a ton; while at the bottom it will have become packed so solidly from the great weight above it, that 400 cubic feet will weigh considerable more than 2,000 pounds.—Orange Judd Farmer.

BURDETTE'S ADVICE.

What the Humorist Learned By Attending a High School Commencement.

My son, a few weeks since I was called out to the great State of Illinois to attend the commencement exercises of the high school in Dwight, a pretty little town in Livingston County. You know about what a high school commencement is; there were orations by the young gentlemen and ladies upon "The Golden Mean of Mental, Moral and Physical Power," "From the Morning to the Evening," "Success," "A Plea For the Boy of To-day," "A Plea For the Girl of To-day," "John A. Logan" and "Night Brings Out the Stars;" you know about what it is. Well, I listened and I grew interested and I learned something that I should have known a hundred years ago and I was glad I went to Dwight, Ill., and attended a high school commencement. On my way back home I talked it all over with myself—you know I like to talk with myself on the train, much better then I do with the casual stranger. Because when I get tired I can shut myself up, whereas the communicative stranger who pulls his mouth upon the defenseless traveler will sometimes hold him up from Chicago to Brooklyn and talk him clear into the Eden of the Eagle office. Thinking over what the graduates of the high school had said in oration and essay, I began to wish that I could say the same things in the same way. I envied Louise De Clercq, and Nellie Doherty, and Frederick Smith, and Henry Wood, and Bessie Huey, and Charles Vickery, and Nellie Jeffries, their views of life. They had a familiar sound, too, but I didn't quite recollect where I heard them before. But it dawned on me, after awhile. I began to remember an essay on "The Press and the Ballot Box," which, at the time I read it, I believed contained the essence of all Truth and Philosophy, and was a prophecy of what was to be within a very few years from the date of that masterly paper. And a bright, rosy-tinted, glowing prophecy it was. I said: "You miserable old cynic—" you see in these familiar conversations which I hold with the best man on the train, I sometimes take things from myself that I wouldn't from a smaller man—"you miserable old cynic, I know what is the matter with you; you have lost enthusiasm; and losing that you have lost all the soul that a man's work has. You have lost enthusiasm, and that makes you a hireling; you have lost faith and that shrivels your soul; you have lost 'hurrah' and are of no earthly account in a mass meeting; your waist has grown faster than your mind, and that has made you lazy; you are too old for tennis, too scant in the breath for base-ball, too active for cricket, too fond of ease for society, and because none of these are right in your line, you say: 'All is vanity.' Every thing is vanity to a useless man. Get back to the starter's scratch and begin over. Look at the world as do these youngsters and you'll believe more in your fellow-men and in yourself. You will correct certain mean tendencies toward scoffing and burlesquing every thing that doesn't please you. I talked to myself like a deacon all the way across Ohio and Pennsylvania. Then, when I came East I attended a college commencement. A great school; standard higher than the mortgage on the Eiffel Tower. I cowered in a corner and was pounded into a condition of numbness with Greek orations and Latin essays. And the English orations were marvels of elegant diction, smooth, well-rounded sentences, and the choicest English, clothing the noblest sentiments, from which at intervals solid chunks of wisdom fell upon the floor with a dull, sickening thud. It was grand, and even the president nodded his approval and grave professors forgot their dignity and applauded. And the president made a speech and two or three learned doctors of the law and divinity made eloquent and thoughtful addresses. But wise and learned as it all was I kept on wondering where I had heard it all before—saving only the Greek and Latin. Ah, yes; I had it. At Dwight. That's where I heard it. Sift the thought out of the language of the high school out West and the university down East, and it was about the same thing. The same generous, manly, brave, hopeful way of looking at things, the same earnestness, the same enthusiasm that keeps the learned doctors as young and brave as the boys whom they teach, year after year; the same sublime confidence in his own ability to do a little better than any other man in the vineyard, shaping the thought and nerving mind and body of the high school boy and the college graduate; no wonder I envied them. I felt grateful to them; I made up—what for the sake of brevity I may be permitted to call my mind, that I would look at the world with their eyes; that I would believe in them; that I would grumble less and sing more; that I would close out my stock of censure and put in a full line of praise; that I would sigh less frequently and hurrah more loudly and upon slighter provocation. I am going to every commencement at Haveford, my boy, between now and the year when you will cross the threshold, and you look to it that when you graduate your old father won't know nearly as much as you do.—Robert J. Burdette, in Brooklyn Eagle.

WHIMS OF FASHION.

Some of the Things Which Society Women Have Pronounced "Correct."

Foulards seem to be in very high favor.

Old-fashioned berege is again worn to some extent.

The skirts of tulle dresses are now made in fan plisses.

The old-fashioned red coral necklace is to be seen about some fair throats.

The features of fashionable toilets for evening wear are small, low hats, low coiffures, undraped skirts, no bustles, full sleeves and wide belts.

There is a return to white lace for the throat and sleeves of bodices, even for afternoon wear. Even with high corsage many lace jabots are seen, held here and there by jeweled pins.

With gowns of black lace and net, pointed Swiss girdles of big jet beads are worn. These girdles should be worn only about slender waists, as they increase the size of a large one and take off from the length.

Charming pins for use with theater bonnets and the airy lace and tulle structures called "spring hats" are long, narrow-bladed gold and silver swords. The blades may be twelve inches long and are generally as fine as straws.

Berlin ladies are wearing dresses in a color called "spirit flame," a tint formed of the blended shades of red, blue and violet. The same color has been worn in New York and Chicago for six months. Here it is known as "punch-flame" blue.

A fashion writer says that on the other side every ornament usually made in other stones is now seen in garnets, brooches, pins, bracelets, combs, earrings, rings and necklaces, and, in addition, very pretty picture frames in various sizes.

The black, white and vari-colored tulle dresses, which are taking the place of the lace gowns heretofore considered an indispensable part of a lady's wardrobe effects, are made of a coarse, strong tulle net, either plain, dotted, beaded or embroidered.

Young English women are wearing the nun's cap," a sort of bonnet which has to be viewed from the back to be seen at all, as nothing is visible from a front view when the capote is on the wearer's head except a forest of very fluffy, haloish-looking hair and some wide, flat Alsatian bows, inclined downward, forming a kind of bandeau.—Chicago News.

CARE OF POULTRY.

How Mrs. Wolcott Keeps Her Hen House Clean All the Year Around.

I find a good way to keep down lice in a hen house or coop is to cleanse the movable parts by fire. I clean out the nests and gather up the rubbish that will burn. I then scrape off any filth that may be in the roost, etc. Then I set fire to the straw and hold the roost in the blaze one by one until they are smoking hot. I fill my nest boxes and coops one-half full of straw and wet them if they are very dry. I set it on fire and turn the boxes down and let the flame creep out through every crevice.

I use lime and carbolic acid to white-wash, one spoonful to the gallon of wash. If there is any lime left in the bottom of the bucket I let it dry and put it in the nest under the straw. I never have the creepy lice that infest some hen houses by the millions, and I don't want them. For the lice that infest the bodies or head I used this spring, sulphur and pyrethrum powder. Pyrethrum alone will do when fresh. If there is a shed or any place where the chickens congregate to sit and wallow, clean it out at least every two or three weeks, and every few days throw coal ashes, if you have them; if not, a few wood ashes into their wallow. There seems to form a small powder of filth in such a place that creates disease, besides being a fine place for creepy lice. A neighbor tells me that these pests were thick in a wren's nest in their port'co last year. Perhaps a wren's nest in the hen-house would bring them. I love the birds, but I do not care to have such pests through their agency.

When summer comes I shut my chickens out of the hen-house and make them take to the trees. A grove of low box alders, so thick branches mingle, makes a splendid summer resort night or day. These trees are quickly raised and are quite handsome.—Mrs. Wolcott, in Journal of Agriculture.

—"Can you play poker?" asked a tourist of a traveling man who was occupying the same parlor car with him. "Well," said the traveler in a hesitating tone, "I don't exactly play, I understand so little about the game, but I will try a couple of hands with you if you like." "No," said the stranger, positively. "I've changed my mind. it hasn't been two weeks since I tackled a man who didn't think he could play."—Merchant Traveler.

ARTIFICIAL EYES.

Most of Them Sold Are Blue or Blueish Gray in Color.

I dropped into an establishment today where glass eyes are sold and asked the store-keeper to tell me what he knew about glass eyes and about the people who bought them; and in the course of his conversation he said: "It is a singular fact that by far the greater part of all the artificial eyes sold in the country are right eyes, and blue, or blueish gray, eyes. At first thought that fact looks unaccountable, but to a person in the business it is not so. So far as Chicago and the West are concerned the color of these artificial eyes is due to the ethnology of the country. The people out here, especially the artisans, are all English or Scandinavian, and belong to the blue-eyed races. The Italian, Spanish and other Latin races, with dark eyes, are in the minority, and not addicted to dangerous employments. It is still easier to account for the fact that the artificial eyes sold are almost all right eyes. Nine-tenths of all the eyes destroyed are destroyed by accidents, and not by disease, and a large proportion of them are the eyes of artisans, and are destroyed in their business. In all sorts of mechanical pursuits the right eye is the most used, and is the most exposed. A man aiming a gun closes his left eye, and puts his right eye close to the gun. A boy about to fire a percussion cap will instinctively turn his left eye away from it. Perhaps there is a sort of connection between the right eye and the right hand. Comparatively few women lose their eyes, but when they do they are often times more anxious to get artificial eyes than men are, and will make all sorts of sacrifices to get one."

The conversation about glass eyes was so interesting that I called in again, in the afternoon, to tell my friend that I had heard that it was a dreadful job to insert a glass eye in the socket, and to ask him whether it was true. "Your informant," he said, "was certainly in error in saying that it was painful to insert an artificial eye. Still, the impression has been made, somehow or other, that it is very painful, as painful as death. I remember that one day a young man came to me to get an artificial eye, and to have me insert it for him. When he had selected one he very solemnly stretched himself out on the floor, and, clinching his teeth, said 'Go ahead.' I said, 'What do you mean?' He replied, 'I want you to insert that eye.' I made him get up, and in an instant I had inserted the eye, and did it so painlessly that he didn't know it, and still stood there waiting for me to insert it. He then told me that he had worn a glass eye before, and that when the other was inserted, down in the southern part of the State, the doctor laid him down on the floor, put his knee on his chest and got several stout farm hands to hold his legs and arms. He also said that it hurt him dreadfully. I have an idea that the doctor rolled up the poor boy's eyelids like a coat sleeve in the operation. I can't understand how any one who knows any thing about the business could represent the process as painful, and I am sorry to have it done, too, because it is apt to increase the fears of those who need artificial eyes, and who would have them, but for the dread they have of having them inserted.—Chicago Journal.

WHITE HOUSE CATS.

A Whole Army of Them Wage War on Rats and Mice.

There are almost as many cats about the White House as may be seen on a prosperous Pennsylvania dairy farm. The White House cats are not of especially fine breed. They are not proud nor in any way especially distinguished from other cats, unless it is in their breeding qualities. They are a promiscuous lot, in all colors that cats come. Most of them have attached themselves to the household apparently from a patriotic desire to serve the country, coming from no one knows where. Many new ones are said to have appeared at the mansion while Mrs. Cleveland reigned there, notwithstanding the playful habits of the dog Hector. As far as is consistent with our form of government, they enacted Mother Goose's melody. The other day there was a great squalling in the basement. A new family of kittens had appeared. "It is pretty near time to have a drowning," remarked one of the ushers. "We have to drown out a colony of kittens about twice a year." "How many cats have you, pray?" I asked. "O, between thirty and fifty old ones. The young no one can keep count of. When they get too numerous there has to be a wholesale killing. Two killings a year keep them down."

The building is so infested with rats and mice that an army of old mousers is necessary to protect the larder and the conservatory. Most of the cats are kept around the conservatory to kill off the rats, which otherwise would dig under and destroy the roots of the many valuable plants. With such an army of matrons, of course the multiplication of little cats is marvelously rapid. Some of these days it may be a fad with young society ladies to have "White House kittens" for pets. This will furnish a more humane way of getting rid of the surplus.—Washington Cor. Philadelphia Telegraph.

—There are disadvantages in being a woman. A woman can't go fishing Sundays without being severely criticised for the act. A man can and be merely called "A sad dog," which is considered more of a compliment than a criticism.—Boston Courier.

HE WAS NEAR-SIGHTED.

Annoyance of a Gentleman Who Tried to Atone for a Blunder.

Many are the social drawbacks attendant on near-sightedness. There is probably no person thus afflicted who has not at some time cut his best friends and killed possible acquaintanceship by failing to recognize some one to whom he has been recently introduced.

A very nervous and sensitive gentleman, who can literally see little more than "an inch before his nose," says he has far less to regret from his failures to salute acquaintances than from his attempts at atonement after inevitable mistakes. The history of one morning's blunders may suffice to show the disabilities under which he struggles.

On the way down town he met his sister, who at once stopped him, exclaiming: "Why, Henry Gilbert, how could you fail to recognize Mrs. Miles? You have just passed her, and I suppose she didn't bow because there wasn't even a gleam of recognition on your face."

"Dear, dear! have I actually made such a blunder?" said poor Henry. "And I am particularly anxious to be on good terms with her husband. But they're newcomers in town; how could I be expected to know her when I've only seen her twice?"

"On the other hand she can't be expected to make allowances for you, not knowing you are near-sighted," said his sister, severely. "Now, Henry, do keep a lookout for people, and try not to make any more mistakes for twenty-four hours."

Henry went on his way with a heavy heart, but when he entered a horse car that noon it was with a thrill of elation that he saw Mrs. Miles established in one corner. To gain a seat beside her and begin ingratiating overtures was the work of an instant.

"Good morning," said the repentant one, taking off his hat with more than ordinary deference. "What a lovely day! I'm sure you've been shopping."

The lady only looked at him, but her silence hardly surprised her companion, so absorbed was he in zealous effort.

"Ladies are such privileged beings," he went on. "Think how charming it is to go about buying silks and ribbons, instead of sitting all day in a stuffy office like us humdrum men."

The lady moved as far from him as convenience would admit, but still she did not speak.

"I saw your husband this morning," volunteered Mr. Gilbert.

"I have no husband," she announced, coldly.

He looked her full in the face.

"Bless me!" gasped he, "I believe you are not Mrs. Miles, after all."

"I certainly am not."

Mr. Gilbert apologized and left the car at the next corner. There face to face he met a lady who looked so familiar that in pure despair he took off his hat to her, only to be requited by a surprised and distant bow.

"That was a mistake, too," groaned he. "Evidently I did not know her, and she thinks I meant to be impertinent."

He rushed on to seek the shelter of his own walls, and as he entered the gate a lady passed by on the other side of the street.

"I declare, Henry, this is too bad!" called his sister before he reached the piazza where she was sitting; "you have actually cut Mrs. Miles again! There she goes down the street, and you had all the chance in the world to bow or even run over to her and apologize."

"Susan," said Mr. Gilbert, transfixing her with a desperate glance, "never dare to mention Mrs. Miles' name to me again!"—Youth's Companion.

SPARTA'S WARRIORS.

Their Bravery Due a Perfect Understanding of Martial Music.

The favorite problem of thinkers and teachers, since thought began, has been to find some engine of education which should reach the character as effectually as the ordinary means of training touch the understanding; and in the opinion of many, not men alone, but nations, music was such an engine. "It is music," said the Spartans, "which distinguishes the brave man from the coward." "A man's music is the source of his courage." It was their music which enabled Leonidas and his three hundred to conquer at Thermopylæ. It was music which taught the Spartan youth how to die in the wrestling ring or on the field of battle. These claims are audacious surely. Yet when we consider how the rythmical tread of the brave man differs from the agitated shamble of the coward, how music is the art of human joy, and how joy and repose of mind are the main elements of manly fortitude, we shall at any rate admit that there is a strong affinity somewhere; our only difficulty will be to acknowledge that music, deliberately applied, could ever be the direct cause of these reputed results.

To achieve the end desired, Spartan boys passed their youth in learning tunes, hymns and songs; this was their sole mental culture. They were taught to dance and keep step to the measure of the songs as they sang them. And, grown to manhood, now perfect warriors, marched into the battle with smiling faces, crowned with flowers, calm, joyful and serene; and, intoning their songs, moved steadily thus into the thickest of the fight, undisturbed and irresistible. The band that leads our armies to the field nowadays is a scant survival of Spartan practice; yet even in this music by proxy there are many elements of incitement to courage.—National Review.

CASTE RULE IN INDIA.

It Makes Life Burdensome for the Unfortunate European.

A Hindoo will make caste an excuse for any thing, and Anglo-Indian law will back him up in his villainy. If in passing through a crowded bazar your clothing should brush against a heap of grain exposed on the ground, as every thing is here, and if this grain merchant should claim that this grain was set apart for native food; if this honest native chooses to make you buy that heap of grain at his own selling price, he has the law on his side, and the judge also, if, as is so often the case, the judge be a Hindoo. You may wish to keep house in a modest sort of way, and you may wish to have as few servants about the house as possible. In America one servant, or two at most, would be ample, but here on the same scale of living you must keep a dozen at least. Your bhistie will carry water and nothing else; such is the rule of his caste. Your khansama will cook your food—that is, the small portion of it that he does not steal, but will not wait on table; for this you must have your khidmuggar. Your syce will drive, but will not clean or harness your horse; for this you must pay another man. You must have the big doors all around the house wide open these hot nights or you can not breathe, and so you must have a chokidar (watchman), who is generally a Gujerati, a well known caste of acknowledged thieves. The native police, as you would expect, are the worst of thieves in the country. Not one of your baker's dozen of servants has one good, honest half hour's work in the whole twenty-four hours, but not one of them will lift a finger to do any thing which he does not consider his work, and, as you will see, this is a matter which he has entirely in his own hands. For all of which the excuse is that caste rules will not allow them to do any other kind of work; and although you may know very well that this is an absurd lie, invented only for your annoyance and robbery, yet, what are you going to do about it? Every man of them steals like a pickpocket, and every man of them will lie in a way which no white man, no matter how talented he may be, can ever hope to imitate You may be annoyed beyond all endurance; the inconvenience and loss of time and money may be most serious; but yet, if you let your angry passions rise and get the better of your judgment and proceed to kick one of these fellows off the premises, you will probably pay a fine of one hundred rupees, and then they will boycott you in a way which no trades union ever dared to do yet. Again Anglo-Indian law is on the side of the native.—Cor. Minneapolis Tribune.

LANGUAGE STUDIES.

Some Excellent Comments, and Some That Are Open to Discussion.

Boys trained at Eton and Harrow are said to write better English than boys of the same grade in American schools, and the reason assigned is that they are required to translate Latin and Greek into idiomatic English. The study of Latin and Greek is injurious whenever it causes the student to lose his habitual hold upon the structural peculiarities of his own language. Every language has its idioms—phrases which are confusing to foreigners and which are inexplicable upon logical principles. Landor has remarked that every good writer has "much idiom." A good sentence will die under the torture of too much analysis, and the writer who undertakes to give every sentence the logical exactness and mathematical precision of an algebraic equation will end in a dull and dismal failure. What the writer needs above all things, so far as style is concerned, is to catch the spirit, the genius of his own language. Writing in any other fashion is like training the stems of plants through tubes or cylinders of glass that they may grow up straight and without an opportunity to branch out here and there with the spontaneity and freedom and luxuriance of nature.

Every word is good whose roots sustain and nurture the stock of common speech. Slang is objectionable; but slang consists rather in phrases than in words. New words are made from old words. Science and mechanical invention go back a long way in speech to find terms descriptive of their latest discoveries and inventions. The telegram, the telephone, the phonograph are graphic only to those who know at least a little Greek. The philologist is constantly struck with the thrift with which the human mind works us its old verbal material to express its new ideas and possessions.

The history of the homeliest word is venerable and fraught with innumerable associations—humorous, pathetic, sublime. We need feel no contempt for these simple Anglo-Saxon words into which the Earl of Derby turned the ringing lines of Homer. They are older than Greek or Latin. They were lisped by infants in their mothers' arms; they were prattled by children at play; they were whispered by young men and maidens in love; they were shouted by heroes in battle; they were spoken by sages in counsel long before one stone was laid in the foundation of Rome—long before Cadmus carried letters into Greece. The broad, deep river of English speech is fed by tributaries whose sources are to be found in pre-historic ages—perennial springs whose abundance has been adequate to the expression of the thought and feeling of every stage of civilization.—N. O. Picayune.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.....1889

BORN.

SILVA—At Lone Pine, September 22nd, 1889, to Mr. and Mrs. Frank Silva, a daughter.

DIED.

DE LA MATYR—At Bishop, September 20th, 1889, Rev. Henry De La Matyr aged 86 years and 5 months.

Henry De La Matyr was born in the State of New York, in April, 1803. He was married at the age of 18 years, in 1821. He entered the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1822 and continued in active service nearly 60 years; when old age and failing health compelled him to retire. Six sons and two daughters were born to him. One son died in the ministry at the age of 25 years and three are still in the same service. Two daughters are widows of Methodist Ministers. One son is a practising physician in Oakland, and another is a stockraiser in Colorado. From very early manhood till the close of his long life the deceased was heartily devoted to the service of God and his fellow creatures. No more glorious history than this could be given of any man.

And the pea-gun too lost; O Pap what made you do it? Billy has nothing left now but the twist in his nose.

Mr. Sol. Foorman, of Bishop, sent a fine specimen of cotton plant raised by him for exhibition at the fair. Mr. Foorman has proved that cotton can be successfully grown in Owens Valley.

Miss Lillian O'Hara had a display of works of art that proved she is becoming a better artist each succeeding year.

Miss Rachel Bell had a beautiful display of flowers and fruit and her father had a fine showing of flour that evidenced his skill as a miller.

Dr. Blair had a display of imitation fruit in wax work that looked so natural it had to be put in a glass case to keep it from the yellow jackets.

The third annual ball of the Association was all that the large pavilion could contain; the music was delightful and the affair from beginning to end as pleasant as it could possibly be.

Mr. S. P. Smith has opened a new livery feed and sale stable at Bishop. He will keep good livery horses and carriages; all animals left at the stable will be well fed and cared for. See his advertisement.

As usual, Mr. Muth-Ras Mussen had a very interesting and fine disdlay of honey and of appliances pertaining to bee keeping. This exhibit is always very instructive and full of interest to all who give any attention to the subject.

Mr. C. A. Walter made a display of fine wines from Muscat, Champagne; Mission, fermented from the pulp and another from the pure juice. A fine display was also made of the grapes from which the wine was made. This was a beautiful showing of wines.

No handsomer team than that shown by Mr. John Lucas, of Lone Pine, could be decorated by a blue ribbon. Reuben and Rachel are beauties and were admired by everybody at the parade ground.

The officers of the 18th District Agricultural Association return thanks to the Directors of the Eastern Slope Land and Stock Association for complimentary tickets conveying the right of membership in the latter for one year. It will be hard to outdo this generous courtesy.

John Baxter made an excellent display of farm products. This was grand proof of the fertility of the soil of Owens Valley. His showing of apples, pears, peaches and other fruits was a beautiful display, and these, with his very handsome dried fruits were much admired.

John Kispert always makes a splendid showing of grapes. This year his display of flaming Tokays, black Hamburgs, rose of Peru and muscats excels all he had done before. His fruit display contained such apples pears peaches and other fruits as do honor to the County.

In needle work it is conceded that the articles shown this year give evidence of greater skill than any we have yet had. Many of the articles, particularly in Spanish needle work, are exceedingly beautiful. To name the articles of rare beauty in this department would be to give alist of the whole display.

Alexander Clark made a display of corn, potatoes, watermelons and other produce that proves the correctness of the opinion held by some, that good crops can be grown on much of the land in Owens Valley without irrigation. Mr. Clark grew these products without putting a drop of water upon the land, and there are thousands of acres of similar soil in the valley.

For apples of the very finest quality and many varieties; for pears, prunes and plums; for grapes, for roots and vegetables the display made by E. Robinson, of Independence, would do credit to any part of California. For the first time Mr Robinson this year tried growing sweet potatoes. He made a great success and showed a remarkaly fine display.

Fred. Schabbel aimed to excel with pumpkins, squash, and watermelons, and he succeeded. He rolled in pumpkins as big as flour-barrels and melons that would fill the barrels. His squashes look like the great granite boulders that the earthquakes have rolled down from the Sierra Nevada mountains. Mrs. Schabbel made a fine display of canned fruits.

A grand display is that made by Mr S. A. Densmore. His showing of fruit was quite large and various, and all of it very beautiful. The quinces had no equal here and cannot be beaten in any county. The showing of prunes is especially fine; both dried and fresh. Mr. Densmore has proved that Owens Valley may become famous for the production of prunes. Zinfandel grapes in this collection prove that we can equal any part of the state with that grape. Several other varieties of grapes of equal excellence were in the display. Corn, shelled and on the ear; this is very fine grain. The display of roots and vegetables in this collection was on a par for quality with all the rest. The showing of dried fruits of different kinds was most creditable; everything was excellent.

Races, Tuesday.

The first race for Tuesday was a trot for two year olds; mile and repeat. There were four entries; Clark Young entered Truckee Jr., Charlie Hamilton entered Johnnie G, J. Bryson entered Iniquois and R. W. Scott entered Black Prince. The last named took the first heat; Truckee Jr. second place. The other two were distanced.

The second and third heats were very closely contested, but both were won by Truckee Jr., who was declared the winner of the race. Both of these colts trotted very handsomely and lowered the time every heat.

The second race was running, half mile dash. Frank Williams entered Butler; Felice Gomez entered Tomas and Nelson Beaudry entered Comet. This was a very closely contested race and was won by Comet by a neck, Tomas half a length behind Butler. Time, 55 seconds.

RACES, WEDNESDAY.

The first race Wednesday was running, half mile and repeat. There were four starters; Yellow Jacket, entered by Arthur Smith; Sagebrush by Henry Giles; Johnnie by Nelson Beaudry and Long Frank by Charley Rose. The contest was between Sagebrush and Johnnie; the former won in two straight heats after a very close struggle with Johnnie. The other two were distanced in the second heat. Time, 54, 52

The next race was running, mile heats. There were but two to start "Pickpocket," owned by S. P. Smith, and "our Darby." This time Darby was overmatched. Pickpocket has a first class pedigree and is a very fine horse. Darby is a Prince among common horses, but blood will tell and the thoroughbred led from start to finish. Darby did nobly and beat his former best time a long way. Mr. Smith has done the horse interest of Owens Valley good service by bringing in this fine stallion; his influence will be seen in future. The time made was 1:49½.

THURSDAY'S RACES.

The first race Thursday was trotting, mile and repeat free for all. There were three starters, George M. Patcher, entered by A. P. Smith, Queen by Andy Allen and Harry Wilkes, by I. H. Mulholland. Patcher was the favorite in the pools and won in two straight heats; time 2:56½.

RACES FRIDAY.

The first race Friday was running ¼ mile and repeat. Brown Belle, Comet and Sagebrush were the contestants. Belle is very fractious and hard to start. The starter reported that she was twenty five feet ahead of the other horses when the starting flag fell. Comet had closed up to half a length behind her when they went under the wire. The Judges decided that comet should have the heat. Sagebrush two lengths behind. The two following heats and race were taken easily by Sagebrush. The second race was for stallions, trotting, free for all. Andy, Ned, Gib altar Jr. and Truckee were entered, but the last was drawn. Andy took the first heat easily. The second heat was taken by Ned. A complaint was entered that Andy was not driven to win. While the Judges were considering this matter Ned upset his sulky on the track and the driver was thrown to the ground. The race was then postponed till next morning. In the mean time an Indian pony race was run. There were eight starters. Two made a tie and these ran a deciding heat. The race was won by a Big Pine Indian.

On Saturday morning the stallion race was finished. Mr. A. H. Allen was allowed to drive his own horse, Andy, and took the heat and race easily.

Our Darby.

No race of the season excited more interest than that run last Saturday between Eddy's Darby and Sanger's Sidewinder. The race was the result of a challenge made by the backers of Sidewinder. Darby was known to be a good saddle horse of great endurance; but was not thought to be at all fast. Last year he was tried by I. H. Mulholland who from that time had a great deal of confidence in him. Mr. Eddy then gave Darby in charge to Mr. Mulholland who has since handled him. Sidewinder is a good horse and has been victor in several races. His backers were entirely confident of winning and shook handfuls of twenties in the faces of all who dared to back Darby. Marshal Naylor rode Sidewinder and no horse could ge better ridden in a race. Little Chapo, of Lone Pine, rode Darby. The horses were sent away to a fine start for the first heat; Sidewinder having the inside. Darby is a little fractious, and at the first turn came near leaving the track altogether. Chapo kept cool and got him quieted down and running fairly by the time he got to the back stretch. In the meantime Sidewinder had it all his own way, and Naylor was riding alone like the "solitary horseman" of one of James' novels. Chapo had got control of his horse however, and it began to appear that Naylor would have company in the sweet by and by. Before the home stretch was reached he had it; Chapo was within striking distance and every bound made by Darby was longer and stronger than the one before. Naylor was not now near so certain of the heat as he had been. About halfway down the home stretch Sidewinder crossed the track in front of Darby and then crossed back. When settled into his place again Chapo gave Darby a cut with the whip and sent him under the wire half a length ahead. This was a surprise to the knowing ones. Mulholland claimed a foul but it was not allowed. For the second heat the horses went off to another fine start. Darby behaved first rate; and from start to finish the heat was his. Sidewinder was distanced. Time 1:56¾. A good deal of money changed hands on the race.

Mr. C. A. Walter has beaten his displays made at former fairs. Corn, barley, oats and wheat; vegetables of all kinds. Seeds including lawn grass, and other grasses, a fine display. Fruits of many kinds, and each sample beautiful. Hams and bacon of the finest quality; these are the products that prove the fertility of Owens Valley, and make sure prophesy of future greatness. The display of dried fruits including apples, green gages, nectarines, raisins, apricots, French and German prunes and pears, all of these are exceedingly fine; indeed it would seem impossible to have anything finer in this line. Mrs. Walter and her daughters have made a display of jellies that could not be too highly praised. These beautiful productions were admired by crowds of people every day during the fair.

A Beautiful Collection.

The colletion of minerals shown by Mr. John S. Gorman was one of the most interesting features of the exhibition All the ores of Inyo County are represented in the collection, as well as ores from all over the Pacific Coast. The Inyo specimens of silver and silver-lead ores are particularly fine. Many of these are very rich, running away up into hundreds, and even thousands of dollars per ton. The collection is rich in beautiful specimens of crystals, petrefactions and colored ores, these are of the richest tints of blue, green and yellow. The whole collection makes a very handsome picture aside from its intrinsic value, which is great.

Mr. Gorman made a very fine display of farm products. His showing of corn ought to be sent to "California on wheels" and let the people of the East see what Owens Valley can produce. His young orchard is just coming into bearing and his apples are beauties. Wheat, oats, barley and alfalfa seed prove that he can manage a farm as well as a mine. New blood benefits farming as well as other pursuits.

Found.

On the morning of the 17th of September a purse containing money. The owner can have the same by calling on Timothy Richards, proving property, and paying for this advertisement.

Barbed Wire Again.

About nine o'clock Thursday evening Mr. O. I. Mairs was coming into town. At John Baxter's place the team ran into a barbed wire fence. Mr. Mairs got badly cut on the left leg above the knee. One of the horses is terribly mangled; from the neck to the hind leg one side he is all cut to pieces.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

None of our farm products are in greater need of improvement than corn. The seed generally used in the Valley and poor cultivation have resulted in a good deal of inferior corn. Mr. Henry Thomson has done good service by showing what could be accomplished by the right kind of seed and thorough cultivation. His display of corn was very fine; he had several varieties and all were first class. In other farm products he made a fine display. Mrs. Thomson made a display of jellies that alone was worth holding a fair to see. This was one of the most admired exhibits at the fair.

About four hundred and fifty dollars of premiums offered by the 18th District were not awarded, because no entries were made to compete for them. The Directors would take pleasure in paying this money for premiums, but it appears nobody wanted it. When the fair is over many are heard to say they could have made exhibits, but put off till it was too late. Every dollar of premiums offered by the 18th District will always be paid, if entries and exhibits are made to compete for it.

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy, and published by arrangement with him.]

As he went down the steps and out of the gate, the chill of the last expression in her eyes hung about his heart. Then he stopped and looked about. She had closed the door, but something white fluttered on the step. It was her handkerchief, with the perfume she always used in its delicate folds. He carried it to his face—it was almost as if he touched her. He stood hesitating a moment—a moment big with issues to them both. He remembered her tender words and the rare caresses she had had for him; he forgot the undertone that had so painfully interpreted them. It was as if he had tasted of some priceless vintage of wine. He would return in an hour and taste again. Ah, he had waited patiently for the moment when this woman of stainless marble would turn to flesh! And now his foolish heart counted all its hard lessons for nothing, but beat high with triumph. "To-morrow." She understood him, then, but how modest and timid the was. To-morrow would be for them both the brightest day of their lives. She was not startled at herself now, no wonder, at the revelation of the depths of such a heart. She wanted a little time to calm herself; to get wonted to the new woman that looked out of her eyes.

He had made up his mind, and the moon went under a black cloud for anger. But it was only for an hour; then he would come back.

Market hall was crowded, and Curran was speaking at a pitch of impassioned eloquence beyond anything Philip had ever heard.

"What overwhelms you is your own energies fused into weapons of deadly warfare; it is their cunning which turns your myriad hands against yourselves. Where else can they find the force to vanquish you? The rich are but few. Whose hands but yours are strong and numerous enough to carry out their plans? The longer you submit the stronger they entrench themselves with your flesh and blood. Every week some new trade or profession is invented to make respectable and steady some new discovered method of living out of the poor; every month some new law is passed in the interests of the money power."

He paused for a moment and then went on with more bitterness. "Every month the upper classes grow more indifferent to the foundation on which they rest—of throbbing, agonizing human flesh. Not satisfied with the terrible natural distinction between wealth and poverty, they invent codes of manners and devise elaborate systems of what they mincingly call etiquette. Marriage with the poor is inexcusable. Even familiarity with inferiors—a great breach of "propriety" they call it. They ask not is a man honest and true hearted, is he kind? but is he wealthy or did he ever soil his hands with work? Not is a woman beautiful, is she modest? these are of little account; but is she well—that is, richly—connected? If her father cheats others she may be admitted to their circles; if he is unfortunate enough to be cheated, never. Ah, the shame of it, that makes no account of hundreds of millions of human creatures of untainted blood, of unclouded intellects, except as mere beasts of burden; to deny them social privileges, and whip the boldest of them back into the darkness of ignorance and contempt. All the lights of knowledge must burn for the few alone, all the soft influences of culture and the elevating pleasures from art and genius are for the few alone." He folded his arms over his broad chest and threw back his head in one of his grandest movements.

"And how have they earned the right to call themselves mankind, to drink alone at the fountains of knowledge and inspiring beauty, with never a share for the millions sweating under the burdens their white hands have put upon them? No carpets of priceless web are too fine for their lovely women's feet, rubies are not rare enough for their jewels. Music beats out its heavenly harmonies for them alone, with its treasured meaning of uncounted centuries. Painting ravishes their eyes alone with the pictured realms of inspired fancy. Literature scrapes and cringes before them, with its stores of wisdom."

Then he threw out his arms and came forward to the edge of the platform, for one last personal appeal. A hundred that could not understand all he said, thrilled to vague revolt under his irresistible magnetic force.

"Your bodies, whose only pleasure is sleep, whose only gratification is to still the daily recurring necessary hunger, your bodies could enjoy every luxury and beauty; ah, and the common Christian comforts would be sweetest luxuries to you, which have palled on the sated senses of the rich. Your minds and souls could grow fine and broad and calm in the education their pampered children scoff at; and the world progress more in a year than in centuries before. And you are a thousand to one; the joys and comforts, the blessed possibilities of a thousand lives against the insensate greed of one man for more, and more he cannot eat, or drink, or enjoy. It is his madness that they do not confine such as he, who sets the world back ten years for one he lives. But when he opens his great vault to-morrow and sits down to count his ill gotten gains of the yesterday, let his heart sink within him; he has refused his workmen the common rights of humanity, and they will leave his mills to rot in idleness."

He took his hat from the table and strode down the aisle amid the excited applause of his audience and went out, not even once looking back. An awkward silence followed, but it was several moments before Philip braced himself to do what, perhaps, was his duty. Every eye was fixed on him as he made his way forward, not one there but believed he was their friend. Had he not put on the fire escapes out of his own money in spite of his father? Many a whisper of commendation brought an answer of hearty good feeling. One or two of the women in the galleries actually said he was handsome.

"My friends," he began, but somehow he did not care to lift his eyes to meet the kind look in the trustful eyes, "I don't think there is any occasion, I mean, friends"——

What did he mean, he knew better than they what occasion there was. How dare he ask them to wait and hope, for when had a corporation a heart for mercy? He knew better than they, that to-morrow would be the last day when a strike would be likely of any effect. They might defeat his father's scheme if nothing else, a scheme that would make them servants no longer of a man, but of a pitiless business principle.

He looked about the room at last; he read aright the confidence in the eyes of the company. He believed he might make them wait, but had he a right to ask it? Here were a thousand souls in the mills, impatient at injustice, as they thought; he could offer them no hope, not one straw; his hands would be forever tied after to-morrow. Had he a right to restrain them?

"Friends, I know not what to advise you, since I am so weak to help you." He sat down and a cheer rang loud and hearty to the roof, but he felt himself in an agonizing position. On the great questions at issue between the employers and the workmen, the rich and the poor, his mind was slow in coming to a conclusion. He admitted most that even Curran said, while he listened, but how to help it was the question he ever asked himself. Surely nobody was profited by flying in the face of great economical laws. But then, what were laws, and what were fallacies? Well, if he did not know what was right, could he not follow his father's urgent wishes? Was he making a generous return for the love his father had lavished on him, if he should disobey him now? As he sat there his vivid imagination pictured the corporation in operation. Some little injustice was being done, and he mentions it to the overseer. "Them's orders; you must see the superintendent." He could see it all so plainly. He knocks at the superintendent's door and is received with the attention due the chief stockholder's son; he sees his bland, smiling face, his sleek, well paid smile. He speaks of the rule which perhaps works to rob some particular set of hands wholly without their fault. "But I have no authority to change it, though it does seem hard; better see the agent." Philip imagines his discouraged step, as he makes his way to the agent to be referred to a set of indifferent directors, who "really know nothing about the matter, but I do not feel like running against the interests of the stockholders."

While Philip sat trying to grasp his duty of that moment, he became conscious that it was very still and that no one seemed disposed to follow him. Not a few impatient faces were turned askance toward him. He rose and crossed the room to go out, but almost at the door he hesitated. He must say something.

"Perhaps it is not all quite as plain as you think. If by higher wages or shorter hours you made the profit on the mills smaller, are you not afraid other mills would leave us behind, being able to sell cheaper, or else the capital invested go elsewhere, where it can make more profit? Now you get small wages for long hours, but in the other cases you might lose work altogether." Then he looked anxiously around and added hurriedly: "Mind, I don't say do this or that; I will not ask anything of you. But if there is a loss it will be on you."

When he left the hall he felt like walking about a little while, to calm his mind. He chose the route that would lead past the little tenement house where they had fed him with cold potatoes. It was only a month ago. He looked in through the windows. The sick woman yet lay on the sofa, the same soiled plaid shawl for her coverlet; there was the same bare deal table, and a pair of dingy chairs before it. The desolation made his heart sick. Then he looked up at the windows of the attic chamber where he had slept that other night. It was all dark, but he imagined the glaring white walls, with the queer little block of a looking glass hanging there, and the backless wooden chair that had to serve for a washstand, and his low bed, with the girl's shawl for his counterpane. What great things he had dreamed, that night, he should do for the new cause that had fired his heart, new to him, but old as civilization. He turned away with a pain in his heart, a pain for the wrongs of the millions of the sons of toil who have never come into their inheritance. He turned up the road that led to his own home on the hill; he could see the gleam of bright light from his father's study, where with his smooth faced lawyer, he was perfecting his plans for the morrow. And then he seemed to hear his own words and his own tone as he had spoken in the meeting echoing oddly in his ear. Had he undutifully sacrificed his father to his help, and would it be from his fault the strike he feared would come to-morrow? Could his father point his trembling fingers at him when the mills should stop, and the prospective stockholders decline the investment to-morrow and say: "My own son is to blame. With one word he could have prevented it."

Then Philip turned his back to the lights that seemed to reproach him intolerably, and walked slowly down the hill again. Ah! what fear for capital, it always shifts its burden upon labor.

A woman's form came quickly out of a shadow, and laid a hand on his arm. It was Jane Graves, with a shawl over her head, servant girl fashion, but was it the ghastly effect of moonlight on her face that made it so pale?

"Wasn't you at Miss Ellingsworth's this evening?"

"Why, yes," he looked at her in astonishment, "and I was just going there again."

"I didn't know but she might be with you. I was at my father's, and when I came back, I couldn't find her, and her hat and shawl were gone."

"She has gone out with her father, perhaps," suggested Philip, startled more by her manner than her words.

"But he has been up at Mr. Breton's all the evening. And you know she never goes out alone."

"Sometimes she does," he said, as he went with the girl. "I met her quite away from home one night, but she seemed a good deal frightened."

"When was it?" Jane Graves stopped short, and when he had told her a quick, involuntary cry escaped her lips, and after that he had almost to run to keep up with her.

Now and then he tried to laugh at the terrors this foolish servant girl had put into his mind. But could it be Bertha had taken another evening walk? She was too beautiful for the exposures of common life. Was heaven envious of such happiness as he had expected in their reconciliation? Why not strike him, then, and not her? Why, it might have been she had tried to overtake him, to call him back. "Hurry faster," he muttered, catching the girl's arm roughly.

CHAPTER XIII.

CLASS PREJUDICE.

But the house looked so sedate and altogether respectable that it seemed impossible but that everything was as usual inside. The door stood invitingly open, as it should on such a balmy summer evening, the light streaming bountifully out on the walk. A catastrophe surely would have left some sign, some fatal mark somewhere to curdle one's blood from afar. How foolish of this black eyed maiden and him to rush at the top of their speed in an agony of suspense only to find Bertha sitting at the parlor table mild eyed and serene as he had used to know her! She had only stepped across the street perhaps.

How she would wonder to see him hurrying in his unreasonable fear into her presence! But he would pour into her ears such a torrent of words of love that she would bless him a thousand times that he had come back, and their happiness would date from to-night. Perhaps she had tender confidences for him, too, of how wonderfully she had grown into the love he had longed for, and she would whisper to him that the few weeks of estrangement had been a blessing of God for her, and he need never again complain of the coldness of her love. Life is not so serious and tragical an affair as one sometimes thinks; things don't always plunge into the ruin they are pointed toward.

By the time Philip stepped into the door, he had fully discounted his expected relief; indeed, had almost persuaded himself that he had had no misgivings, there seemed so little sense in misgivings.

But he did not find the blue eyed woman he loved at her parlor table. He looked for a crochet needle or a square of canvas, which might show the marks of recent work; but the round table was in perfect order. The little book shaped card basket stood near the bronze base of the drop lamp. A large red morocco bound volume, called "The Dresden Gallery," was tilted up a little by a blue and gold book of Swinburne's poems, on which it had been laid. The gracefully carved bookrack was full, all but one space the volume of poems might have fitted into.

"Just as I arranged it after tea," said Jane Graves, moving uneasily about.

"For heaven's sake be still," he exclaimed. He stepped out into the hall.

"Why, here is her shawl," he said, with a lightened heart.

"It is her heavy shawl that is gone," the girl looked peculiarly at him when she added almost under her breath, "the one she takes on evening drives."

Philip shot a glance of sudden intelligence at her, and terrible suggestions and recollections came crowding their hateful meanings upon him. The mad blood seemed congesting about his heart, and yet his face blazed like fire. "Good God!" he shouted hoarsely, "if you dare to breathe it I will choke the envious life out of you." Then he caught the bell knob at the door and rang it fiercely, and then again, before its echoes had ceased, and again and again.

"And is there another fire, your honor?"

The broad faced chambermaid had come up from the kitchen and stood with arms akimbo, trying to make her rich Irish voice heard above the sounding gong.

"Do you know where your mistress is?"

"No-a; if she be not inside, indade."

"Didn't she go over to a neighbor's somewhere?" questioned Philip eagerly.

"Not that I knows on, sir."

"Has anybody been here? Didn't you tend door, you ninny?"

"The bell didn't ring till now, sir; but lave me think a bit," and the woman rubbed her head meditatively.

"Quick," cried Philip, between hope and fear.

"Don't scare me, sir, or I can't do nothink."

He moved his feet restlessly on the inlaid hall floor, and he had bowed his head as if studying the artist's design; but it was for fear he should catch some terrible significance in Jane Graves' black eyes. He could hear her dress rustle; he knew she was looking at him, waiting for him to lift his face; but he would not have met her eyes at that moment for all the world.

"Yis, there was a rumblin' team come up, and I thought I hearn a man come to the dure and thin go back; but the bell didn't ring, sir, and I didn't make no count on it. No, sir, I hevn't hearn missus movin' roun' sense, and I knows she be in it over the house before."

The creature's tongue was unloosed and she kept on talking, but Philip had bounded up the broad stairs and thrown open the door of the room he thought was Bertha's.

In another moment the gas blazed up to the ceiling and he stood, wild eyed, looking from side to side as if he thought to find a heart breaking story written all over the gold papered walls. Then his eyes became fixed on the black walnut bureau with its long mirror coming down through the centre. On the marble slab at the foot of the mirror he saw a satin covered handkerchief case, and pinned upon it a piece of paper.

In three steps he had clutched a little perfumed note, with a ribbon fastened on it as if for a signal, a delicate bow of white ribbon. Mr. Ellingsworth's name was written on it. It was all here, and yet Philip hesitated a moment as a man would hesitate to cut off a maimed and poisoned limb. And it was almost unconsciously at last that his nervous fingers tore the note open and let the bit of white ribbon flutter to the floor. He seemed to read very slowly and the flush faded from his face and left it very calm. There could be nothing very thrilling written there surely. But every line and curve was branded forever on his heart.

"I have gone with Curran. I knew I could not stand your reproaches, but I can only be happy with the man I love. Society will disown me. He is more to me than all.

"BERTHA."

He crushed the bit of paper in his hand, and looked up to see Jane Graves standing in the doorway, pale as death. Beside her stood the red checked chambermaid, speechless again, this time with astonishment to see the young man make so free in her mistress' chamber.

"Gone with Curran; oh yes, it is all written out. Well, that is a joke; a man who don't wear cuffs, and Bertha loves him! Why, I never could dress to suit her." And he threw himself into a chair and burst into convulsions of laughter till the tears came.

"Well, there may be something else," and he stepped jauntily up to the bureau again.

"Certainly, a jewel box with my name on it; oh! to be sure, our engagement ring." He held it up to catch the sparkle of the solitaire diamond. "Yes, yes, a very proper and delicate spirit. I wasn't mistaken in Bertha, she always had a nice sense of propriety."

He came a little unsteadily toward the two women. Jane Graves was pale and still as death, with her two little hands pressed tightly upon her bosom. Philip wondered impatiently what was the matter with the girl. If he could treat the whole wretched business like a huge joke, what the deuce was the use of her playing tragedy queen over it? What child's play life's solemnest woes and failures are after all a man's dread of them! It is mixing up flesh and blood with them spoils their grand effects. Men and women are only fit for the cheapest kind of low comedy. How it must amuse the immortal gallery gods when a man attempts to sustain the tragedy pitch in his experiences! If one can only get the true point of view, there is no such thing as a noble situation, a glorious victory or a desperate dilemma. The dignity of sorrow is a ridiculous misnomer. Everything is only more or less funny according to its pretentiousness—for example, the astonishing denouement of his love episode.

Now Norah, the chambermaid, with a face like a pumpkin and eyes like saucers, was a suitable lay figure for such an occasion.

"Why, here, Norah, this is really a very good diamond. I bought it for the best; permit me to present it to you. Bertha, your late mistress, I mean, was a large woman; no doubt you can wear it over your little finger. Consider it as a reminder of this charming evening. Ah, let me put it on, you are not used to jewels—thus. Now, my love, you may run down stairs and show your pretty present."

He turned his strangely bright eyes to the wall at the foot of Bertha's bed.

"My picture, too. How the girl's heart must have glowed night and morning over it." He took it down and held it before him a moment.

"A foolish face," he muttered between his teeth, the wild merriment fading out of his features. He bent and laid the picture glass upward on the floor, then he ground it viciously beneath the heel of his boot, and walked away without deigning to cast another look at it.

Bertha's pure bed, which her graceful form had pressed so many years—an inscrutable awe crept over him; it seemed impious to look; he fell on his knees and buried his hot face in the pillow where he fancied her head had rested.

"Oh, my lost darling, my lost Bertha, you have taken all the joy and hope of my life with you," and his slight frame shook with tearless sobs, like the death throes of a breaking heart.

Then he rose in bitterness of soul to his feet. Was there no way to drown the deep settled pain about his breast? Were there no other women in the world? He had heard times enough there was no salve for a broken heart so quick and sure as another woman's kisses.

He almost stumbled over Jane Graves, who lay across the threshhold in a dead faint. It was but the work of a moment to bend over her and lift her in his arms. But he would not let her lie on Bertha's bed; no, not to save her life; and he bore her through the hall to another chamber. It was a slight girlish form he held, and need not have been so unpleasant a burden. But he laid her down on the first resting place he could find, and lifted her feet with delicate gentleness on the bed. He removed the high pillows from under her head, so that she could breathe more easily, and, true gentleman that he was, covered her pretty feet and ankles with some light wrap.

The report of the officers of the Fish Commission steamer "Albatross" of work on the Pacific Coast, says that "south of Guaymas beds of oysters were found which were thought to be fully equal to the best we have on the Eastern coast, and the question now to be determined is whether there is a suitable place on the California coast where they can be propagated."

HOME AND FARM.

—Don't compel your horses to eat musty hay. It will produce fatal lung trouble, and, in any event, heaves.

—In sweeping carpets use wet newspapers wrung nearly dry and torn to pieces. The paper collects the dust, but does not soil the carpet.

—A pail or tub of fresh, cold water, renewed several times in the course of twenty-four hours, will absorb all the evil odor of fresh paint in a day or two. The taste of the water after an hour will prove the thoroughness of its work.

—To clean silver: Wet a flannel cloth in kerosene oil, dip in dry whiting, and thoroughly rub the plated or silverware; throw into a dish of scalding soapsuds, wipe with a soft flannel, and polish with a chamois skin.

—Biscuit: One quart flour, one tablespoonful shortening, half a teaspoon salt and two of baking powder. Mix well together, add sufficient milk or water to form a very soft dough, as soft as can be rolled. Bake in a quick oven.

—In trimming a hedge something else should be considered as well as the matter of cutting off the extra growth. A proper shape should be given it. There is nothing so attractive or ornamental as a shapely, well-kept hedge, and it adds value to the farm.

—The Ohio Agricultural College states as the results of experiments there in soiling cattle that half the number of acres will feed the same amount of stock and keep them in better condition if the product be cut and placed before them. Nevertheless soiling is not everywhere profitable.

—Italian Rice Pudding: A teacupful of rice, the yelks of four eggs, the whites of three, beaten separately, two ounces pounded sugar, two ounces raisins, one-quarter pound suet, chopped very fine; flavoring of ratafia or vanilla; put these ingredients into a mold and boil an hour and a half. Serve with brandy or sweet sauce.—Chicago Herald.

—Sponge Jelly Roll: Four eggs, one cup and a half sugar, one tablespoonful baking-powder; beat the whites separately, and the sugar and the yolks together till very light, then add part of the whites, then a cup of flour, then beat good, then a little more flour, then the rest of the whites and stir easy; put in and bake. Spread and roll as quick as you can. It is very good.—Good Housekeeping.

—Ivory may be cleaned by scrubbing with a new soft tooth brush, soap and tepid water, then dry the ivory and brush well, dip the latter in alcohol and polish the ivory until it has regained its former sheen. If the water gives the ivory a yellowish tint dry the object in a heated place. If age has yellowed it, place the object under a bell-jar with a small vessel containing lime and muriatic acid, set the whole in the sunshine.

MAX STADLER'S BIG PRIZE

The Great Clothing Merchant's Investment of One Dollar Yields $12,500.

A Daily News reporter dropped into Max Stadler & Co's well known clothing establishment at Broadway and Grand street a few days ago to purchase a suit of clothes. He was surprised to see all the salesmen and bookkeepers congregated in a little knot, of which the senior member of the firm was the central figure. The latter held a telegraph despatch in his right hand that read like this:

NEW ORLEANS, July 20, 1889.

MAX STADLER, New York:

One-five-one-six-six drew fifty thousand. M. A. DAUPHIN.

In the other hand Mr. Stadler held one-quarter ticket No. 15,166 in the July drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, and the above telegram, which was in reply to one of inquiry sent by Mr. Stadler, assured him that he was just $12,500 richer than he was before he secured the little ticket.

"For a long time," said Mr. Stadler "there has been an elderly gentleman coming in here each month with Louisiana State Lottery tickets for sale. Last month I thought more out of friendship than anything else that I would buy a dollar ticket. I did so and won $10. This month I invested the $10 in two one-quarter tickets, one of which as you already know, has drawn $12,500.

Mr. Stadler took his ticket to his friend, Manager Hoey of the Adams Express Company, for collection. Yesterday he received the money all right and generously drew his check for a handsome sum in favor of the old gentleman that sold him the ticket, and promised to make him a present of $100,000 if he draws the capital prize of $300,000.

A feature in recent drawings has been the good fortune that has attended the customers of the Louisiana State Lottery in this city and vicinity. Not long since two Brooklyn plasterers had the good fortune to draw $15,000 upon an investment of $1 each, they having agreed to go shares on what they won. There was E. Amsden, the printer at 137 8th street, who drew $5,000, and Cassagnac & Vieu, the feather merchants at 3 West 3d street, who drew $2,500, and the restaurant keeper on Bleecker street, who struck a big prize, and whose luck left most of these mentioned into going into the lottery.—New York Daily News, August 7.

FOODS AND MILK.

Synopsis of Interesting Experiments Recently Made in Germany.

Interesting experiments have been made in Germany by Herr Neuhaus upon the effects of succulent and dry foods upon the quality of the milk. It is well known that cows fed on green forage give an abundant quantity of milk, and the pasturage being rich, the milk is of high quality. It was wished to ascertain if cows suffered in the production of milk, as to quality, by the different class of food which city cowkeepers were compeled to use.

Two chemists were employed by Herr Neuhaus, and their results are in each case the same. Supposing that a cow requires 1.30 per cent. of her weight of dry material, but, in addition, 4.30 per cent. of her weight of water, Herr Neuhaus believes that neither forage grass from irrigated meadows, or grains, both of which contain a large quantity of water, would have a bad influence upon the milk. In the first analysis made of milk from cows fed upon green forage cut from irrigated meadows, to which some lucerne was added, the results were: Fatty matters, 2.08 per cent., and dry matters, 12 per cent. Three analyses made of milk obtained from cows fed exclusively upon forage grass obtained from irrigated meadows gave the following results:

Fatty Matters.	Dry Matters.
3.50	12
3.93	12
3.80	13.15

It is well known that cows which are fed in the stall give milk which is richer in the evening than in the morning, and it was found to be the same in analyses of milk produced from forage-fed cows, as follows:

	Fatty Matters.	Dry Matters.
Milk of the Morning	2.08	11
" Midday	3	12
" Evening	3	12.5

Herr Neuhaus believes that when grains are fed rationally they are not hurtful to the cattle; but he makes a most important point when he states that it is necessary to heat them from 120 to 140 degrees in order to kill the dangerous organisms which they contain and to prevent acidulation. In how many cases in this country do dairymen use grains which are absolutely sour, and use them too every day? The danger of grain feeding is not so much in the food itself as in the condition in which it is given. The analyses of milk produced from a ration composed of grains, irrigated forage grass, and barley straw, was: Fatty matters, 3.56; dry matters, 12.05. The German writer also gives details with regard to the cream yield, and explains the differences which in some instances arise by reason of the variety of kinds and sizes of creamometers which are in use among dairymen. A proper cream tube or glass should be an inch and a half in diameter, the narrow tubes so commonly used being practically useless. At the same time it may be observed that the cream test is of no decisive value as an indication of the value of the milk.

Cream is composed of fat globules and milk, the milk being sometimes much larger in proportion than at others, and in some cases, where the size of the cream globules varies, as it does in different cows and in different races, these globules do not rise to their full extent, and consequently the cream does not indicate as it ought to do. It has long been conclusively shown that although the cream test is, roughly speaking, a near enough guide for ordinary consumers of milk, buying in small quantities, it is not a sufficient test—indeed, quite the reverse, being most misleading as an indication of the food and fat value of the milk.

It is stated that the difficulty is found in Berlin, as in London, in milk which has been transported to a distance, for the cream rises to the surface before it is delivered, and it is with difficulty again amalgamated, and in the same way it may be remarked that where dairymen send out milk in large cans and deliver it from a tap at the bottom there is a liability to hand customers a sample which is poor in consequence of the rising of the cream to the surface.

To remedy this defect a German has invented a tube which enables a retailer to deliver milk from this tap at the bottom of his can which is of proper quality so far as regards the milk which the can contains. The great object in delivering from the bottom of the can is to enable the milk retailer to lock his can, and so prevent the delivery man extracting any or adding water.—Farm, Field and Stockman.

A Reliable Fertilizer.

Unbleached wood ashes are always a good fertilizer. There is no question about that. But because they do not, in some instances, produce good crops, should farmers condemn them? Evidently not. Bone used alone may in many cases produce a paying increase in yield; in others the efficacy may not be appreciable. Does this prove any thing against bone as a fertilizer? Suppose we use both bone and ashes. In the experiments where neither have proved helpful both of them may prove of high value. When both fail we should not condemn ashes and bone as valueless. Let us add nitrogen in some form. Then we have the essential parts of farm manure. If this combination fails to increase the crops, it will be because the land is already rich, or because there is too little rainfal to render them available.—St. Louis Republican.

William Tabor, a Pennsylvanian, made fun of the big trees in the Yosemite Valley, and John Ashton, a guide, felt it his duty to stab the scoffer twice in the right arm.

TRAVELING SALESMEN.

Their Annual Expenses Equal to the National Debt.

"The money used in a single year to foot the salary and expense bills of the traveling salesmen of the United States would pay off the entire National debt and leave a few dollars over."

This rather startling statement was made by a junior member of one of the large dry goods houses of this city, who has a force of about fifty travelers under his immediate charge. As proof of his assertion he presented these particulars: "There is hardly a wholesale, jobbing or commission house in any line of business in the United States that does not have at least a single traveling representative, and from one lone man the traveling force ranges up as high as 125 or 150 men, and there may be one or two houses with even more. The average of the most reliable estimates places the total number of commercial tourists in this country at 250,000; and, mind you, this does not mean peddlers, but only those who sell goods at wholesale.

"The railroad fares, charges for carrying sample baggage by freight or express, hotel bills, and numerous incidental traveling expenses of these men will range between $4 and $12 per day, but some men will spend $25 in a single day for these purposes without resorting to any extravagance. Take, for instance, some of the carpet, clothing or fancy goods men who carry ten to fifteen trunks full of samples, take a packer with them, and hire a hotel porter to display their goods whenever they open their trunks. But the number of these men is comparatively small, and $6 a day will fairly represent the average expenses of the 250,000 men. There you have $1,500,000 per day for expenses, alone. Multiply this by 365, and you have $547,500,000 as the amount expended in one year.

"The item of salaries is nearly as large. Few men are paid less than $900 per year. The largest number receive between $1,500 and $2,500, either in salaries or commissions. A lesser number are paid from $3,000 to $5,000—those receiving the latter amount being comparatively few. But there are traveling salesmen who are always in demand at $10,000 to $15,000 a year, but they are few and far between. The lower salaried men predominate, as might be supposed, and an average of $1,800 per year is not far out of the way. Figuring 250,000 men at an average salary of $1,800 per year gives a total of $450,000,000 according to my arithmetic. To this add $547,500,000 for expenses and you have $997,500,000 for these two items.

"But there are other items to be charged against the salesmen's account. It is impossible to give any accurate esmate of the cost of trunks, samples, and other requisites of the traveling men, but the items as we figure them in our store will give something to judge from. Our fifty men require 150 trunks, costing $8 each, or $1,200. These men require two sets of samples yearly—one in the spring and one in the fall. The cost of these two sets of samples is about $1,000 per man. Of this $50,000 worth of goods which are required for samples every year a considerable portion is lost, while most of it is so soiled and damaged by constant handling that it has to be sold at a heavy reduction from the actual cost or else given away. To cover this depreciation we make an allowance of 33⅓ per cent. upon the cost of samples, or about $17,000 per year. Trunks do not need renewing every year, but repairs and replacing lost ones form quite an item of expense. From these figures it is evident that the similar expenses of greater or lesser amount borne by every wholesale house will swell the salary and traveling expense item of $997,500,000 far beyond $1,000,000,000 per year."—Philadelphia Record.

THE SAHARA DESERT.

Why It Is by No Means so Black as It Is Painted.

The Sahara as a whole is not below sea level; it is not the dry bed of a recent ocean, and it is not as flat as the proverbial pancake all over. Part of it, indeed, is very mountainous, and all of it is more or less varied in level. The Upper Sahara consists of a rocky plateau, rising at times into considerable peaks; the lower, to which it descends by a steep slope, is "a vast depression of clay and sand," but still for the most part standing high above sea level. No portion of the Upper Sahara is less than 1,300 feet high—a good deal higher than Dartmoor or Derbyshire. Most of the Lower reaches from 200 to 300 feet—quite as elevated as Essex or Leicester. The two spots below sea level consist of the beds of ancient lakes, now much shrunk by evaporation, owing to the present rainless condition of the country; the soil around these is deep in gypsum, and the water itself is considerably saltier than the sea.

That, however, is always the case with fresh-water lakes in their last dotage, as American geologists have amply proved in the great Salt Lake of Utah. Moving sand undoubtedly covers a large space in both divisions of the desert, but, according to Sir Lambert Playfair, our best modern authority on the subject, it occupies not more than one-third part of the entire Algerian Sahara. Elsewhere rock, clay and muddy lake are the prevailing features, interspersed with not infrequent date groves and villages, the product of artesian wells or excavated spaces or river oases. Even Sahara, in short, to give it its due, is not by any means so black as it's painted.—Cornhill Magazine.

A MEDLEY OF MARVELS.

The Processes Employed in the Making of Flint Glass.

Flint-glass is the general term for all the multiform utensils and ornaments (apart from windows and dark bottles) which make glass an omnipresent blessing in modern life. The distinctive peculiarity of flint-glass is the presence in it of lead, which imparts a brilliancy unlike that of most other glass. The lack-luster surface of all the old objects of glass made before the English invention of a lead formula is noticeable. Lead oxide was originally used only in most expensive glass prepared from calcined flints. But gradually it has crept into many grades, down to the most common materials for household and fancy wares, and for all transparent bottles, giving them all a finer luster than was otherwise obtained until the recent invention of lime glass. And the costliest of all glass, that used for optical lenses and imitation gems, still gains its extraordinary weight and refractive power from lead. The honors of skill in flint-glass production are broadly divided among the nations, England taking the lead in the crystal or purest flint-glass used for cutting; Italy (Venice) in colored designs more brilliant than any made in the days of the republic, when flint-glass was not known; Switzerland in imitation gems; Germany in cheap vases; France in lens disks; and America in pressed glass and cheap tableware. Recently a cheaper flint-glass has been introduced into American pressed ware, in which lime is substituted for lead, yet which retains much of the luster and clearness of lead flint.

Flint-glass is either blown, molded or pressed, and frequently all three methods may be seen together in the same establishment.

A flint-glass factory is a most entertaining medley of marvels. As you enter the great building that surrounds the huge chimney the first impression is that you are in a human ant-hill rumbling with inordinate activity. Or perhaps the sensation is better described as a plunge into a purgatorial chamber of industrious demons. In the center the openings in the gigantic furnace dazzle you like glaring eyes from a soul of fire; but the glow comes really from molten glass in the dozen "monkey-pots" about the blaze. Scores of workers, boys, youths and men, throng in restless confusion. It looks as if every one were running about on some impish deed of his own fancy. But stand still and watch closely, and you will see it is all a great system of human clock-work, each movement fitting nicely into the whole effect. The men at the furnace, who seemed at first to be devils thrusting pitchforks into the blazing depths to toast their victims, are only gathering metal on their punties. When a sufficiently large lump has been collected the man wanders off with it. You think he will certainly burn some one with that burning ball of fire, they are all bustling about him so incessantly. But follow him carefully and you see him silently hand the tube to an older man, who blows the glass into a large globe, and sits down to play with it at a bench which has a horizontal iron bar on each side of him to roll the tube on. Back and forth he rolls it like a toy, and the glass keeps curiously changing its shape. He has made a hole in the globe and has enlarged it into a symmetrical opening, and now the glass is cooled so that he can do nothing more. Will anybody in all that hurrying crowd help him? Instantly a young man appears, and without a word he holds up to the cool glass his long tube with a disk of red-hot glass on the end, which fastens to it. The man at the bench scratches the globe, jars it, and it leaves his bar. Off the other man runs with it to the "glory-hole," where the broken end is quickly heated again into softness. Then he hurries back with it to the bench man, who renews his play. A couple of minutes more and suddenly you perceive that he has made a perfect lamp shade, which a stroke detaches from the iron rod into a small bed of sand. A small boy carries it off on a stick to the annealing furnace, and now the gatherer is on hand again with a fresh lump of metal to begin the process again. Turn to the next man sitting at his work, and you notice him finishing a smaller charge into a lamp chimney, shaping the top by a mold. Here is a man amusing himself with a small bunch of soft glass on his rod. You are sure he can have no serious purpose in turning and bending it into those ridiculous shapes. Quickly a boy seizes it from him, and you can not trace him. It has gone over to a fancy vase, where it was needed to complete the ornament. So each bench has its own little task of skill, and keeps repeating it over and over, and each boy of the multitude (there are two or more to every man) has his own particular duties. He pops up always in the moment and place where he is needed. All the workers are busy as their wits can make them, for they work by the piece, and the number of things made determines their wages. They are grouped into sets or "shops" of three or four, who work together and share profits together on a well-understood grade of division. Generally four constitute a shop, the most skilful workman (the blower) at the head, the gatherer (a young fellow) next, and two boys, one handling molds or tools, and the other carrying the products to the annealing oven. The only way to learn the glass trade is through long apprenticeship in these four stages. And no apprentice is permitted to enter the full privilege and wages of a master-workman without the consent of the order. By this severe means of apprenticeship the glass-workers keep the skill of their trade in their own control, much like the old Venetian artisans, and practically dictate their own prices to employers.—Harper's Magazine.

THE TURQUOISE.

Interesting Facts Concerning the Values of Precious Persian Gems.

Turquoises are found in Thibet, China, and the neighborhood of Mount Sinai, but the supply for jewelers' purposes comes almost wholly from the celebrated Persian mines. Very little was known about these till a remarkably interesting and exhaustive report upon them was recently furnished to the British Foreign Office by Mr. A. Houtum Schindler, who was for a short time director of the mines. They are situated in a range of mountains bounding on the north an open plain in the Bar-i-Maden district, thirty-two miles northwest of Nishapur, in the province of Khorassan. Botanists tell us that the brightest blue is seen on Alpine flowers. If pure mountain air could be supposed to brighten the color of a gem as well as a flower, there is no want of it where these turquoise veins occur. Their position is between five and six thousand feet above the level of the sea, and a strong north wind blows almost continually over the ridges of the hills, rendering the situation very healthy. Wheat, barley and mulberry trees grow well on the slopes of the lower of these heights. * * * At the mines the turquoises are roughly divided into three classes of first, second and third qualities. All the stones of good and fast color and favorable shape belong to the first class. But how curiously these vary in value will be best understood by quoting Mr. Schindler's own words: "It is impossible to fix any price, or classify them according to different qualities. I have not yet seen two stones alike. A stone two-thirds of an inch in length, two-fifths of an inch in width, and about half an inch in thickness, cut pikani (conical) shape, was valued at Meshed at $1,500; another, of about the same size, shape and cut, was valued at only $400. Turquoises of the size of a pea are sometimes sold for $40. The color most prized is the deep blue of the sky. A small speck of a lighter color, which only connoisseurs can distinguish, or an almost unappreciable tinge of green decreases the value considerably. Then there is that undefinable property of a good turquoise, the zal, something like the 'water' of a diamond or the lustre of a pearl; a fine colored turquoise without the zal is not worth much." He subsequently adds: "The above-mentioned three-hundred-pound Meshed turquoise was bought from the finder by one of the Rish-i-safids (elders of the village) for $15; the latter sold it still uncut at Meshed for $190. As soon as it was cut its true value became apparent, and it was sent to Paris, where it was valued at $3,000. The second purchaser, however, received only $1,700 for it; the difference was gained by the agents." Among the fine turquoises in the possession of the Shah there is one valued at $10,000. The best stones of the second class are worth about $150 per pound, while the most inferior will scarcely bring a twentieth part of this price. The latter are chiefly used in Persia for the decoration of swords, horse-trappings, pipe-heads and the common kinds of jewelry. Small cut turquoises of a slightly better quality than these sell at the rate of from 25 to 75 cents per one thousand. In the third class are included stones unsalable in Persia, as well as large flat stones, some of which are esteemed for amulets, brooches, buckles, and the like. The prices given there will be more than doubled when the turquoises are sold in Europe.—Chambers' Journal.

OLD VESSELS.

The Most Venerable Craft Afloat on the Deep Blue Sea.

An interesting discussion took place between a number of Down East sea captains who congregated in Captain Hughes' tug-boat office, on Walnut street, the other evening. The subject was the oldest American merchant vessel afloat. Captain Kelley, one of the oldest of the number, said that the oldest merchant vessel now afloat under the American flag was built in 1815. Captain Hughes, in whose office the discussion took place, a retired mariner, said that he noticed a few days ago the arrival at New Bedford, Mass., of the American bark Rousseau, Captain Wicks from St. Helena, after a passage of fifty-seven days, with a cargo of 1,300 barrels of sperm oil, 180 barrels of whale oil, and 700 barrels of bones. "This vessel," continued Captain Hughes, "was built in this city in 1801. She is a double-decked vessel of 305 tons register, which in those days was considered an enormous craft. She was built for the Stephen Girard Line of packet ships, and ran on that line out of this port for years. The Rousseau is now classed as well as the ordinary vessels of ten years old, and is taken much care of on account of her great age. She is owned by S. Osborne, Jr., of New Bedford."

The discusssion continued several hours, and nearly every ship of the past century was talked over by the mariners, and their qualities compared with those of to-day.

In looking over the old records of shipping the oldest merchant vessel afloat was found to be the bark True Love, of London, 296 tons register. This vessel was built in this city in 1764; making her now one hundred and twenty-two years old. She is owned by John S. Ward, of London, a large owner of vessel property. The True Love is yet in active service.—Philadelphia Times.

—The American maid is bound to shine conspicuous wherever she goes. An American girl writes to the New York World from Berlin: "We, from America, were the sensation of the evening, for here, in Germany, they do not reverse in dancing, but go around in a ring one way continuously. When we began to dance the people looked at us in wonder, and then the Princess Wilhelmina caught sight of us and called the attention of the Crown Prince and Princess, and they watched us all through the dance. So it was all through the evening, wherever we danced all gazed curiously at us."

THE ALUMINUM AGE.

A Metal That May Revolutionize Shipbuilding and Other Construction.

The world has had its ages of stone and bronze. We are now passing through the iron age. Will this be succeeded by an age of aluminum? We believe that it will. It taxes one's imagination a little, we confess, but not one's credulity to see in the mind's eye the bright and beautiful aluminum replacing black and ugly iron in most of the latter's uses.

Fancy houses made of aluminum instead of iron. The weight of the new metal is only a third as much as iron, with equal or greater tensile strength. The girders and the plates could be cast and readily handled in sizes far larger than those to which architectural iron is now confined. Perhaps whole fronts of modern-sized houses could be moulded in a single piece. This would greatly facilitate building operations which are now slow.

Aluminum is as fire proof as iron. The larger the plates of the metal composing the side of the house the less liable they are to be warped and curled by intense heat. A building with aluminum walls, such as we have described, would survive a great conflagration in which iron structures of existing patterns would wither and crumble to the ground. As aluminum never rusts, a house constructed of it would always exhibit a silvery, glistening surface. It would require no cleaning, except as smoke or dust might gradually dim its native beauty. A sponge and water would bring all that back. Whenever aluminum is cheap enough for house building, steamships will be made of it. This will be a revolution in ocean commerce. Hulls of aluminum ships will weigh only a third as much as iron ones of equal tonnage. They will be as strong and secure against damage from collision as iron vessels now are. Their far greater bouyancy will be to that extent an increase of safety.

Passenger cars made of aluminum in light and graceful patterns—including wheels of the same metal—need weigh no more than wooden cars of our day, and they would be incombustible, and would not be readily crumpled up or smashed into splinters by collisions. The perils of railroad traveling in the age of aluminum will be much less than now.

The ductility of aluminum will render it the best of all possible materials for bridges. The weight of the wire ropes, as also of the bridge itself, for a given span, being but one third that of iron, engineers will perform feats of bridge building now wholly beyond their powers. The age of aluminum will be the age of bridges. They will probably be thrown over the East and North rivers at intervals of every few blocks.

With the sufficient cheapening of aluminum may come the realization of the flying machine. One great obstacle to the success of aerial navigation is the difficulty of supplying a practical motor either to propel or to steer the balloon. The want is still more seriously felt if the design is to dispense with gas and imitate merely the movement of a bird's wing or a fish's tail in cleaving the air.

The small weight of an aluminum engine, driven by compressed air, gas or electricity, compared with its iron equivalent, undoubtedly makes the ultimate success of air ships more probable than before.

The sources of supply are inexhaustible. Iron, copper, silver, gold are found in localities geographically small. But one of the most universally distributed materials of the earth beneath our feet is clay, the metallic base of which is aluminum. Having boundless faith in the ingenuity of man to overcome difficulties, we confidently expect him to wrest this now stubborn metal from its superabundant combinations, and enable the world soon to enter on an age of aluminum!—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

BLANKER'S MISTAKE.

He Acts as Chief Mourner at the Wrong Man's Funeral.

A week or more ago a gentleman whom we will call Mr. Blank died, and the time and place of his funeral were announced in the papers. Another gentleman, whom we will call Blanker, saw the notice and said to himself:

"Dear, dear, my old friend and benefactor is dead. I knew he was in Washington and intended to call on him, but now it is too late." And he censured himself for his neglect of the man who had been his friend when he sorely needed a friend.

Tortured by his conscience he sought to make up as best he could for his fault. He sent the most magnificent floral piece he could buy and, on the day of the funeral, was one of the most demonstrattve of the mourners.

After the casket had been lowered into the grave and the ceremonies were at an end the repentant Mr. Blanker turned with tears streaming from his eyes and said to a gentleman walking beside him toward the carriage:

"I am almost heartbroken at the loss of my dear old friend."

"Was he a relative?" asked the other compassionately.

"No, but we went all through the war together and he was my best friend and benefactor afterward."

"There must be some mistake," said the gentleman. "Mr. Blank was not in the army. He has been in this country only a few years."

"The duece you say!" said Blanker, forgetting his grief; "then, by thunder, I've been chief mourner at the wrong man's funeral." And he straightway looked up his old friend, who was in excellent health. It cost Blanker a good deal for flowers, but that isn't a circumstance to what it has since cost him for wine.—Washington Post.

CHILDREN'S CLOTHES.

Useful Improvements in the Style of Under Garments and Winter Dresses.

"They won't stay down! They hunch up just as soon as I pull my stockings on!" used to be the impatient complaint every morning, when our boy first attempted dressing his feet alone, with long drawers reaching to the ankle.

"Wrap the anklet of the drawers leg snug round your ankle, so; now bring up the stocking, quick, so fashion;" or, "Curl your heel and toes into the drawers' anklet; now up with stocking before the drawers leg can slip, so fashion, don't you see?" Frankie's father would say encouragingly, while watching his boy's struggles to keep his drawers legs down while his stockings went up. But Frankie didn't see, and "so fashion" wasn't the fashion at all that those refractory anklets persisted in following, so, after being called again and again from my breakfast-getting, to help the little fellow dress, I became so interested in the matter that I invented this way of keeping drawers from hitching above the ankle, though since I have found other mothers who, long before my day, adopted the same method.

At opposite edges of each anklet I sewed a six-inch strip of white web elastic, making a loop which slips under the sole of the foot and holds the garment in place.

I used tape for loops at first, but Frankie complained they would not give, and bound his feet, so I resorted to elastic straps, and, though they are washed as often as the drawers, they have not yet so lost elasticity that there is any complaint.

The mornings are so fully occupied it is a great help if the little people will dress themselves, and they can do it if their under garments are so fitted as to button in front.

Last winter I turned a new leaf in this matter. I cut and remodeled all their shirts, "nighties" and underwaists so that they have front closings, and even the little four-year-old, under this new arrangement, could nearly dress and undress herself, requiring help only about the buttons of her dress and tire. This winter she is ambitious to close even those, and often comes running out into the kitchen when I am getting breakfast, to twirl herself before me, radiant and fresh as a dewy, newly blossomed sweet pea, in her pink and white apron, proudly saying: "See, mamma, I did dress myself all alone!"

As soon as our little folks are up on stinging winter mornings, they flock on to the warm hearth rug before the sitting-room's open fire, and it occupies them and spares me interruptions, since they found can dress themselves from stockings to collar, with a little help now and then from each other.

The children's arms need looking over several times a day to make sure that little sleeves and wristlets of under garments are smoothly down in place, for often, in dressing or in their evolutions and ablutions through the day, wristlets and sleeves are pused up, making an uncomfortable, binding wad about the elbow, sometimes cruelly chafing and choking the little arm, which causes the child to be irritable and troublesome.

The children's every-day winter dresses break and fray with wear so quickly about the lower front of the skirt, we have trimmed all such skirts with a plaited or ruffled flounce, which has needed replacing across front gores onces, sometimes twice, before the dress was outworn.

Instead of a single ruffle with hemmed edges and of such depth that a tape is necessary underneath to hold the plaits in place, we like better to trim such every-day flannel little dresses with two plaited, narrow frills of stout flannel like dress; so narrow no tapes are required, and with pinked or notched edges. Such ruffles do not break in the plaits so quickly as those of greater depth, and when the pinked edges are worn ragged, pare ruffle even and again pink.—Clarissa Potter, in Good Housekeeping.

HINTS TO EMPLOYES.

The Spirit of the Man Who Succeeds and the Traits of Him Who Fails.

There is only one spirit that achieves a great success. The man who seeks only how to make himself most useful, whose aim is to render himself indispensable to his employer, whose whole being is animated with the purpose to fill the largest possible place in the walk assigned to him, has in the exhibition of that spirit the guarantee of success. He commands the situation, and shall walk in the light of prosperity all his days. On the other hand, the man who accepts the unwholesome advice of the demagogue and seeks only how little he may do, and how easy he may render his place and not lose his employment altogether, is unfit for service. As soon as there is a supernumerary on the list he becomes disengaged as least valuable to his employer. The man who is afraid of doing too much is near of kin to him who seeks to do nothing, and was begot in the same family. They are neither of them in the remotest degree a relation to the man whose willingness to do every thing possible to his touch places him at the head of the active list.—Scientific American.

—A store clerk in a small mining town near Mariposa, Cal., was sitting on the counter, when a wild boar issued from an adjoining thicket and rushed into the building and made an attack on the clerk's legs. The young man was considerably lacerated about the lower part of his body before the animal was killed by rescuers.—San Francisco Call.

FLORIDA WILD HOGS.

Fierce Little Man-Eaters Whose Natures Know No Fear.

One of the many terrors that the Northern huntsman has to deal with in Southern Florida is the ferocious wild hog. No one who has not encountered this animal can appreciate its thorough "cussedness." They are among the fiercest animals that inhabit the wilds of any land, although but little is known of them right here in our own country. The wild hog of Florida will attack any thing; he seems to fear nothing, and is by great odds a bolder fighter than the bear. There is nothing foxy about him. He does not possess any of the traits of the coyote or the wolf, but will march fearlessly into a fight, alone, unaided, and with the odds against him. When assailed he becomes a fiend incarnate and will attack any thing from a cougar to an alligator. He has none of the fear which the latter possesses, and while he keeps away from the cavernous jaws of the alligator as much as possible, yet he does not fear to assail him, and if on dry land, will swoop down upon the alligator without the slightest provocation, and the chances are that in less than an hour's time there will not be a shred of the alligator left to tell of the terrible conflict, except the hide and skull.

The huntsman would rather run into a school of sleeping, man-eating, alligators, or a den of rattlesnakes, than take his chances with the hog. He is by far the most dangerous foe that a hunter can encounter in the wilderness. If he stumbles upon a pack of them unknowingly he is, nine times out of ten, a dead hunter. Even should he succeed in killing any of them, he does not escape, for their dismal death portending howls soon bring reinforcements by the dozen. They attack the hunter at all points. While some are snarling and snapping at his legs, others are springing upon him from all sides, some have him by the throat, and others are upon his arms.

To shake them off is an utter impossibility. It can not be done. Soon the hunter becomes weak, and sinks to the ground from utter exhaustion. When this stage arrives the balance is comparatively easy work for the hog, and the sportsman soon shares the same fate as the luckless alligator. Their teeth are small and as sharp as a razor, and they have been known to gnaw at a tree for hours in their mad efforts to appease their hunger.

Should a hunter be fortunate enough on running across them to have a good-sized tree within easy distance, he may save his life by taking to it, but he is even then in a bad way. The hogs are bound to scent him out, and as soon as they do they are sure to range themselves about the base of the tree and remain there for hours, until hunger compels them to start in search of pabulum. Even then the old-timers will not leave until they have thoroughly shown their disgust by champing their foaming jaws at the fugitive; and their little eyes, full of malice, seem to snap sparks of ferocious fire. For a Northerner who contemplates hunting in South Florida, I would advise him to steer clear of the everglades, unless accompanied by an experienced native, who knows the haunts of these man-eaters, and how to contend with him.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

THE HIGHEST CATARACT.

A Water-Fall that Makes a Plunge of Nearly Two Thousand Feet.

The lake is about four and a half miles long by a mile to a mile and a half wide. On either side huge mountains rise almost perpendicularly from the water's edge, covered with snow and ice, and waterfalls come tumbling down on all sides. On the right Terror peaks and Giants' gates (7,000 feet) are the most remarkable features. Ducks of every variety skim upon the surface of the lake, such as paradise, blue mountains, gray and teal. These abound and pay little heed to strangers Several gigantic mountains—among them the Castle, the Danger, Mount Hall, and Mount Daniel—surround us, rising from 6,000 to 7,000 feet high, and we saw some fine avalanches coming down the Barron slopes with a thundering roar. Several rivers fall into the head of the lake. We selected the center one, which turned out to be the Poseidon, and after rowing about two miles up, night coming on, we camped. I must leave to some able writer the work of picturing to the world in suitable language the grandeur of what will soon be known as the highest waterfall in the world. It consists of three leaps in almost direct line, but when standing about a quarter of a mile away it has the appearance of a straight leap with two breaks. The two upper leaps are equi-distant and the lower one shorter. The water issues from a narrow defile in the rock at the top of the precipice; it then makes one grand leap of 815 feet into a rocky basin on the face of the cliff; issuing forth once more it makes another fine leap of 751 feet, and then goes tumbling headlong in one wild dash of 338 feet into the pool right at the foot of the precipice. It will thus be seen that the total height of the fall is 1,904 feet, thus making it the highest waterfall that has yet been discovered in the world. Proceeding right on to the pool in the foot—hewn out, we are told, by the heavy fall of water from the mound of stones and debris projected over in times of flood—at the expense, however, of getting drenched in the spray—a splendid view of the whole is obtained; and when the sun is shining the effect is enhanced by a beautiful rainbow of colors of the most brilliant kind conceivable. This bow is in nearly a full circle, and the closer you get to it the smaller it grows, till it is right in front of your face—a brilliant-hued ring a yard in diameter."

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
SATURDAY OCTOBER 5 1889

No other State or Territory will be more benefited by irrigation works than Nevada. There are tens of thousands of acres of the best of land in the State that only need water storage to make as good returns as any land west of the Rocky Mountains. The climate is pleasant, and for all persons with weak lungs, the best in the world. Fine valleys are scattered all over the State where all the farm products and fruits of the temperate zones can be grown, and all these of the highest excellence. When water is stored to irrigate these valleys the State will support a very large population, and the yield of the soil will far exceed in value the millions poured out from the mines. Certain newspapers of Nevada keep on urging the annexation of Utah in order to increase the population of the State. These papers would do well to remember the old proverb, "Better an empty house than a bad tenant." Every paper in Nevada can do good service to the State by clearly and truthfully making known to the world the extent of land that may be fertilized in its own section by water storage. The people of Eastern California are very deeply interested in the prosperity of Nevada; our interests are very closely connected. For this reason we do not wish to see Utah annexed to Nevada; Such connection would bring the Mormon evil to our own doors; for instead of "settling the Mormon question," it would spread the plague over the whole State of Nevada.

A Rotation with Live Stock.

A practical farmer suggests in American Agriculturist the wisdom of a system of rotation with live stock. He says: Late in August I had four hens "come off" with about forty Langshan chicks. These, hatched from the same lot of eggs, were fed in the same way and managed under exactly similar conditions right through except that three hens with thirty chicks were placed and kept on a comparatively new piece of land, while the fourth hen, with the remainder of the chickens, had to be satisfied with quarters in the old poultry yard. Those on new soil grew with wonderful rapidity, and have always remained perfectly healthy, while the chicks in the old yard, although taking a fine start, soon began to droop and to die off, until now there is not one left. Diarrhea took them all. As thorough or (as I am tempted to call it) "wide" rotation is one of the best and most simple preventives of fungus diseases in cereals, vegetables and fruits, and often of injurious insects, so, if practiced with poultry, it must aid in preventing the attacks of cholera, dysentery, catarrh, and especially that dread of the poultry keeper, the gapes, as it is well known that moist ground is one of the links in the transfer chain of the gape worm from one fowl or chick to another. The same principle, carried out in the management of hogs, is a reasonably sure protection from the attacks of swine plague or cholera, as I have had frequent opportunity to observe.

Elevators for Home Use.

The ingenious plan proposed by a Berlin inventor, of a simple and inexpensive elevator for private dwellings in place of the ordinary staircase, has attracted some attention as a long felt desideratum. It is on the principle of the inclined railway, and the motive power is furnished by the city water, which is applied in the cellar; each flight has its separate chair, so that, for example, one person can ascend from the first to the second story while another is on his way from the second to the third, or still another is descending from the fifth to the fourth. The chair, being of the width of the human body, requires but little space, and still leaves a free passage for any who wish to walk up or down instead of riding. It is set in motion by a simple pressure upon one of its arms, while after it has been used it slides back to the bottom step, its descent being regulated in such a manner that the carrying of a passenger is a matter of entire safety.—New York Telegram.

The Enterprising Reporter's Capture.

When Sara, the famous high kicker, was here with Emily Soldene, she was written up and illustrated in the columns of the paper which seems to have a weakness for high kickers. When the article on Sara was written up it was desired to obtain her portrait for a cut. Fred Hall was then the city editor and he directed one of his reporters to call on Sara and secure a picture from her. In about an hour he returned to the office. He entered the local room and said: "Mr. Hall, I couldn't get her picture, but here's Sara," and the wonderful high kicker pirouetted gracefully into the sanctum, while Mr. Hall removed his pipe from his mouth and gazed at her in amazement through his glasses. Then he hastily directed that she be removed to the artist's room and sketched. —Chicago Herald.

Low satin shoes laced up with silk ribbon are finished at the top by a bow of ribbon nearly an inch wide that will fall over the toe, thus relieving the stiff line about the ankle where the shoe ends. A few of the red and leather half shoes have narrow gilt or silver braid laced back and forth across the toe, while some have tiny spangles tacked all over side and toe.

TOILERS IN STRIPES.

SHOEMAKING IN THE KINGS COUNTY (N. Y.) PENITENTIARY.

Turning Out Three Thousand Pairs of Shoes Daily—Wonderful Machines Employed—Free Labor in the Building. Women Who Work and Never Smile.

That immense stone structure on Nostrand avenue, near Prospect Park, Brooklyn, is the King's County penitentiary, one of the most widely known and best managed institutions in the United States. About seven hundred men and women are confined there.

The most interesting part of the institution is the big shoe factory, which is situated on the eastern end of the building. It is a T shaped building, three stories in height.

Here 500 convicts are engaged in making shoes for the Bay State Shoe and Leather company, a corporation which has made a vast fortune out of convict labor. It gets its shop rent, steam power, labor and all for about $5,500 a month—about one-quarter of what it would cost the employer of honest labor.

The men and boys who work in the prison factory range in age from 15 to 65 years. Some are ninety day men and others are long term men. They wear the rough, striped shoddy garb, the popular fashion in all prisons.

MACHINES WITH BRAINS.

Each man gets a day's task and he is kept at it until it is finished. Some of the inmates are very expert and finish their share of the work as early as 3 o'clock. Three thousand pairs of shoes are turned out of the prison every day.

All the instructors and overseers are citizens who reside outside of the penitentiary. In passing through the shop they can be readily distinguished from the inmates, who are uniformed, shaved and close cropped.

The factory is especially interesting. It is arranged and managed like any big factory of the kind. The machines used are of the most approved patterns. They perform without exciting comment things which would have been considered most wonderful a few years ago. They are especially adapted for the common work which the company manufactures.

There is one little simple looking machine which, as if by magic, chops and changes thin little sheets of wood into shoe pegs, and then drives them into the soles of shoes at one operation in so short a time that the visitor is amazed. The cold machine works and throbs as if endowed with a head, heart and intelligence.

Another machine that is driving men out of the business was working away, guided by a convict mechanic. This machine attaches a heel to a shoe and then trims the heel as nicely as a human hand could do the work and much faster. It was a powerful implement, and every time it moved it looked as if it was going to crush the shoe into pulp.

One or two blows fastened the heel to the shoe. The turn of a crank set the trimmer in motion and it rapidly peeled the rough edges off the heel and left it ready for the burnisher—the man who polishes the edges of the heels or soles.

The reporter saw another noisy little machine in operation. It does a great deal of work and does it well. The machine not only punched the holes for laces, but drove eyelets into them at the same time.

Another machine sent two needles flying and they sewed a double row of stitches at one time. This reduces vamping to one operation.

The reporter was shown every machine. It is the custom of the prisoners to show every visitor a sample of the work they are engaged upon. They hand it without saying a word. The rules forbid any conversation on the part of the inmates. The reporter passed through the building without hearing a single word. The citizen mechanics and keepers alone are allowed to speak.

SILENT AS THE TOMB.

Some of the men become experts at some part of the trade. None of them ever can learn it all through, because machinery is supplanting hand work. When they become free they frequently manage to get good situations.

Two keepers guard each floor, but in case of an outbreak, a score of men would be ready for action in a minute. The prisoners there, however, as a rule, are well behaved.

The keeper opened a door and the reporter found himself in a room filled with bright, cheerful, chatting and neatly dressed girls. They were bent over machines or tables, working busily. They are employed on fancy work by the company. They go to the penitentiary every morning and leave it every night for their homes.

The reporter was then escorted to a low frame structure in the middle of the yard. The scene here was altogether different. The room was bright and cheerful, but it was silent as a tomb, although forty women were in it. They were prisoners. Some of them had very hardened faces marked by an I-don't-care expression; others looked as if they had abandoned all hope. Only one turned around to see who had come.

These unfortunate women were attired in rough blue dresses. They were engaged in shoemaking. They are, of course, kept apart from the men prisoners and isolated from the respectable girls who work in the prison. Some of them are life prisoners confined for homicide.

There were desperate women in that room—women who have terrorized men in their time, but the discipline is so perfect there that order is maintained by a single matron seated on an elevated platform which enables her to see all over the room. Her only assistant is a lady overseer.—New York Journal.

Bribed with Tobacco.

A suggestive yarn about the abuse of the fee system by constables is told by a Gardiner, Me., man. Officers down on the Kennebec have pocketed lots of money from fees for arresting tramps. It seems to have been the custom in times gone by that when one of these gentlemen of leisure was committed to jail he was presented with a plug of tobacco by the officer who arrested him, with the understanding that when his time had expired and he came round on the circuit again he should look out for his official friend and help him to get another fee. The increase of this branch of the police duty caused competition to spring up among the members of the force, and it is stated as a fact that some of the bribes of tobacco ran as high as a pound.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

How It Is Done in Mexico.

"Like the alcalde of Lagos," Como el alcalde de Lagos, is an expression current throughout a large part of Mexico to denote any trying or ludicrous position that a man is placed in because both his hands are full. The story runs:

Once went an alcalde of Lagos to church. And in his right hand he carried his staff of office, and as he entered the church he lifted off and held in his left hand his hat. Then he sought to put the holy water upon his forehead; but this he could not do, for both his hands were full. Then in a while a bold resolve entered his heart, and he plunged his head into the font.

Before the plaza that is in the midst of the town of Lagos was set in order, as it now is, there was in the middle of it a deep and wide hole. And this hole caused the town council (ayuntamiento) much concern, for they perceived that it was a dangerous place, into which the unwary might fall in the dark and be killed or maimed. So a meeting of the council was called, and it was decided that the hole should be filled. And to get earth to fill it a hole was dug beside it. And, behold, when it was full there was a new hole, as deep and as wide as that which was filled! Then in the same way did they set about filling the new hole, and again was the same result, only now the hole no longer was in the middle of the plaza, but over at the side of it in the street that goes out toward the north. And again they filled it, and so continued, until at last the hole was far out in the northern suburb of the town. And there they suffered the hole to remain, for there it did no harm.—Scribner's Magazine.

Swansea Mining Company vs. John Dunphy et als.—Filed notice of motion to set aside or vacate order of dismissal. Order allowing Defendant to file cross-complaint. Filed cross-complaint. Filed Petition of P. Reddy to be made a party Defendant. Filed notice of motion to ask leave to file amended answer.

WEDNESDAY, October 2d.

Swansea Mining Company vs. John Dunphy et als.—Order setting aside or vacating order dismissing order. Filed amended answer. Filed order that P. Reddy be made a party Defendant.

Governor Waterman is publicly announced as a candidate for re-election.

George Collins, of Warm Spring, has opened a butcher shop in Candelaria.

B. Rosenthal, the Hawthorne sprinter, wants to run any of the Inyo county foot-racers for $250 or $500 a side.

Judge Hannah and John A. Lank have purchased what is known as the Reddy place at Independence for $5,000.

The State rate of taxation for 1889 is $7 22 on the $1,000. Last year it was $5.04, being an increase of $2.18.

A good delegation from Independence and Lone Pine will attend the fair at Bishop next week. Everybody should go who can.

Arthur Smith, C. Walter and Matt. McDonald have gone to Cerro Gordo to work on the new waterworks Mr. Farrington is putting in.

Dr. J. D. Blair was awarded a special premium of five dollars for a display of waxwork. This was overlooked in the published list.

Mr. F. Schabbell was awarded a premium of twenty dollars for the best milch cow. This was overlooked in the list published last week.

Mr. D. E. Gilbert arrived at Independence last Monday from his home in Fresno County. He is visiting his brother Mr. A. D. Gilbert.

William Crapo, Albert Sainz, William Avery and F. S. Wallace have sold all their water claims at Cerro Gordo to the Union Mining Company

Hon. Patrick Reddy arrived at Independence last Monday. He has since been at Cerro Gordo, Keeler and other points looking after various interests.

Mr. McIver intends to make an exhibit of raisins at next fair of 18th District. This will be the first fruit offering from land irrigated by the Eastside canal.

Rev. J. H De La Motyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock a. m.; at Georges Creek at three o'clock p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening.

Mr. H. T. Thomsen's boy disappeared suddenly at the close of the fair last week. All the girls were crowded about him at the pavilion and some of them must have got away with him.

A. R. Conklin left town on Thursday morning for San Francisco, to attend the Masonic Grand Lodge which meets there next week. Mrs. Conklin accompanied Mr. Conklin to San Francisco.

Senator Stanford's stallion, Palo Alto, now has the fastest record of any trotting stallion. At Stockton last week he trotted three heats in the following time, 2:16½; 2:17¾, and 2:13¾. This time has never been equaled by any stallion in a race.

The bankers of Los Angeles have offered $100,000 at a law rate of interest to insure the working of the grape crop into wine and brandy, and this is now being done. The price of grapes has very largely increased already.

Dr. Woodin came up from Olancha Thursday evening and said he thought Gus. Walker and the other two men who were blood-poisoned may recover. They are still in a critical condition and the Doctor left town next morning to attend them.

Mr. W. Walker has tried a variety of tomatoes called the "Brazilian fig." He has just cured and packed some of the fruit and it makes a very good substitute for figs. The tomatoes are a little smaller than figs, and of a yellow color.

The contest of W. L. Slack and Robert W. McIntyre for 160 acres of school land situated in section 16, Township 12 of this county, has been referred to the Superior Court for adjudication by the State Surveyor General.

Every tax-payer in the county should have a copy of the annual address made by the President of the 18th District Association at the close of the fair last week. They would find it profitable reading. It will be published in the proceedings of the State Agricultural Association, issued from the State Printing Office.

The Board of Supervisors meets next Monday to make the tax levy. On Monday the matter of refunding the county indebtedness will be acted upon. We understand that Supervisor Sneden has received a proposition from parties in Sacramento or San Francisco to place the bonds at 5½ per cent.

Copies of the Constitution and By Laws of the 18th District Agricultural Association can be had at the office of the Secretary at Independence. Section 9 of the Constitution is particularly commended to the attention of life members; it contains the following: "Any member who shall attempt to deceive or be guilty of a breach of good faith toward the Society may be expelled by a vote of two thirds of the members present at any meeting of the Board, &c." It may become necessary to take action under this rule.

The Silver Question.

A National Silver Convention will be held at St. Louis at an early date. The purpose of the Convention is to take steps to secure the remonetization of silver. The following letter was received a few days ago:

NATIONAL SILVER CONVENTION }
ST. LOUIS, Sept. 21, 1889. }

MR. C. MULHOLLAND: Dear Sir:—I address these lines to you with the view of enlisting your hearty co-operation to the National Silver Convention, to be held in this city at an early date. At the same time would thank you for any information or suggestion bearing on the subject. The Silver Question is a matter of great importance to the West and South, and it shall be the work of the coming Convention to discuss that subject in all its commercial bearings, and to take measures to forward the interest of Silver coinage and the general use of silver as a money metal.

Yours truly,
JAMES CAMPBELL,
Chairman.

Useless Example.

"Man will be man to all eternity", So said Mokana the veiled prophet, and so it is. In spite of all the warnings that are given people will go on kindling fires with kerosene and pulling loaded guns toward them by the muzzle. On Wednesday A. Rambo was up in the Sierra mountains north of Big Pine, with his band of sheep. He placed a loaded shot-gun against a sheepcorral, and afterward reached over the fence for the weapon, pulling it toward him by the muzzle. Of course the weapon exploded by the hammer catching on the fence; the charge went through his right arm, between the shoulder and elbow. The arm is horribly mangled and the bone broken very badly. The brother of Mr. Rambo brought him to Independence and he is under the care of Mrr. Dr. Woodin. The Doctor says she can save the arm but it will never again be strong. Mr. Rambo is very cheerful and laughs as if the affair were only a little fun.

The Swansea Mining Suit.

On the 29th of July the suit of the Swansea Mining Company, Plantiffs, vs. John Dunphy et als., Defendants, was dismissed in the Superior Court on motion of counsel for Plaintiff. On the 1st inst the Defendants were allowed to file a cross-complaint. On the 2d inst. the Defendants filed an amendsd answer and petition asking that P. Reddy, who had purchased a one-third interest in the property affected by the said suit, be made a party defendant, which was granted by the Court. Counsel for defendants alleging that the dismissal of the suit was irregular. The property in question is that certain mine at Cerro Gordo known as the O'Keefe and Dunphy mine, which proves to be a very valuable property.

Steady Progress

The records in the office of the Secretary of the 18th District Agricultural Association, show that the receipts this year from pavilion and race track, and from race entries, exceed the receipts from the same sources last year by a small fraction less than twelve per cent. This is proof enough that interest in the fair is steadily increasing, and a refutation of the statements made to the contrary. The management of the fair this year, in every department, gives far greater satisfaction than other years. The Directors and the people know much better now than at the beginning how to manage a fair. The awards of premiums in the pavilion this year gives much better satisfaction than any former fair. The committees went strictly according to rule and so far as human judgement could guide them aright tried to do justice to all.

Shaken Up.

Sunday night at 10:30 o'clock five severe shocks of earthquake were felt at Bishop. The motion appeared to come from the south west, and lasted nearly an hour. Next day about noon three more shocks were felt. At Round Valley fifteen shocks were felt; these are reported to be heavier than the shocks at Bishop. Dishes were shaken from shelves and every thing was pretty well shaken up, but no serious damage is reported. County Surveyor McKnight is authority for the report. No earthquake shocks were felt as far south as Independence.

Blood Poison

Last Tuesday news was recieved from Olancha that Gus Walker, August Matszer and Charley Pacheco were very dangerously ill. It is said that Mr. Walker and the other two men had skinned some cattle that had died at his place. All three were blood poisoned in their hands or arms. A messenger was sent to Lone Pine and called Dr. Bunting to attend. On Tuesday evening Dr. Woodin was telegraphed for to Independence and he left soon after, traveling all night by team.

Candelaria

There is good prospect for a big revival of business at Candelaria. The English Company who own the water works and a thirty stamp mill are negotiating for the purchase of the Holmes mining property. There is strong probability that the sale will be made, and if it is the camp will boom again. Candelaria is far from being a dull camp as it is; about one hundred and seventy miners are employed there now, and that means a good deal of business.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Found.

On the morning of the 17th of September a purse containing money. The owner can have the same by calling on Timothy Richards, proving property, and paying for this advertisement.

The wine growers of the State allege that their business is being badly injured, if not entirely ruined by the unjust working of the Internal Revenue system. An effort will be made at the next session of Congress to remedy the evil. The wine interest is injured for the benefit of whiskey distillers and dealers in foreign wines.

The grape brandy of California is being recognized abroad as the purest and best brandy in the world. The Los Angeles Herald says that Hon. J. De Barth Shorb some time ago forwarded samples of the brandies made by the San Gabriel Wine Company to London, to a firm which furnishes the English army and navy with supplies of this kind. The result of the venture was an order for five puncheons of brandy to be forwarded at once to London. There is no doubt this is but the initial one of many orders. The price is not made known, but this much is revealed, that if the whole brandy product of this region were sure of as good a market, the price of grapes would rise at once to $20 a ton. These markets will be opened, and that price will be paid for our grapes before many years pass by. As it is the price being paid is $10 a ton.

Under Sheriff Yaney had a fruitless trip to Olancha early in the week after a horse that was reported to have been stolen. There are stupid men who run after the Sheriff and Justices of Peace if a horse happens to stray away from the pasture or gets out of sight in a clump of willows. No attention should be given by officers to such idle tales. In this case the owner of the horse accused a young man who was attending to his own business and who has never been known to do wrong to anybody. If this person should take a good blacksnake and wear it out on his reckless accuser the dignity of the People of California would not be very much injured.

A promising horse should not be let go for a song because he may not come up to what was expected of him, even for several years. The famous horse "Sultan" is a noted instance. When he was nine years old the best time he had ever made was a mile in 2:33. In his tenth year he was bred to over sixty mares; on the 10th of July he was taken out of the stud and put in training, and the same season trotted a mile at Oakland in 2:24. He is now in Kentucky and could not be bought for $40,000; the fee for his service is $200.00 cash down.

Last week a fire was started in the mountains near Santa Ana and an immense amount of dsmage was done. A great deal of grain in sacks was destroyed and buildings and fences burned. Large numbers of sheep and cattle perished in the flames or died of heat and smoke. The Los Angeles Tribune says that people could be seen at night on the housetops all over the City "enjoying the sight." The people who could "enjoy" such a sight would find little enjoyment in heaven unless they could see the torments of the damned in hell.

St. Louis wants the World's Fair in 1892 and the Governor of Missouri and other leading citizens are working hard to secure it. The fair will probably be held in New York, but Chicago would be a better place that either of the other cities.

The Breton Mills

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy, and published by arrangement with him.]

He almost stumbled over Jane Graves.

A green tinted cologne bottle stood near by and he bethought himself to dash the cool contents into her face, and felt quite a doctor's surprise to see any good result follow his ministrations. The banished blood stole slowly back into her olive cheeks. He bent over her and lifted her shapely little hands, as dainty as a princess', and tried to arrange them in some graceful position. How pretty she was; if her lips were a little full that was a very pardonable fault.

A sudden mad thought warmed his body; why not wait till she opened her eyes, this charming little girl, and then swear to her that he loved her? What was love then that such a pretty face and form as this should not have it? She was no cold woman; her kisses and endearments—but his eyes had grown cold and hard while he looked at her. If she were a Cleopatra she could be nothing to him, her kisses would only stifle him with her passion; her clinging soft arms about his neck would only strangle him. He knew to his sorrow what it was to love, and no pretty sham, no matter how its voluptuous artifices might make his hot blood surge through his veins, could still for one moment the immortal longing it only mocked. She moved a little as she lay; and he started and went out.

The girl's eyes opened slowly on the rich blue lambrequins and the rare frescoing of the room. She vaguely wondered for one delicious moment if she awoke some rich gentleman's wife and her old line of poverty was past forever. Why, she was in Mr. Ellingsworth's bed chamber? How came she here? And her hair was wet, and the ruffles on her neck were damp—it was cologne. Then she remembered everything, and rose from the august couch she had unworthily pressed. She laid back the great pillows and tried to smooth out the outlines of her form on the spotless counterpane and then made her way down stairs. The house was so still it frightened her; it was as if everybody in the world had died while she lay in her faint. The hall below was empty, too, and the outer door shut. She opened the parlor door; she felt as if she must find somebody to ease the tension of her nerves.

Mr. Ellingsworth sat with his head bowed on his hands; he knew it all; his home was desolated, his pride outraged. At the noise he uncovered his face for a moment and looked up, and the cruel light falling on his distressed face revealed the marks of age his tranquil course of life and selfish and complacent philosophy had so long softened and covered. He saw the graceful figure of his maid in a pretty attitude of hesitation on his pleasure. He was alone in the world but for her; deserted in his own home only for her.

"Come here, Jennie," he said in a broken voice.

She came into the room, and a few steps toward him. Then she stopped. Her face was almost as pale as when she fainted, but her black eyes shone with unusual feverish brilliancy.

"Give me your hand, dear."

The girl started, and half turned as if to escape. Then strange thoughts darted through her brain. A warm, red flush mounted from her neck, and spread itself in tingling waves of shame to the very roots of her black hair. She came up to him, and reached out her little hand. He pressed it gently, then he laid it against his cheek. Her heart bounded in sudden revolt, but she controlled herself with an effort of sheer will, and did not move, but her startled eyes sought the floor. And so this was her proud master. But what harm if he wanted to be foolish and sentimental? it was no matter to anybody now, no one cared for her unkissed lips.

"Jennie," he said at last, "come nearer to me."

And she kneeled by his chair, in a sudden impulse she dared not define, not yet. She put her other hand in his, and lifted her dark, wet eyes to his face. Then he bent down to the upturned face, that never flinched, and in another instant he held in his arms her form that seemed to shrink only that he must clasp her the closer.

"Will you be my wife, Jennie? I never loved a woman as I do you. Will you be my wife, Jennie?"

"Yes," whispered the red lips that never once turned away from his thick raining kisses.

In Bertha Ellingsworth's own parlor it was, with her mother's face looking down from the painted canvas, in the room where the daughter of the house had so coldly entertained the heir of the Breton mills. Ah! yes, and where she had taught Curran, the prophet of the poor, to love her, and she the very essence of the spirit he taught them to hate. But how her proud face would wince now! If she were only here! Her father, the haughtiest of men, to everybody in the great world beneath him cold as an iceberg, they said, arrogant as any duke of courtly circle, could it be he praying, with hot breath, the love and the hand of his servant maid! Could it be he holding her so fondly in his arms, where he might have gathered coy dames of the stateliest rank, lavishing honeyed words and mad endearments on his poor servant girl, whose only nice dress it was he was crushing so recklessly! Ah! it was worth the cost, if she had to tear her heart out, for all that wealth can buy will be hers.

She nestles her burning face on his shoulder and tempts him to new caresses and new words of folly, that he may not remember yet what a strange thing it is that he is doing; that he not think of repenting until his enthralled senses shall make him forget everything else rather than this sweet hour. Her wildest dreams are realized. She will be one of the rich and the great whom the rest of the world bow down to. She will make her husband's—yes, this man to be her husband, why should she be ashamed with him—she will make his friends all envy him his beautiful wife; and as for their faded, fashionable women, with limp backs and bloodless veins, how it will please her to study the signs of jealousy on their listless faces. And Bertha Ellingsworth's proud, false heart will ache with shame over the low born woman whom her father has made his wife.

"It's thirty minutes behind its time," growled the ticket agent. It was Philip Breton, who went back to the post to tie his horse more securely. "Poor Joe, poor old boy," the big white horse seemed more like to fall dead in his tracks than to try to break away. "A pretty hard gallop, wasn't it, Joe, your breath will come easier in a minute, old horse."

His time was precious, but he lingered in an uncontrollable terror of what he had come so far to see. He had thought he wanted to make sure. There might be some mistake in the note, or even now, if she had changed her mind—but it was all folly, he saw it now. He had forgotten all reason in one wild longing to see Bertha again. But what was the use of harrowing up his soul with new pictures he would pray God in vain to wipe out of his memory? But he had come so far, perhaps it would do no harm to look at her once more. He had turned and was walking along the platform, toward the ladies' waiting room. He glanced up the long stretch of straight track and saw in the distance the head light of the engine, which seemed to him a pitiless monster, hastening on to seize his darling and bear her to some hopeless region of eternal night. He must hurry. Who knows? it might be fate had kept her rescue till this moment, and meant him to save her. He pushed the waiting room door open. The seats appeared all vacant and expectant; a big russet apple had been dropped on one of them by some interrupted traveler, and in another place the carpet upholstery was specked with the white litter of a cracker and cheese luncheon. The whole atmosphere was too commonplace for a pair of runaway lovers. Philip took two or three steps into the room, but it was only as he turned to go back that he saw the settees were not quite deserted.

It was a group for a painter's loftiest genius, but the artist must have a faith in love, which the world has learned to scoff. The figure of the man may embody strength and dignity in unconscious perfection; it is bent now in a beautiful protective attitude toward the woman whose head rests on his shoulder. Her lips are parted to reveal the pearly gleam of her white teeth, but she does not smile. She has golden hair like a crown setting well down on the broad forehead, and there is the tint of red gold in her cheeks like a perpetual glow of sunset. But what painter can catch the holy tenderness in the eyes that drink in her unsullied beauty, the breathless wonder, the rapt mystery in his softened face? What inspired brush can picture the quiver of the long, golden lashes against her cheek, and then the dreamy stirring of the eyelids that now open wide, so his impassioned gaze may thrill the liquid depths of blue. Let the artist fix them forever if he can—the smile that ripples at last over her fascinated face, a smile of trust too perfect for shame.

What was that sound so like a human sob that startled the lovers from each other's arms? Why, it almost made them sob for sympathy, as if it came from a broken heart. Who ever heard the wind moan like that before, so short and sharp it was? But it must have been the wind, for they were quite alone.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE MILL OWNER'S TRIUMPH.

The gray mists broke and the eastern clouds blushed red at the coming of the most ardent lover in the universe. His fruitful bride, earth, smiled her glad welcome up to him, but gave place to settled peace and love as the early hours went by. But it was the saddest day of Philip Breton's life, so terrible a thunderbolt had fallen upon him out of the clear sky.

A woman's hand had struck him; and he had looked to her for all the most precious experiences of life. Humiliation might have stirred in some hearts a blessed reaction to relieve their aching consciousness of loss; but the blow to his love and his hopes was so much heavier than the hurt of his pride that he did not think to be insulted, he was only overwhelmed. There could be no escape for him; he had been so simple to give his whole heart to a woman before he had married her; to teach every taste to incline toward her; to suffer every little rill of tenderness and worship in his being to pour into his ideal of her. And all his plans touched her somewhere; and all his thoughts, even such as she could never understand, wound about her personality as he conceived of it at some point in their processes. And now every hour of his life must be embittered by some reminder of what he had hoped for and lost. The balmy south wind that morning was like her breath; the soft murmur of the water in the raceway below the mill was like her voice; a blonde face looked down from one of the windows of the weave room, there was a flitting expression on it like Bertha. And so it must be forever.

At the head of the counting room table sat Mr. Breton, smiling and bland. Before him were piled the heavy tomes containing the records of his great factory; by his side stood two clerks to assist in handling and explaining them. Around the table, attentive and eager, were gathered as many as could get there, of shrewd, hard business men. A dozen more of the same unmistakable species, stood about the room and leaned against the windows, quiet and observant, listening to all that could throw any light on the matter under discussion. It was the momentous meeting of the prospective stockholders in the corporation looming up in magnificent proportions before their fancies.

The paymaster and the attorney stood at hand apt with suggestions; one of them had the smile born of fond hopes of unlimited fees; but the other an awkward fretted air at the sudden change from one to so many superiors. The mill owner was detailing to this most interested audience the details of the flourishing industry he desired to enlist them in, and their eyes shone eagerly at the prospect of buying such stock at par. They imagined their thousands doubling on their hands in such an investment, doubling without an effort of theirs, doubling in spite of their idleness, which added never one stroke of theirs to the sum of the muscular force that furnishes the wealth of the world.

But what could possess Breton to make this change? Was he rich enough? Absurd! who ever was rich enough? Perhaps there was some flaw somewhere, and this cunning lawyer knew all about it. They must not let themselves be fooled, so they listened with still quickened attention, and waded suspiciously into one after another of the big ledgers, for a few pages, to ferret out the secret.

"The gentlemen may ask," Mr. Giddings, the lawyer, had noticed the puzzled expression on their shrewd faces, "why Mr. Breton makes this offer. From the amount of stock we propose to issue, it ought to be clear enough," and he laid his fat finger in the palm of his left hand. "He proposes to keep just as big an interest here as ever, but the plan is to make these mills, as they shall be extended, gentlemen, as they shall be extended, the most stupendous manufacturing enterprise in the country. For that there must be more capital, and you are invited to join."

Philip had but little to say to the unwelcome visitors, whose carriages, of all varieties of elegance, lined the roadside without. He moved about among them more like a ranger than the least pretentious of them all.

"Ellingsworth, Mr. Ellingsworth," called Mr. Breton, "why, he was with me only last night. Can he be sick?"

Yes, sick with shame, and Philip thought how quickly the flush of pride would fade out of his father's pleased face, if he knew—knew that his own son, the heir of his millions, had been discarded at last by the girl he had already taken into a daughter's place in his heart. And it was this same man Philip had defended and argued for, that had struck his deadliest blows at the mills, and now thrust his knife into the very home of the rich man. It would embitter the father's life, when he came to know of the broken heart his boy must bear forever—but he need not know just yet.

Now and then the young man went out into the hall for a clear view of the massive mills, and glanced fearfully along their front, and listened. But the roar of the machinery did not abate, and through the jail like windows he could see the tireless men and women forms stepping backward and forward, raising and lowering their hands at the tasks that had ushered in their cheerless youth, and were wearing out their tedious lives. Very likely there would be no trouble; could it be they had been influenced by his words? God forbid that any such responsibility should rest on him. Once, a man appeared at a door. Philip's heart stopped beating for an instant; he thought him the first of a long line that would now rush forth from their prison. But the man only stood listlessly a moment as if there was absolutely nothing of importance on his mind, and then went back. So Philip returned to the office.

"Is that Breton's son, that young man who looks so pale? He don't seem to take much interest in this business."

"I've always noticed business talent wears out in one generation. The father earns and saves for the son to spend."

"True for you," said a third, apparently of Irish birth. "Well, we won't want the boy's services when the old man dies."

"Hush, Breton is talking."

"And, gentlemen, I have never known a strike here, though I certainly don't pay any more wages than my neighbors." There was a slight noise of something falling outside and Philip hurried out. The mill yard was as quiet as on Sunday; not a soul in the whole village apparently who thought of a strike but him. And whether he feared most an outbreak or a day of peace he could not have told.

"I wonder how the help will like the change," suggested a white haired old gentleman, with a grim smile.

"These corporations are the neatest device of the century for a gagging machine. What the devil's the use of the help grumbling, when there is nobody they can find to blame, only a fiction of law."

Philip was standing near the speaker, and was so galled by his complacent enjoyment of his own unfeeling philosophy as to venture to make a suggestion.

"Isn't it just possible that this complaining you wish to gag has some occasion?"

A dozen craned their sleek wise necks, to stare at the man who talked so wildly.

"Why, my kind hearted young friend," replied the philosopher, glad of an excuse to vent his practical wisdom, "don't you see the poor will complain until the whole vast distance between us and them is bridged over. We have got to protect ourselves, you won't deny that. I climb to heights on another's body. Everybody knows life is only a fight—the weakest goes to the wall. The poor are the weakest in this case."

Could the mill owner's son dispute such plain propositions? An odd silence pervaded the company. The gentlemen in the windows stopped talking to look at this curious young man, who seemed disposed to question the plainest axioms of his class. His father hitched uneasily in his chair and rustled a bundle of papers to attract Philip's attention. What had got into the boy?

But of what possible account was his opinion. Mr. Breton rose to his feet, and all eyes were turned toward the mill owner, on the course of whose ideas hang the fate of a whole village. The clock struck 10.

"Gentlemen, you pronounce yourselves satisfied," he waited. His lawyer smiled complacently, the paymaster and his clerks began piling up the books. "Well, then, there are one or two formalities, my lawyer informs me—What is that noise?"

It was like a rising north wind, not a little like the breaking of the angry sea on a rock bound shore. From the entrance to all the mills swarmed jostling human forms. A thousand heads turning at frequent intervals to catch courage from their numbers, gave an unpleasant snake like effect to the swaying columns which united as they swept on toward the mill yard gates. Philip Breton hurried back from the hall and threw open the office door. Within all was still as death. The complacent smile had died on the lawyer's lips. The clerks stood like statues, while the ruddy color slowly faded from his father's face, giving place to undefined dread of a danger that had elements no human arm could control. Kings and armies before him had trembled at the murmur of mobs till they learned how short lived was the mad fury of the people, no matter how terrible their wrongs, until they learned how certain was the disunion which made patient victims so soon again out of the fierce avengers of blood.

"Do you ask what the noise is?" cried Philip from the doorway. "It is a strike at last, see for yourself."

The sight of the mill hands in open revolt, untouched by the motives that commonly restrained them, at once awed Philip, and determined him to oppose their violence with his life if need be. The mill yard gates were hastily unlocked by the frightened janitor, and as the first excited throngs, like a nation escaping out of bondage, swept through them, only one man stood calmly watching from the counting room piazza. In the front rank ran some little children, whose faces, that should have been rosy in the first bloom of life, were pinched and wan instead. Play hours and merry sports were unknown to them. What their baby fingers could earn was the merest trifle, but it cost them the only hours that could ever be free from care. A number of them were deformed from a neglected infancy; they had to learn to be still because it hurt them to fall—tenderer lessons there was no time for. Then came the girls, chattering, and nervously pulling their shawls about their shoulders, as if it were winter. One and all seemed to wear the plaid shawl—badge of their vocation—and there was the same dull yellow hue on their cheeks, the same lines of weariness on every face. Few of them looked well; girls ought to be petted a little; but the dreary monotony of their ill paid work had frowned on their childhood as it cursed them now. And instead of resting while they might ripen into healthful, happy women and blessed mothers, their unknitted frames and soft muscles must work like their starving fathers and brothers. It is only the women of the rich whom the sentiment of chivalry is for. In every eye was the dullness that comes when hope goes, and the vague, delicious dreaming, the eternal privilege of girlhood, is broken rudely upon, when love has no more of its ideal glory, and all the beauty of purity and refinement is lost in the gross struggle for something to eat. The gentle, poetical grace of womanhood was gone, those huddling, awkward creatures were only weaker men.

But Mr. Breton had pushed his chair to one side and was making his way through the group of his friends with hardly a word. The rest tried to smile, but he was far too angry.

"Don't go," urged his lawyer, imperatively laying his hand on his shoulder, "don't think of it, you can do no kind of good, and they will only insult you."

(To be Continued.)

FORTUNE FOLLOWS DISASTER.

A Clerk's Windfall Two Hours After His Employer Was Burned Out.

Bernard Heringhi, a well-known broker, whose office is on Pine street, between Montgomery and Sansom, is the father of a young man who will hereafter speak nothing but praise concerning the Louisiana State Lottery. The young man's name is Louis, and he has for several years past been chasing fortune behind the counter of Louis Sach's dry-goods store at Fresno.

A few days before the recent conflagration at Fresno, the clerk bought the one-twentieth part of ticket 42,758, for which he paid $1, and of which he thought no more until the morning of the fire. His employer's store was left in ruins, and he escaped from his boarding-house with little more than the garments considered necessary by civilized nations.

In his vest pocket was his portion of ticket 42,758, and in a somewhat reckless mood ne offered to sell half of it to a friend for 50 cents. The offer was refused, and two hours later the poverty-stricken clerk passed a bulletin-board on which he read, with something like bewilderment, that his ticket had drawn the first capital prize of $300,000 in the Louisiana State Lottery, of which he was entitled to $15,000.

That night there was a champagne supper at Fresno, in which the lucky clerk participated as host. His share of the prize was promptly forwarded him by Wells, Fargo & Co., and he hastened to the home of his parents at 828 Geary street in this city. Louis' father and one of his six brothers are stock-brokers, but Louis believes in real estate, and in real estate the larger part of his prize money was invested.

He paid off a mortgage of $2,500 on some land that he owns at Fresno, and with $8,500 of the remainder bought the handsome dwelling-house at 2222 Jackson street, which he subsequently presented to his mother. The family moved to their new quarters yesterday, and the lucky clerk, after telling the story of his good fortune to many friends and acquaintances, departed for Lake Tahoe, where he will make merry while the season lasts.—San Francisco (Cal.) Call, Aug. 8.

A Des Moines, Iowa, youth, under the inspiration of sensational novels, purchased an outfit of small arms, a false beard, and then held up several travelers in highwayman style. His vaulting ambition o'erleaped itself, and he is at present in the care of the police.

in the kidneys. When inactive they speedily fall into disrepair. Those obstinate and fatal maladies, Bright's disease and diabetes, ensue with terrible certainty upon the inaction of the organs affected. Catarrh of the bladder, enuresis, gravel and strangury are also to be apprehended from a partial paralysis of the bladder, of which weakness and sluggishness are the causes. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is a fine tonic and promoter of activity for the renal organs, and one which can be relied upon to afford them the requisite stimulus without exciting them—in effect to be feared from the unmedicated alcoholic excitant of commerce. A further beneficent effect of the Bitters, by renewing activity of the kidneys, is to enable them to drain from the blood in its passage through them, impurities productive of rheumatism and dropsy. Nervousness, fever and ague, constipation and dyspepsia are conquered by the Bitters.

THE ENDURING HOME.

According to "Gath," Personality Is Not to Be Found in the City.

It is city property which is a perishable thing, and not property in the country. Hardly a house, which is preserved, which has historical or pious reminiscences remains in any of our cities. The John Hancock house of Boston had to go at last; the old South Church might as well be torn down as to be what it is, a kind of peddling bazar. The Hamilton House in New York barely escaped sacrifice by being turned over to a church. But country houses are generally found where they stood when the man of history put them up.

You never could find Shakespeare's house in London if he ever had owned one there. The bard of nature returned to his cattle market town and there acquired and altered one of the best residences, and to this day it stands evidence which, like the old man's tomb, pulverizes the small beings who would get a day's fame by explaining Shakespeare away. I have always noticed that when I went to hunt up the evidences of men of celebrity I found them nearly perfect in the country and hardly ever recoverable in the city. If you want to see where John Jay lived so much longer than his contemporaries, go to his farm at Bedford, forty miles above New York City.

If you seek for DeWitt Clinton's rooftree, do not ask where it is in New York, but go out to Maspeth, in Long Island, and there, close to the big cemeteries and oil refineries, stands exactly as it was the statesman's home, where no doubt he had more self-respect than in all his political victories. He died very young for such a man, occupying the office of Governor, which is a seat of nettles. You will find Oliver Perry's birth-place still standing among the rocks and sand-hills in Rhode Island. Men who only lived in towns left no more foot-prints than are to be found upon the brick pavements. Hence the ever recurring desire not merely to buy a place in the country, but to build one and see it molded to one's own images.

Garfield had a house at Mentor, which will probably stand for two hundred years, in some of its parts, even though fire should consume most of it. He said that in order to work off the mental fatigue of Congress he had to go back and pitch hay upon the wagon as he did when a boy. You can locate Garfield for the next several centuries by his country home, but where can you locate Chester A. Arthur, who always lived in a town, and whose house merits a glance on Lexington avenue, New York, being indistinguishable from thousands of others, having not one feature that is distinctive or ornamental about it.

But Mt. Vernon remains all that we can put our hands on of Washington, except his old buckskin breeches. Posterity he had not; the painters like Stuart sublimated the man to their conception of what the public expected; but when you go to Mt. Vernon you have only to fill up a chair with a living man somewhat worn out in the general service, you can smell him, handle him and criticize him. You can not say, "In this closet he kept his whisky; here he turned and expressed a suspicion to the servant that somebody had been tampering with the whisky. This fire place he poked up with that old shovel. Here on the porch he sat of evenings and heard the chatter of some French or German traveler, who expected before he went to bed, at the risk of his eye-sight, to put down every thing that Washington grunted and assented to, or if he tilted back his chair and crossed his egs."—Gath in Cincinnati Enquirer.

A CHARITABLE FAMILY.

The Vanderbilts are always most wise and munificent in their charities. The city is dotted with admirable monuments to their generosity and discretion.

There is down-town, among the poorer classes, a handsome building which contains a free circulating library given by George Vanderbilt, the student of the family, whose own private library is one of the most splendid in this country.

Still further up town is the maternity hospital given by Mrs. Sloan, another one of the Vanderbilt daughters; and now comes the new monument in the shape of the new lodging-house for the Christian young women.

Besides these special institutions, their gifts to hospitals, asylums, orphanages, homes and churches is as legion, and they have a private almoner who looks into and relieves special cases of distress which come to their notice, and who at Christmas time has put into her hands a liberal contribution from each member of the family which she dispenses in Christmas gifts to the poor.

It is calculated that the Vanderbilts have within the last twenty years given away considerably over $1,000,000 in charity, a large portion of it having gone to Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tenn., at which the young men of the South of narrow means have been enabled to get an education. They have been very generous in their gifts to the South and indeed, Mrs. Willie K. is a Southern woman herself by birth and is disposed to look favorably upon applications from that quarter.—N. Y. Sun.

ROSE FROM THE RANKS.

Railroad Magnates Who Started as Brakemen, Operators or Rod-Men.

Among the officers of nearly every railroad in the country are to be found men who have risen from the very lowest round. A. M. Tucker, who is division superintendent on the Erie under Murphy, started in as track laborer, and his first promotion was to the position of rod-man in the engineer corps. John N. Abbott, of the Western States Passenger Association, used to be a freight clerk on the Erie. C. W. Bradley, general superintendent of the West Shore, used to be a brakeman and conducter on the same road. General Superintendent Bancroft of the Denver & Rio Grande learned the Morse alphabet in one of the small stations on the Erie, and counted himself lucky when he obtained a position as telegraph operator on the West Shore. President Caldwell of the Nickel-Plate was once a clerk on the Pennsylvania. F. K. Hain, general manager of the New York elevated roads, began his career in his seventeenth year as a machinist's apprentice on the Philadelphia & Reading road at Pottsville.

The officers of the great Pennsylvania system, from the president down, have all come up from the bottom. President Roberts entered the service of the road in 1852 as rod man in the engineer corps. Later he had charge of the construction of small branch lines, and finally was made assistant to the president in 1862. He has been president of the road for eight years. A. J. Cassatt, formerly vice-president of the company, also began as rodman. Second Vice-President Thomson used to be a machinist in the shops at Altoona. He invented the block-signal interlocking switch. General Manager Pugh commenced as brakeman, and General Passenger Agent Carpenter was once messenger boy in the Philadelphia office of the company. General Agent Geer used to be receiving clerk in the freight department.

James McCrea, general manager of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburgh, like President Roberts, began as rod-man at $40 a month. He now draws a salary of $15,000 a year, and is still under forty. Robert Pitcairn, superintendent of the Pittsburgh division of the Pennsylvania and general agent for the company, was once a messenger boy in the old Atlantic & Ohio telegraph office in Pittsburgh. Among the other messengers employed at that time was Anson Stager, afterward general superintendent of the Western Union Telegraph Company; W. O. Hugart, now president of the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad Company; Andrew Carnegie, who a few years later laid the foundations of his wonderfully successful career as private secretary to Colonel Tom Scott, and David McCargo, now general superintendent of the Allegheny Valley railroad.—Philadelphia News.

Handling Babies.

An article, "How to Handle Babies," applicable to young mothers, is on the rounds. Some advice suitable to amateur fathers might not be out of place.

Never get careless when you are in a hurry to go down town, and throw the baby across the back of a chair like an overcoat; it is hard on the spine if it has one yet.

Do not toot it like a pile driver to make it stop crying, as this only jolts more yells loose.

Don't trot around the room with it at night when it has the colic with its head down and its feet up; see that you grab it right side up and with care.

Never be so thoughtless as to carry it by one arm or one leg, if you do not want any more noise in the house.

Do not let it slip through your hands on to the floor, though you do find it as hard as an eel to hold.

In handing it to your wife do not be so glad that you will let go of it before she has a clinch on it.

If you stand it in the corners to get rid of it be sure that its feet are down.

Never lay it upon the mantel piece, even for half an hour; it has no wings, but may have when you come back.

Do not be guilty of tying its feet together and hanging it on the hat rack.

If it jumps off your lap, always try to catch it before it hits the floor.

Avoid lifting it up by the ears, as this produces enlargement of those ornaments.

Don't bounce it up against the wall like a ball and catch it; it may not like it.

Do not balance it on your head with your hands in your pockets.

If you find you must lay it across your lap to spank it, see that it is in a comfortable position.

If you feel that you have to sell it, don't.—A. W. Bellew in Yankee Blade.

To Do Away With Drunkenness.

"I notice," said Col. John J. to The Man About Town, "that the daily press of the country is beginning to agitate as a means of doing away with the evil of drunkenness a remedy which I advocated several years ago. My idea was to build at public expense asylums where drunkards could be sent and kept in confinement until pronounced permanently cured by a competent physician. It was my opinion that these institutions should be maintained by money secured through a tax levied on the keepers of saloons, and I do not believe that there is one saloon keeper out of a hundred who would not favor such a plan. Such institutions, properly conducted, with a law requiring the confinement therein of every man detected in a state of intoxication would, I think, go far toward bringing about an abatement of the evil. It would cause a large percentage of the men who now make a practice of getting drunk to hesitate before making the venture. I had even gone so far as to draft a bill embodying the provisions outlined above, with the intention of having it introduced in the legislature, but at the earnest solicitation of a few friends, who deemed it an unwise measure, I allowed the matter to drop, although I felt then and still feel that it would be a good thing for the state to have some such law in operation."—St. Louis Republic.

THE TWO NAPOLEONS.

Both Attached a Superstitious Importance to the Letter M.

It is not generally known that both Napoleon I, and Napoleon III, attached the most superstitious importance to the letter M. This will be understood when it is remembered that Marbœuf was the first to call attention to the genius of young Bonaparte at the military college, that Marengo was Napoleon's first great victory, that Molae was the General whom he superseded in the command of the French army in Italy, that Mortier was one of his best Generals, that it was Moreau who betrayed him, and that Murat, King of Naples, was the first martyr to his cause. Marie Louise shared the culminating point of his fortunes, Moscow was the scene of his greatest disaster, and it was Metternich who defeated him in the field of diplomacy. No less than six of his Field Marshals and twenty-six of his best Generals had names beginning with M, and Maret, Duke of Bassano, was his most trusted confident. His very first battle was that of Moulnotte, and his last that of Mont Saint Jean, subsequently and more universally known as Waterloo. Among his victories were those of Millesimo, Mondovi, Montmirail, Montereau and Montmartre. His first Chamberlain was M. de Montesqieu, his last residence in France was at Malmaison. He surrendered himself to Captain Maitland of Her British Majesty's ship Bellerophon, and his attendants at St. Helena were Montholon and Marchand.

The superstition attached by Napoleon III, to the letter M may be accounted for by the fact that his wife was a Countess of Montijo, that his most intimate friend was the Duke of Morny, and his most dreaded enemy Manzini. The most glorious feats of arms by the French army during his reign were the capture of the Malakoff and of the green Mameloh during the Crimean war. His most famous Field Marshals were McMahon, Duke of Magenta and the Duke of Malakoff. The great victory of Solferino in 1859 took place on the banks of the Mincio, and the cities of Mantua and Milan played an important role during the campaign. The Mexican war and the execution of Emperor Maximilian caused his power to wane perceptibly. Malmesbury was the name of his most intimate friend in English political life. Sedan, which witnessed his fall, is on the banks of the Meuse; the surrender of Metz rendered his restoration to power impossible, and Moltke was the name of the man to whose genius he chiefly owed his defeat.—N. Y. Times.

THE SOUTHERN CROSS.

A Constellation Which Australians Have Chosen for an Emblem.

I have seen the announcement of a book called "Under the Southern Cross." That means a great many countries, over half a hemisphere, says a traveler writing from Australia, for the cluster is visible in ten and fifteen north latitude, or even further north of the equator. I have often mentioned the brilliance of the stars of the south, and here was this beautiful constellation of the cross (crux) wheeling around us, barely dipping to the horizon at her least or lowest sweep. The Consul-General for Australia said to me one day: "Captain, do navigators use the north star and southern cross as beacons or guides when projecting their courses over the vast northern and southern oceans?" I looked at him a moment and saw he was not quzzing me, for he was an educated man, and replied: "No, sir; not as a rule. The star Polaris will do in the north Atlantic—i. e., when she has, say, an altitude of reasonable height, but is seldom used now, in these days, and south of twenty degrees north latitude never, for then she is seen too dimly. The southern cross never, for only when it is on our meridian is it directly south, although Polaris, on the contrary, varies from the true north only a small amount; she is north herself. May I ask why you propose this question, sir?" He said that on the last Sabbath in church the clergyman announced that the marines made constant use of the north star and the southern cross as guides over the trackless ocean, and he (the Consul) was not so sure of it. It is said that King Cetewayo, when in church in England, heard the minister make such a foolish remark that he arose, gathered his toggery about him, and said gravely to his attendants: "Come, let us go." I should have done the same if I had been where our Consul was. It is thus that I often learn how men appear, no matter how great they are, when they do not know what they are talking about; for instance, the Kennebecker talking aoout spiritualism or any kind of religion.

Well, the Australians have captured the beautiful cross of stars that wheel over their heads, chosen it for an emblem (of trials, perhaps, or to apply to themselves as a crucial test), and placed it in the field of their flag, with the English Union Jack in the upper left-hand corner. They are ahead so far as the cross is concerned, and probably the book means "Australia" and its crucial test.—Boston Journal.

—A Philadelphia tool manufacturer instructs his workmen to hold large steel tools in a north and south line while they are being tempered. He says that many years ago he noticed that such tools would often fly apart when being tempered if held "east and west," and that the liability to such accidents was greatly lessened, if not entirely obliterated, if the tool was held "north and south."

MRS. DRUMMUP'S LIST.

It Covered Considerable Ground, But One of Her Victims Didn't Know It.

It seems that the business of collecting subscriptions is no exception to the rule that there are tricks in every trade. A man or woman with a gift for the business may collect of the same men at least twice as much as another would. A little incident will illustrate.

They were getting up a subscription a little while ago for the Home for Decayed Apple Women. There is no more deserving institution, as every body knows, than the Home for Decayed Apple Women; and moreover, an influential coterie of Back Bay women, headed by Mrs. Charity Drummup, had become interested in the home, and were pushing the subscription. When Mrs. Charity Drummup sails into a counting-room with a subscription paper in her hand, the bankers and men of business know perfectly well that it is of no possible avail for them to turn her a cold shoulder, unless they are anxious to lose caste or custom among the wealthy circle which revolves around her.

Down town there are two solid men, in business, one as a retailer in a large way, and the other as a financier, who are very good friends. The financier is mercurial, excitable, and passes for a free-handed, generous sort of person. The merchant is phlegmatic and slow, and has the reputation of being very shrewd and close in money matters.

Well, when Mrs. Charity Drummup came down in behalf of the Home for Decayed Apple Women, she made one of her calls upon the financier and promptly showed him a paper, already signed by at least a dozen bankers, merchants and other wealthy men; and upon this paper there was not a single subscription for a less amount than $50.

"You see what they're all doing," said Mrs. Charity Drummup, with an engaging smile.

The financier gave a low whistle.

"Nothing but fifty dollar subscriptions, eh?" he said. "Well, I'm afraid this is a little too steep for me. You are quite right, Mrs. Drummup, in assuming that I should not care to lead the break-off into smaller figures; but, see here, is this the only paper you have got, Mrs. Drummup?"

"The only one," said the lady, with a little confusion. "Why, this is the subscription paper, sir."

"But is it the only one you have got?"

Pressed for an answer, Mrs. Drummup produced from her reticule a paper, upon which there were several $25, $10 and even $5 subscriptions.

"Ah! this looks more like it," said the financier. "You may put me down there, if you please, for $25." And he went down there, high up on the list.

That night the financier and the merchant met at the club.

"Well," said the merchant, "did you have a call from Mrs. Drummup to-day?"

"Yes."

"Stuck you for $50, I suppose?"

"Oh, no; I only gave $25."

"What? Why, there wasn't a single subscription on her list for less than $50!"

"Not on the list she showed you, my friend; but you should have called for her other paper."

He explained the scheme to the close-fisted merchant, who became fairly black in the face with chagrin. He felt that he had been overreached; and the financier, who seemed to have come in for a share of his wrath, is of the opinion that he did not sleep that night, and that it was, indeed, several days before he regained his usual calm.—Boston Transcript.

THE RATTLESNAKE'S BITE.

No Sure Cure for the Venom Known to the Medical Fraternity.

Speaking of people bitten by rattlesnakes, Mr. J. H. Estill, of the Savannah News, says: "Out of a thousand people bitten by rattlesnakes I do not think a dozen recover. There is no known cure, in spite of the fact that many people have said that they were cured by whisky. You may depend on it when a man says he was cured of a rattlesnake bite, though necessarily not a liar, he is at least laboring under a misapprehension of the facts. There is a small snake similar to a rattlesnake in appearance, whose poison is not so venomous, and negroes bitten by it place line upon the spot or less drink enough whisky to counteract the poison. Whisky if taken in a large quantity, goes directly into the blood and counteracts the poison of the snake. But the regular Georgia rattler, from five to seven feet in length, is a deadly customer to meet. It does not give any warning, but strikes the moment it is disturbed, and it can strike an object as far distant as it is long. A friend of mine was riding along in the saddle one day and a big rattler lying in the road leaped at him as he passed. It closed to his bootleg, driving one of its frangs clear through the thick leather of his boot and through his trousers, just escaping the flesh. It required considerable kicking to shake that snake off, and when he was finally got rid of he started in pursuit. My friend faced bullets in the army with nonchalance, but his hair stood on end when he saw that snake coming, and he jammed spurs to his nag and didn't stop until he had gone a quarter-stretch. My plantation is full of rattlesnakes, and only last week my hands killed twenty-six in a field of twenty acres."

THE CIRCUS PARADE.

Mr. Bixby Takes His Family to See It and Has a Glorious Time.

"The children would enjoy the big circus parade, don't you s'pose they would, ma?" said Bixby pleasantly to his wife at breakfast one morning.

Mrs. Bixby thought they would, and the five little Bixbys, profiting by their father's weakness, set up a howl to go, and go they did, and this is a sample of what Bixby endured during the three fearful hours that he and his family were a struggling fraction of the ten thousand people who made up the crowd:

"Oh, pa, I can't see."

"Lift me up, pa."

"Me too, pa."

"Where's Sally?"

"Where is Will?"

"Robby, you hang tight to papa's coal tail!"

"Can't you hold Janie now, papa?"

"Oh, mercy goodness on us, I don't see Bessie any place! Bessie! Bessie!"

"Papa, you must keep hold of Willie and Robby and Bessie and Sally. It's all I can do to manage the baby."

"Willie! Willie Bixby, if you let go of my hand again I'll—"

"Bessie, come here."

"What are you crying for, Rob? Hush! Hush, now, or—great Jupiter! has Bessie got away again?"

"Papa, do hold the children up and let them see that lovely chariot."

Bixby sprains his back holding two of them up at a time.

"Willie, you will, just let me ketch you—stand back, here comes a patrol wagon full tilt!"

"Oh, we'll be killed!"

"Here, you, Willie! Robby! Bessie! Sally! Ma! Janie! Where are you? Get back or—"

"Oh, pa, I don't see Sally!"

"She's hanging on to my coat tail. Where's Robby and Bessie?"

"I don't know."

"Here, ma, here we are."

"Where's Sally?"

"Here—all right."

"And Robby?"

"Here—we're all here."

"I'm so glad! Such a fright as I've had, dear, dear!"

They drag wearily home after waiting an hour and a half for a car on which they could all get seats. Four of the children went to sleep on the car and Bixby says it was the worst good time he ever had.—Time.

CONEMAUGH

"Fly to the mountain! Fly!"
Terribly rang the cry,
The electric soul of the wire
Quivered like sentient fire.
The soul of the woman who stood
Face to face with the flood
Answered to the shock
Like the eternal rock,
For she stayed
With her hand on the wire,
Unafraid,
Flashing the wild word down
Into the lower town.
Is there a lower yet and another?
Into the valley she and none other
Can hurl the warning cry:
"Fly to the mountain! Fly!
The water from Conemaugh
Has opened its awful jaw,
The dam is wide
On the mountain side!"

"Fly for your life, oh, fly!"
Facy said.
She lifted her noble head:
"I can stay at my post, and die."

Face to face with duty and death,
Dear is the drawing of human breath.
"Steady, my hand! Hold fast
To the trust upon thee cast.
Steady, my wire! Go; say
That death is on the way.
Steady, strong wire! Go, save!
Grand is the power you have!"

Grander the soul that can stand
Behind the trembling hand,
Grander the woman who dares,
Glory her high name wears,
"This message is my last!"
Shot over the wire, and passed
To the listening ear of the land.
The mountain and the strand
Reverberate the cry:
"Fly for your lives, oh, fly!
I stay at my post and die."

The torrent took her. God knows all.
Fiercely the savage currents fall
To mattering calm. Men count their dead.
The June sky smileth overhead.
God's will we neither read, nor guess,
Poorer by one more hero less
We bow the head, and clasp the hand:
"Teach us, although we die, to stand."

VELOCITY OF LIGHT.

In Sixteen Minutes It Traverses the Diameter of the Earth's Orbit.

Light moves with the amazing velocity of one hundred and eighty-five thousand miles a second, a speed a million times as great as that of a rifle-bullet. It would make the circuit of the earth's circumference, at the equator, seven times in one beat of the pendulum.

For a long time light was thought to be instantaneous, but it is now known to have a measurable velocity. The discovery was first made by means of the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites.

Jupiter, like the earth, casts a shadow, and when his moons pass through it, they are eclipsed, just as our moon is eclipsed when passing through the earth's shadow. Jupiter's shadow far surpasses in magnitude that of the earth. His moons revolve around him much more rapidly than our moon revolves around the earth, and their orbits are nearly in the plane of the planet's orbit. Consequently they all, with the exception of the fourth and most distant satellite, pass through the planet's shadow and are eclipsed at every revolution.

Roemer, a Danish astronomer, made in 1675 some curious observations in regard to the times of the occurrence of these eclipses. When Jupiter is nearest the earth, the eclipses occur about sixteen minutes earlier than when he is most distant from the earth. The difference in distance between the two points is about one hundred and eighty-five million miles, the diameter of the earth's orbit, or twice her distance from the sun.

It takes light, therefore, sixteen minutes to traverse the diameter of the earth's orbit, and half that time to span the distance between the sun and the earth. Light is thus shown to travel one hundred and eighty-five thousand miles in a second, and to take eight minutes—or more exactly, five hundred seconds—in coming from the sun to the earth.

It follows that we do not see the sun until eight minutes after sunrise, and that we do see him eight minutes after sunset. When we look at a star we do not see the star as it now is, but the star as it was several years ago. It takes light three years to come to us from the nearest star, and were it suddenly blotted from the sky, we should see it shining there for three years to come.

There are other methods of finding the velocity of light, but the satellites of Jupiter first revealed its progressive movement.—Youth's Companion.

PATENT POSTAL BOX.

An Ingenious Invention Exhibited in Melbourne, Australia.

A patent postal pillar box of an ingenious character has been exhibited at the Athenæum Club, Melbourne. The box is octagonal in shape and stands seven feet in height, having a diameter of about two feet, and it has three divisions. The top one contains a series of compartments, in which there are police and fire alarms, the former being communicated with by means of a telephone, while the fire brigade is apprised of an outbreak of fire in the locality by the pressure of an electric button. The central division, which is the largest, is devoted to the reception of letters and newspapers, the ordinary slot or opening through which the letters are placed being covered with a wire comb to prevent the letters being extracted by the insertion of thin sticks or pieces of wire.

The letters fall into an iron box which is fastened on to the door, and when it is desired to clear the box all that the postman has to do is to touch a spring, which causes the bottom of the box to fall, and this allows the letters to drop into the open bag underneath. There is a dial immediately above the door denoting the times at which the box is cleared, and on the door being closed the hand on the dial indicates at what time the next clearance will take place. The bottom division is reserved for the batteries used in connection with the police telephone and fire alarms, and on top of the roof an electrical lamp is affixed.—Sydney Herald.

THE INNOCENT READER.

How He Is Ensnared By the Makers of Nostrums and Toilet Articles.

[The popularity of the "reading notice" exceeds any craze which has ever possessed advertisers or seekers after notoriety. Exciting and thrilling incidents of contemporary or historical record begin by chaining the attention of the most casual reader and terminate in a touching appeal for Boggs' soap. Captain Burnaby is said to have made the fortune of Squeers' pills by a mere mention of them in his "Ride to Khiva." If this sort of thing grows with the years as it has with the past, we may look for a new edition of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" containing something of this sort]:

"Uncle Tom," said little Eva, as the two sat side by side in the diminutive summer-house, "won't you tell me about the New Jerusalem?"

"Lor' bress yo' soul," exclaimed the faithful darkey, "what makes yo' gwine ax sich questions all o' er heap?"

"Because," said the child, as a beautiful blush o'erspread her brow, "I want to know if a little white girl can get there, or if only colored people will pass the beautiful gates?"

"I specs," replied Uncle Tom, "dat dey'll be mos'ly bracks dere, but dey'll let you in sure 'nough, honey," and he sang in a clear, musical voice fourteen verses of the old plantation hymn:

"De gospel train am movin', Hop aboard."

"I often thing," said Eva, after Tom had finished his melody, "that I shall not be long in this world. I shall not be here when the spring comes and the flowers bloom, and then, dear Uncle Tom, what will all you poor people do without me? I wish you would gather them all about me so I may tell them how to be good."

The faithful African departed, and in a few minutes returned with all the servants, who ranged themselves about her, wondering what she was going to say.

"Dear, good friends," said little Eva, "I am afraid I shall soon go away to join the bright-winged host on high."

The negroes prostrated themselves on the ground, and, with piteous cries and lamentations, besought their young mistress to remain with them. Uncle Tom stood up, with the tears streaming down his honest black face, and shouted:

"Dere's just one ting, Missey Eva, kin fetch yo' back when you's mos' gone, and I'se got it right hyar."

"What is it?" asked the child; "the Gospel you sang about?"

"No, honey, it am dat ar medicin' I done bought down at de store," and with these words he produced a small bottle of Dr. Gander's Golden Godsend and Restorer of Lost Health, and administered a teaspoonful in a wine-glass of water to the sainted child. Eva immediately arose, completely restored to strength, and signed a certificate setting forth the wonderful nature of her cure. She is now practicing for a race on one of Blobbs' bicycles.

[This may be regarded as a combination ad., the expense borne mutually by Dr. Gander and the bicycle manufacturer, between whose wares there can, of course, be no competition. Then there will probably be something in this vein]:

"Like a ray from far beyond, aslant the golden, mellow dawn," said Sybil Craydocke, in her quick, original way, as they all stood watching the shadows fall on the distant heights of Old Graylock.

Harry Thorne said nothing, but he glanced at Rosalind, and the bright color flitted across her cheek; she did not speak at once. Her sweet face was aglow with enthusiasm, and as she turned it toward the young man, there was a swift, answering light in his eyes that deepened her rosy blush.

"It seems to me," said Sybil to Uncle Marmaduke, as they stood apart, "that those two were made for each other—made from the beginning, and have been growing nearer and nearer ever since. They are the true poles of a battery, and there is a shock and a spark whenever they meet. How wonderful is the power of true love!"

"And how wonderful the forces of nature," said Uncle Marmaduke, "the electric-battery of which you speak! Is it not a perpetual reminder of the far-off gates where the countless throngs are passing to and fro?"

"Yes," murmured Sybil, turning toward her companion with one of her rare smiles; "and the crystal stream, with its golden lilies, too."

They were silent for a moment, and then the old man said, impulsively:

"Sybil, you've got the right stuff in you. You'll excuse the liberty I take, remembering that I'm odd and eccentric, and have been known as a crank. I'm going to give you something as a remembrance of this sanctified hour. Here it is."

"A present! How good of you." She took the small parcel and opened it eagerly. Then she clasped his hands eagerly in hers, and exclaimed, with trembling voice:

"How can I thank you?"

"Do you know what it is?"

She lifted her face to his, radiant with emotion. Her eyes were moist and her voice wavered like the wind-swept forest, as she answered: "It is Dr. Bilious' Electric Beautifier, it opens the pores of the skin and gives one a complexion like the rose dawn. Oh, how can I thank you?"

The Elliott Case.

The following is the text of the decision of the Supreme Court granting the slayer of John B. White a new trial.

IN BANK.

PEOPLE vs. ELLIOTT } No. 20,195.

The defendant was charged with the murder of one John B. White, convicted and sentenced to death. His motion for a new trial was denied and he appeals.

The following points are made in support of the appeal:

1. That the Court below erred in overruling the demurrer to the information.

2. That the Court erred in denying the defendants motion for a change of venue.

3. That the Court erred in not allowing the defendant subpoenas for witnesses to prove the grounds of his motion to change the venue.

4. That the defendant was not duly committed by a magistrate.

5. Erroneous rulings of the Court in the admission and exclusion of evidence.

6. Improper statements made by the Court in the presence of the jury with respect to the testimony of certain witnesses.

7. That the Court erred in certain of its instructions given to the jury.

8. That the verdict was against and contrary to the evidence.

1. Counsel for appelant have not called our attention, in their brief, to any defect in the information and we have discovered none. The information must therefore be held to have been sufficient.

2. The motion for a change of venue was properly denied for the reason that it was based upon the ground of bias and prejudice existing against the defendant in the county in which he was charged, and was supported by the affidavit of the defendant alone. Such an application is addressed to the discretion of the Court below and a denial of the change will not be reversed unless it clearly appears to this Court that such discretion has been abuged. (Penal Code, Secs. 1,033, 1,035; People vs. Fisher, 6 Cal., 164; People vs. Mahoney, 18 Id. 180; People vs. Graham, 21 Id. 260; People vs. Congleton, 44 Id. 92; People vs. Goldenson, 76 Id. 328) No such abuse of discretion is shown by the record.

3. The application to the Court for the issuance of subpoenas for witnesses to prove the grounds of the application for change of venue was not supported by any legal showing and was for that reason properly denied. It was based upon the mere statement of one of the attorneys for the defendant. The record states: "Counsel for defendant stated to the Court, then in session, that he had talked with a number of persons in business of public official character, which brought them in daily or frequent contact with persons from all parts or sections of Inyo county, who stated that everywhere in said county there was a widespread conviction that the defendant had, in cold blood and without justification or provocation, killed and murdered John B. White, an old and universally acquainted and esteemed citizen of Inyo county, that great excitement and bitterness existed against defendant, W. T. C. Elliott, and that a widespread disposition to execute him by lynch law prevailed throughout Inyo County and that an impartial trial of defendant could not be reasonably anticipated; but that such persons refused to give their affidavits voluntarily to that effect, but that if brought before the Court under process of subpoena would candidly state such facts as they knew and their unbiased opinions an- prayed the Court to order subpoenas to be issued and served upon a number of credible persons occupying responsible offices of public places of business that defendants counsel would name to the Court."

These facts were not supported by the affidavit of the defendant, or any one else, in support of the application, and although the statement of counsel may have been entirely worthy of credit the showing was not such as the Court was bound to act upon. Besides it does not appear that any such order was necessary. Subpoenas are not usually issued on the order of the Court, but as a matter of course on application to the Clerk. There was no showing that a subpoena had been applied for and refused or that the defendant was unable to procure the attendance of witnesses. While great care should be exercised by the lower courts, especially in capital cases, to see that the defendant has a fair and impartial trial and that every facility to that end is afforded him, he has no right to ask the Court to act, except upon a legal showing, under oath, of the facts necessary to call for such action.

4. It is contended that the defendant's motion to set aside the information should have been granted. The motion was based upon two grounds viz: that the warrant issued by the examining magistrate was insufficient and that the defendant was not given time to procure counsel and none was furnished him by the Court at the preliminary hearing.

The last of these only is urged here. Conceding that the constitutional provision, which makes it the duty of the Court to appoint counsel for a defendant who is unable to employ one, applies to preliminary examinations, it is shown by the affidavit of the District Attorney that the defendant was brought before the commiting magistrate on the 28th day of April, 1888, and was then and there informed by said magistrate of his right to counsel at all stages of the proceedings, and the nature of the charge against him; that by consent of the defendant the examination was set for Monday, the 7th day of May, 1888, at 10 o'clock A. M., and that on said day said examination was had.

This certainly showed that the defendant was given ample time to procure counsel, and there is nothing in the record tending to show that he expressed any desire to have one appointed.

We do not think the ground stated was one on which the information could properly have been set aside, but if so it was not sufficiently shown that any such ground existed.

5. The evidence was to the effect that the defendant killed the deceased by stabbing him with a butcher knife. It also appears that the defendant's wife had lately procured a divorce from him; that she and her children by a former marriage were the owners of a ranch upon which there was a dwelling-house and a small cabin; that by the decree of divorce, the wife was given the custody of their child with the privilege to defendant of visiting it three times a week, which he did, and he was given the right to occupy the cabin on his wife's ranch for two months; that the deceased was an uncle to defendant's wife and had, since the divorce, been staying with his niece a part of the time; that a few days before the death of the deceased he, without sufficient provocation, brutally attacked and beat the defendant with a club, inflicting a painful wound on the head; that at that time, while the defendant was smarting from the effect of the blow, he threatened to kill the deceased and afterward endeavored to borrow a revolver, saying that the deceased had beaten him once and he wanted to be prepared for him; that the time for which the defendant was allowed by decree of the Court to occupy the cabin was about to expire and the deceased showed great anxiety for him to get out and announced his purpose of removing him therefrom at once; that the defendant came to a man who was working on the ranch and said to him, "I have stabbed White in the cellar; go up and look and see how he is getting along. I think he is badly hurt." That the man went to the cabin in a few minutes and found the deceased lying a few feet from the cabin, on the road, dead, with a knife wound in his chest; that the defendant passed on and notified others of the occurrence in substantially the same words, and requested that an officer be sent for to take him in charge.

The claim of the defendant at the trial was that the deceased attacked him in the cellar of his cabin while he was in the act of cutting some meat that was hanging there, for his dinner, and that he stabbed him with the knife he was using, while it was claimed on the other side that the defendant had laid in wait and killed the deceased as he was passing along the road.

There was no witness to the killing except the defendant. He testified. "I ran from the cellar door."

"Q. What occurred there?

"A. I was in the act of taking the meat down and I heard a step on the cellar steps. I turned to look and saw the last foot of some one stepping off the lower step. I saw the side of the man approaching and Mr. White shoved the door open.

"Q. How did he shove the door open?

"A. I can't say whether with his hand or with a stick.

"Q. What was then said or done?

"A. He said, 'What are you doing here? Get out of this cabin or I will beat you to death, you son of a bitch.'

"Q. What did he do then?

"A. I said 'Let me out,' and sprang for the door.

"Q. What did he do or say?

"A. He threw up his cane, and as I made the spring I drew my left arm in guard and struck with my right.

"Q. What did you strike with?

"A. With the knife that I had picked up.

"Q. What then occurred?

"A. Mr. White then ran out of the cellar, and I too.

"Q. Where did he go?

"A. He ran out and turned down north the road or lane.

"Q. What did you do?

"A. I ran from the cellar door.

"Q. Show where you ran.

"A. From the cellar door east down this way to where I saw Kinney plowing.

"Q. What did you say then?

"A. I told Kinney that White had attacked me in the old cellar and that I had cut him, and for him to go and see him as I was afraid I had cut him badly."

There was contradictory testimony of physicians on the question whether White could have traveled from where the defendant claimed to have stabbed him to where his body was found, after having recieved the wound from which he died.

With this brief summary of the evidence we pass to a consideration of the questions presented as to the rulings in the admission and exclusion of evidence.

The divorced wife was a witness for the prosecution. She had testified to the striking of the defendant by White and the threats then made by the former, and in explanation of the presence of White at the house, during his stay there, she was asked: "What was the business of John B. White, the deceased, on the Baker ranch when he made his last visit there at the time he was killed?" This was objected to on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant and that it was hearsay, she could only know it from declarations of White. Counsel announced that they desired to know that White was not a trespasser on the ranch, but was there for a lawful purpose and a legitimate and chivalric one. The objection was overruled and the witness answered: "He was there for the protection of me and my child against W. T. C. Elliott," the defendant. The defendant moved to strike out the answer for the same reasons and the motion was denied. These rulings were erroneous. The evidence was entirely irrelevant. The case presented no question as to the right of the deceased to be on the ranch of Mrs. Elliott and it could hardly be contended that it was necessary for him to attack the defendant in his cellar in order to protect Mrs. Elliott and her child. Nor can it be said that the testimony was harmless. The fact that it was necessary, or even supposed to be necessary, to protect the former wife and infant child of the defendant, as against him, could not but prejudice the minds of the jury and as we regard the verdict of the jury, which must result in the severest penalty, as scarcely warranted by the evidence, we cannot say that the substancial rights of the defendant were not affected by this ruling.

It is further contended that the Court did not allow the witness Fannie Elliott to be fully and freely cross-examined. We cannot concur in this view with the record before us. We trust that the cases are rare in which so much time is allowed to be taken up with immaterial and useless questions, on cross examination, many of which were repeated over and over again without apparent reason. If the Court erred at all in this respect it was in allowing the witnesses, including Mrs. Elliott, to be too freely cross-examined.

In the cross-examination of this witness it was attempted to show that there was a discrepancy between her testimony at the trial and that given by her at the preliminary examination. In the course of the examination of the witness on this point the Court said: "I cannot see any discrepancy in her testimony upon the preliminary examination and her testimony today."

To this remark the defendant excepted and contends that it was error. Certainly a statement of this kind by the Court was improper, but we, like the Court below, cannot see the discrepancy, and for that reason must hold that the statement did the defendant no harm.

There are other points made relating to the evidence. We have given them careful attention, and without extending this opinion by noticing them in detail, we hold that none of such rulings were erroneous.

The Court instructed the jury as follows:

"The killing being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation to justify or excuse the homicide will devolve on the accused. Up to the moment when the killing is proved the prosecution must make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt. When the killing is proven it devolves upon the defendant to show any circumstances in mitigation to excuse or justify by a preponderance of evidence on his part. That is, the killing being proved, the defendant must make out his case in mitigation to excuse or justify by some proof stronger in some in some appreciable degree than the proof of the prosecution. It must be in some degree, no matter how small, stronger than the proof of the prosecution on the other side.

"You are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying your minds."

This instruction was erroneous.

The penal code provides: "Section 1,105. Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." The latter clause of the section was entirely omitted. The most important testimony of the prosecution was that of the admissions of the defendant that he had killed the deceased, and such admissions tended strongly to show "that the crime committed only amounted to manslaughter or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." Therefore it was important that the instruction, which cast the burden of proof on him, should be qualified in accordance with the section of the code on which it was based. (People vs. Arnold, 15 Cal., 476 and 482; People vs. Ah Kong 48 Id., 7; People vs. West, Id., 611; People vs. Smith, 59 Id., 607; People vs. Langdon, 67 Id., 428.)

The instruction was erroneous for the further reason that it cast upon the defendant the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justified or excused, the commission of the homicide by a preponderance of the evidence when it was only necessary that he should introduce evidence sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt or the mitigating circumstances. (People vs. Buston, 22 Pac. Rep. 127.)

It is contended that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. We have read the evidence carefully, and must confess to some surprise that a verdict of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty, should have been returned, but we are not prepared to say that the jury were absolutely wrong in their conclusion. It has a tendency, however, to convince us that the motion of the defendant to remove the cause to another county for trial was well founded and should have been granted.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial. WORKS, J.

PATERSON, J.

BEATTY, C. J.

I concur in the judgment on the ground that the Court below erred in allowing the question quoted in the foregoing opinion to be put to the witness Fannie Elliott and in admitting her answer thereto. In my opinion the instructions held to be erroneous in the foregoing are not erroneous. (People vs. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal., 387; People vs. Raten, 63 Cal., 421.)

THORNTON, J.

Her Cable Cipher.

His daughter was going to Europe. He is a very rich man, but a millionaire will always make up a telegraphic code to save money. It would be nothing to him if she sent a hundred words, but he will always get as much as he can for nothing any way and he will have a telegraph code. I don't know, though. Perhaps he thought she might take as many words to say a thing by telegraph as ladies ordinarily do in conversation, and that would bankrupt a millionaire. Let us acquit him of economy. Let us say that by confining her to one word he would understand what she telegraphed, whereas if he left her to express it her own way he might never have found out what she meant. He left her to make out the code. She made one quite to the point on all important matters. She selected the words herself, wrote it all out and handed it to him when she left. He locked it in his desk and it was all right. Last week he got a telegram from her. It consisted of one word—"Laugh." He laughed. It seemed to be something quite pleasant. His code was at the house. He went up there in the best of humor. He got out the code and he read: "Laugh—Send me $500."—San Francisco Chronicle.

Counterfeit Bills.

"No matter how expert a bank teller may become in detecting bad money, there are counterfeits extant which will stump the best of them. I was for many years a United States treasury expert, and have handled all the famous counterfeits ever made. I have in this roll of bills $5,000, about one-half of which is good and the rest worthless. I often test bank tellers by offering this money for deposit, and you would be astonished to learn how large a proportion of the counterfeits are passed by some of them as genuine. In fact I have never found one who rejected every bad bill, some of them accepting as much as $1,700 of it, and from that down. I have been testing some Kansas City bank men today, with varying results. Four hundred dollars was the least counterfeit passed by any of them, and one bank, if it had taken the teller's decision on the money, would have been stuck for more than $1,000."—Expert in Kansas City Journal.

Alaska and Its Seals.

The Alaska seals have paid Uncle Sam for Alaska, which cost him $7,000,000. Since 1870 the Alaska Commercial company has paid the government $5,597,100 or seals killed. The customs duty from Alaska seal skins dressed in Europe have yielded in round numbers about $4,000,000. By the new contract with the company the United States is to receive $50,000 per annum for ten years and $3.50 per head for each seal taken, the annual catch to be limited to 100,000 seals.—Frank Leslie's Newspaper.

Education and Invention.

Inventors have generally been led to their important tasks by chance, and have picked up their training by the way. Here and there may be a mute and glorious Milton whose soul has never been aroused by educative influence, but for each great poet who has never learned to sing there are probably scores of men as able as Watt, Naymith or Edison who have not been aroused to their inventive powers. It therefore seems very desirable that manual training should be made to go with such headwork as will serve to stimulate the inventive spirit of our youth. The means of carrying out such a project for arousing the inventive capacities of young men and women will need to be created. It is easy, however, to see the way to a plan in which, as soon as the student has compassed a sense of the natural powers in their simpler relations, he may be set to work seeking to solve problems which demand inventive power for their solution.—Boston Herald.

Secretary Noble has decided that a man and his wife cannot each prove up homestead entries to adjacent tracts of land. A young couple in Nebraska made homestead entries on adjacent tracts, erected a dwelling on the dividing line, got married and lived on their respective tracts and then claimed a patent to both. The husband was granted a patent to his tract, but the wife was refused.

"It is not intellectual work that injures the brain," says the London Hospital, "but emotional excitement. Most men can stand the severest thought and study of which their brains are capable, and be none the worse for it, for neither thought nor study interferes with the recuperative influence of sleep. It is ambition, anxiety and disappointment, the hopes and fears, the loves and hates, of our lives, that wear out our nervous system and endanger the balance of the brain."

The Barbed Wire Bill Was Not Enacted.

The following letter was taken from a recent issue of the Pacific Rural Press:—

VISALIA, Sept. 23, 1889.

EDITORS RURAL PRESS:—I received to-day your favor, asking information in regard to a bill that was introduced in the last Legislature requiring every person who erected and maintained a barbed wire fence on a public highway to put a six inch board the entire length and not less than three feet from the ground. In answer I will say I am familiar with the bill, as I took some interest in it.

The bill known as Senate bill No. 38 was introduced in the Senate Jan. 10th by Senator Jones (Senate Journal, 28th Session page 17), and on Feb. 12th it passed that body by 27 ayes to 2 noes (page 431). It was then transmitted to the Assembly and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, of which I was chairman. The committee on February 26th reported against the bill (as you will find by referring to the Journal of the Assembly, page 549). On Feb. 28th it passed first reading (Assembly Journal, page 626), and was placed on second reading file, and there it remained until the Legislature adjourned, when it stood No. 136, page 9, Assembly General file.

It is an entire mistake about the bill passing, and I am at a loss to know how the report ever got started. I see several of the papers have stated that the bill did pass and was signed by the Governor. Whether the Governor signed it or not I don't know, but I do know that it never passed the Assembly and consequently it does not appear in the Volume of Statutes and amendments of 1889.

However when I come to think of it the band of flintlock reporters that lay around the Legislature for the purpose of fleecing the members, I am not surprised at the papers getting some things wrong.

Yours respectfully, G. S. BERRY.

Tax Notes.

The following shows the amount of taxable property in the school districts in which a special tax has been levied this year:

Bishop	$228,856
Warm Springs	106,060
Independence	155,132
Union	75,555

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, $10,782 69 was collected by the county in the form of fees, hospital and road poll taxes, and licenses. The receipts for the same time exceeded the expenditures by $1,588.

"Insult me?" he repeated between his teeth. Then he stopped, and suddenly faced about. He frowned fiercely on the cautious business men, whom he knew full well had decided to give him the lurch. "If I had a pair of horses who behaved badly, they are stronger than I, but I would whip them and starve them till they forgot it." If he could subdue his own rebellious factory hands, and turn them back to their work like whipped beasts, he knew these timid counselors would come back into his office and put their names to his corporation scheme, if not—— He bit his lip and pushed on out of the door. His help had never dared think of mutiny before; he had fancied they were afraid of him. Five minutes more would prove whether they were or not.

In a moment more he stood beside his son, who watched, pale and stern, from the counting room piazza; behind him his lawyer, whose face, deserted by smiles at last, looked almost unfamiliar; and still further back a few of the boldest of his visitors.

"For God's sake—go inside," whispered Philip between his set teeth, "you will only make them angrier."

"Truckle to my own help, shall I?" repeated his father in his harsh, grating mill tones.

The mill owner threw back his head and shoulders, and looked commandingly at the crowd. He could not understand why they were not afraid of him. Had he not been the dispenser of bread, almost of life or death to them, for twenty years? They were a thousand, and he one, but for thirty years their fate had trembled in the balance of his will, and was it any less so today? They might be ever so numerous and strong; the subtle machinery of the laws and the ingenuity of capital put them at his mercy. He frowned majestically on the women and children; where would their dinners and suppers come from? Where could they lay their foolish heads to-night if he chose to punish them? But they only laughed in a novel sense of freedom as they hurried by to enjoy their whole holiday.

Then came the men, with the hard, set look on their faces that should have warned the mill owner that this was not the moment for him to assert too boldly the sovereignty that had made their whole lives a barren waste. The word had been passed from lip to lip that Mr. Breton was at the counting room door, and very angry. But his son, who had shown himself their friend, and who had been too honest with them to give them false counsel, stood with him, and the men meant to show him the respect he deserved and march by in silence. Still, the seeds of old wrongs and daily repeated privations had borne a bitter fruit in every heart, and many a sullen look of hate Philip saw on their faces.

"Stop, stop, I say," shouted Mr. Breton. A murmur ran through the crowd and they stopped. Philip saw the willingness of the halt. It had irked them to go by, without one word to relieve the universal sense of justice that had seethed so long in their breasts.

"You will do well to let them go in peace," muttered Philip, in a constrained voice, "the poor creatures will have to come back again when they are hungry." But his father did not appear to hear him. His face had flushed crimson, and he seemed to have quite lost his self command, as he shook his fist at the sullen crowd that widened every moment.

"Do you think you can force me, you beggars?" For a moment admiration for his courage divided the indignation of his strange audience, and the first response was as much applause as anger.

"No!" he shouted, in a voice shrill with excitement. "You shall every one of you starve first. You get more wages than you earn now. Do you know what this strike will fetch you?"

His lawyer plucked at his sleeve. That man of discretion did not like the expression on the faces of the workmen nearest to the piazza.

"This is quite uncalled for, my dear Breton, and not only that," he added, "but decidedly dan"——

But the excited proprietor shook off his arm and stepped forward, trembling with impotent wrath.

"I will tell you," he cried, "I will cut your pay down 10 per cent. more." A murmur started on the outskirts of the crowd, and swelled into a roar at his very feet, while the mass of ill clothed humanity swayed tumultuously.

Philip saw that a catastrophe was imminent. The excited workmen avoided his anxious eyes, and there was a power of wrath in their slightly stooping attitude, like a panther, before a spring. Their faces, too, were lit up with a fierce glare, like some long caged beast that has burst his bars. Injustice after all is an uncertain foundation for riches, when it is thrilling human beings who suffer. He rushed boldly forward to save his father from violence, apparently he was absolutely blind to the peril in which he stood. Mr. Breton's face had grown suddenly purple.

"I'll teach you to brave me. I'll starve your obstinacy out of you, before one of you comes back into my mill."

He threw up his hands in distress, reeled backward before their astonished eyes, and fell into the arms of his son, a victim of his own passion. The poor were avenged. God had taken judgment into his own hands.

The poor were avenged.

His friends bore his stricken form from within, out of the sight of the people. But he had tamed the mob at last, though it took his life to do it. A hush as chill as the breath of the death angel's wings had fallen upon them. They waited with the patience of their class, they watched doctors come and attendants hurry to and fro, but no one told them what had happened. Nothing but glances of hate were cast at them, till at last Philip Breton himself, with a new desolation in his face, came out alone on the piazza. Some fancied he stood unsteadily as if a vital prop had been taken away, others saw a new force and dignity in his thin, boyish face.

"My father did not finish his speech," he said, with scathing satire in his voice; "I will finish it for him." They would have borne all the reproach he might have heaped upon them, but he only said, "Will you go back to work?" His voice began to break as he added, "My father is dead, and I want to take him home."

Not a man, woman or child but worked out their tasks that day. Ezekial Breton had triumphed.

CHAPTER XV.

A HOLIDAY.

The streets of the little village are alive with the people commonly shut up in the great mills out of sight. It was only one man dead, the world in which he moved crowded along, and if he had come back even so soon, he would have had to make a place for himself, as when he started first. Another man was born the minute he died, and the ranks were always kept full.

There was a holiday at last, and the people were the nearest they could get to holiday dress. The husbands and fathers had but few changes to make. Their aprons, if they were fortunate enough to have them, were off, and their overalls; their sleeves were rolled down, too, revealing the wear of storm and sun on the cheap stuff of which the clothes of the poor are made. But the young men had, most of them, some flashy color about their necks, and wore some threadbare black coat, with here and there a whole showy suit, bought regardless of the poverty that stared them in the face. The higher classes had taught them the lesson that a poor man can expect no consideration or respect any where, and each human creature, whose spirit is not all broken, will save his scant pennies to disguise in the livery of the prosperous the poverty that the world makes at once his misfortune and his disgrace. Most of the girls, too, had gilt or rubber jewelry in abundance, rich looking chains about their necks, and the most elaborate and massive earrings. They wore flashing ribbons of the most startling colors, and for dresses cheap flimsy imitations of the most costly stuffs.

All had gathered near the Breton mansion. The door was hung with black crape in voluminous folds. A melancholy hearse, with plumes waving the insignia of woe, was at the gate. But the faces of the multitude were happy, even gay, and the murmur of their voices had no cadence of sadness. Yet for one moment they were quiet. It was when eight bareheaded men, with awe in their faces, the awe of mortals in the presence of the grand mystery of death, came slowly out of the crape hung door bearing between them the deposed lord of the house. Then appeared at the door the face of the heir, young Philip, pale and grief stricken, and an involuntary hum of greeting met him from the people who lined the roadside and hustled the carriages in waiting. He was their hope, their trusted deliverer, their friend who had seen how hard their lives were, and had once promised to help them. His words that night of the fire had sunk deep into their hearts and been repeated from mouth to mouth, with many an addition of an eager imagination. To be sure, he had done but little to fulfill his promise. But there were the fire escapes to bear witness to his honesty, and his father, the one they were expected to mourn for, was a hard man to move. Had the young man not admitted in their meeting he was too weak to help them? Now he was untrammeled; the unquestioned owner of the Breton Mills; his wish was the sole authority henceforth, and he wished kindly to them. His word the only law throughout the great factory, and he had given his word to help them. Not a soul but believed in the dawn of a vague day of general happiness. Few had clear ideas of the elements of their long wretchedness. They thought everything was wrong in the system under which the poor were so unhappy, and the remedy that occurred to their minds was, of course, to change everything. No more long hours, no more scant pay, no more favoritism; all should have alike. No more strikes or conflicts or complaints or bitterness were dreamed of, for there would be no hardships left.

Philip thought of Bertha. At first it seemed a year since he had lost her, and he wondered with a dull ache in his heart where she could be after so long a time.

Then it seemed but an hour, so fresh was the wound in his heart. It was her place, that empty seat by his side, in this supreme moment of his desolation. She could comfort him in his loneliness, the most terrible crushing loneliness, that in the midst of a multitude. Perhaps he was weak, too weak for the stern requisitions of his destiny. Perhaps there was not enough of the sturdy element in his character. He would rather have leaned on some other brave heart than stand out alone before the world, better formed for the gentle graces of a friend than to wield undismayed the ponderous weapons of wealth and power. He would have been better to nurse the sick and comfort the fallen, than to be ordered to the front of the battle, where to be still is infamy, and to fight death to some pitied foe. And there was not one human being near or dear enough to him to instil one spark of new courage into his heart, or brighten by one smile of love the darkening desolation that seemed to have settled over his life. If Bertha had only waited another day she could not have gone. She would have staid and learned again for very pity to love him. If she had only waited another day! But no doubt the very weakness in him that cried out for her made him incapable of holding her love. It is hard to confess to oneself, his soul is too poor and small for the woman of his choice to love. But that was the depth of humiliation Philip Breton had reached as he lay back on his carriage cushions. At least he was generous to make an excuse, even at the moment of his greatest need, for the woman who had deserted him.

He heard voices from without. He had no interest in what any one in the world might say, he thought, but these words were the first words that fell upon his ear.

"Sick is it? Well, cheer up, girl, the young boss will make it all right. Yer all tired out and ye niver was fit for much anyhow."

"Will he give us doctors, too?"

"Why not? he has 'em when he's sick. It's just as right we should, as works our best for him when we're well."

Philip was fairly startled into momentary forgetfulness of his sorrow. But the carriage moved along a few feet and stopped again. Were the people mad? Was it his duty to keep a free hospital and teach the sick to come whining to him for charity, when ill? Wouldn't it spoil them, to say nothing from the business point of view? He began to sympathize more than ever with his father's perplexities, and to feel that perhaps, after all, his solution of them was the only practicable one. But he heard the rustle of a woman's dress beside his carriage where it waited.

"Isn't it splendid to have a whole holiday?" said a fresh, girlish voice.

"This isn't the last, Molly," replied a man who stood right against the carriage door. "They say we're not to work but four days a week now."

Philip frowned very unpromisingly, but the girl said:

"And how can we git along on much less wages?"

"Why, the wages will be more instead of less. I guess you don't understand."

Nor did Philip, but the carriage rolled along before the young man could explain, and stopped by another group.

"Only eight hours a day and every hand will get just the same. No more favoritism. Who told me? Why that's been the plan all along, only the old man wouldn't agree. Now it's goin' through, though."

The other man laughed. "Well, I don't see how the young boss is goin' to make the mill pay that fashion, but that's his lookout."

"Pay!" repeated the sanguine prophet. "Why those looms just turn off sheets of gold."

The horses started once more and Philip Breton sank back again on his seat. The people had cost him his bride and his father. They had wrecked his life, and cast him on a shore of barren wastes, with never one fountain of hope for his famished soul.

And now, with stupid and yet pathetic trust, they looked to him to devote his fortune and himself to them, never questioning but a word of his, a stroke of his pen, would let perpetual sunlight into their lives.

That evening he sat alone in the little study in the house that had been his father's. The house was full of solemn faced guests, but he would see none of them. He had bowed his head on his folded arms and tried to commune with the dead; his dead. There were two. One his kind, tender father, whose broad, florid face always brightened with a smile at the coming of his son. The other of his dead was a woman. He saw her as if she yet lived. What there was in this woman of all others that should have called forth such tender raptures of love he had never paused to wonder. She was not brilliant as some women. Her lips, that he believed could have spoken so wonderfully if they had cared, were oftenest closed in society. Her eyes expressed to him the rarest of noble thoughts, and it was as if she deemed the common world unworthy, but that by and by she would speak. He had thought her heart spotless white, and the texture of her nature finer and sweeter than that of all other women. Every eye that saw her must admire the threads of fine spun gold she called her hair, her soft skin as delicate to the touch as a baby's lips, and the queen like perfection of her form, a system of bold curves and lines of beauty melting into each other at their beginning and their end. But could there be any one to whom she was so much beside her beauty, for whom each phase of her thought or tone of her voice was just what seemed most fitting? And she too was gone, dead; where no prayers or cries of his could reach or touch her; dead, and yet forever alive for him.

"Will you see a lady, sir?" It was Mary, whose manner was subdued suitably to the melancholy occasion. All these trappings and pretenses provoked Philip strangely, as did the low voices of his guests and their drawn down faces. He knew well enough they didn't care so much as all that. "She is very particular, Mr. Phi——; I mean Mr. Breton."

Then he forgot his impatience in a strange, thrilling thought. He rose to his feet and walked to the window without answering the girl. Could it be Bertha had felt his hunger for her such as no other creature could have for her presence? Was it too unlikely that such pain as ached in his heart might have touched her? A throb of electricity goes around the world; might not such longing as his have reached her a few short miles away? The maid began again.

"Will you see a"——

THE GRAPE FRUIT.

An Excellent Substitute for Quinine in Malarial Diseases

Too much can not be said in praise of the pomelo or grape fruit. The mildly bitter principle which is conspicuous in the juice is undoubtedly anti-malarial, like the bitter principle of many barks and roots. And aside from its medicinal qualities, what is more refreshing than a draught of pomelo juice taken fresh and cool from the golden bowl in which nature distilled it, after a process all her own? Mr. Mott writes as follows:

I believe this valuable fruit has been neglected by our horticulturists here in Florida in their haste to find the best oranges, for surely some of the improved varieties are being much sought after by moneyed people. It is without question, one of the most wholesome fruits, and often it is eaten for its medicinal properties, and even prescribed by our physicians, by those that know of its value as a tonic and alterative medicine.

Especially is it valuable in all cases of a malarial type. For many years I have had very serious malarial troubles, and for the past several months have eaten whenever the opportunity offered freely of the grape-fruit, and I am glad to say that my health now is much better than it has been for many years, and it is a question with me whether this fruit that I am prizing so highly (for I like it as a luxury) has not had much to do with my improved health.

The many forms of the shaddock (citrus dulcamara) and its culture by the ancients is evidence of the high estimation in which it was held in the earliest times. DeConotalle says: "The number of varieties in the Malay Archipelago indicates an ancient cultivation. Its original country is not yet known."

Scientists say of it: "It is believed to be a native of Southern China; it is common in China and Cochin China, but this does not imply that it is wild there." It is in the islands to the east of the Malay Archipelago that the clearest indications of a wild existence are found. Seemann is yet more positive about the Fiji Isles. "Extremely common," he says, "and covering the banks of the rivers."

The name shaddock is the name of a captain who first introduced the species into the West Indies. I have been at a loss for its name "grape-fruit," a local name that has been given it in some foreign country. It may be from the fact that often the fruit is in clusters, similar to the habit of some kinds of grapes.

While the fruit has been grown in orange countries for ages, and perhaps it is very seldom that it has been crossed with the orange, yet it is very evident since its importation to this country that it has become hybridized with the sweet orange. That may be owing to our peculiar climate. Such a thing might occur here, that has not before in the many climes it has been cultivated in.

I have found one of these changes in Orange County. A grape fruit from an orange seed, the tree taking more the form of the orange; the fruit smaller, skin thin, very much less "rag," and in quality sweet and fine; much less of the bitter of the grape fruit; a very valuable acquisition, so much so that I have thought it proper to purchase the original tree and add it to my list of nursery trees. Have named it from the orange "aurantium pomelo."—Florida Times-Union.

An Unfinished Look.

Mrs. Worthwaite, of Murray Hill, has just moved into a new house. The parlor is beautifully fitted with the most expensive specimens of the upholsterer's art, and has a polished oak floor, only partly concealed by a few choice eastern rugs. She is entertaining a mercantile guest of her husband's.

"We think we are looking very fine in our new house, Mr. Wabash," she remarks, casually.

"Yes, indeed," responds Mr. Wabash, politely; "but it 'll look a good deal finer when you come to get your carpets down."—Harper's Bazar.

TICKET 42,758.

A Pick-Up of $15,000 by Three Well-Kown Cheyenne People.

The drawing of $15,000 from the Louisiana State Lottery by three well known Cheyenne people has created a decided sensation. The children of fortune are all employed at H. H. Elis's bakery and confectionery establishment. They are Louis Salada and wife, young Germans, and Edward P. Gaylor an old-timer who is a prominent Odd Fellow.

The lucky trio had been patrons of the lottery for several months and the realization of small sums from time to time had given them confidence in the Louisiana State Lottery. They tell a reporter for The Leader that they felt unusually confident after they had formed a pool and secured one-twentieth of ticket No. 42,758 for the July 16 drawing.

Forty-eight hours after the drawing Salada and his wife and Mr. Gaylor were overjoyed to learn from a list that ticket No. 42,758 had drawn the capital prize of $300,000 and that they were entitled to one-twentieth of that sum, or $15,000.

Advices from New Orleans confirmed the list and the money was collected through the First National Bank of this city, being paid over to the winners August 1. A number of friends who had been skeptical, or who feared that a mistake had been made, called with Mr. and Mrs. Salada and Mr. Gaylor at the bank and witnessed the payment of the $15,000 in cash.

Since the receipt of the money Mr. Gaylor has been in Denver, and it is rumored that he has intentions matrimonial.

Salada and wife are visiting relatives in Missouri. The lady, who has been an invalid for several years, is to retire to an eastern hospital for several months and will be treated by eminent specialists.—Cheyenne (Wy.) Leader, August 8.

SWEPT BY THE TIDE OF POPULARITY

To the topmost pinnacle of success, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters stands a shining proof of what genuine merit, backed by the living force of proven facts, can attain. The North and South American continents, Europe, Australia, the West Indies, Guatemala, and Mexico have all contributed wide patronage and testimony of the most favorable kind—but unsolicited—to swell the reputation of this sterling remedy. Among the maladies for which the most convincing public and professional testimony proves that it is a benign curative, are chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague and ague cake, dyspepsia, liver complaint, nervousness, debility, kidney and bladder complaints. It mitigates the infirmities of age, hastens convalescence, has a tendency to prevent ill consequences from exposure and exhaustion. Persons of sedentary habits and laborious occupations will find it an ever useful tonic.

HOW DRUNKARD'S ESCAPE.

Their Muscles Fail to Respond to the Shock of a Blow.

A few days ago a man was knocked from a trestle-work on the Cleveland, Canton & Southern railway near Cross street, by a locomotive. The train was stopped and the victim was tenderly picked up and taken to the depot. He was intoxicated and paid very little attention to the efforts being made in his behalf. At the depot he denied that he had been on the trestle and demanded to know who had taken his hat. Shortly after he was arrest on Ontario street for being drunk. He gave no evidence of pain until several hours later, and then Dr. Cole was called to attend him. The man seemed to have escaped with a few bruises, and at the Central police station it was regarded as another instance of a "drunken man's luck." While the subject was up for discussion a patrolman related the circumstances of an affair that occurred on Canal street. A drunken man had stumbled along a dark passage-way between two buildings and finally fell about twenty-five feet down a steep flight of stairs to the Valley railway tracks. He was finally discovered and carried back to Canal street to await transportation in the patrol wagon. His pulse could scarcely be detected, and the only question with those gathered about him was whether the man was already dead or would die within the next ten minutes. When landed at the station he demanded to be released, and asked whose business it was if he chose to drink a little beer. He had apparently sustained no injury by the fall. Dr. Cole related a river street case where a man fell from a three-story window upon a woman seated in front of a saloon. The doctor had been summoned in hot haste by the man's friend, but upon his arrival the victim of the fall said very indignantly that he had not sent for the physician and had no need for his services.

When asked whether there was any explanation for the uniform good fortune of drunken men in escaping injury by accident, Dr. Cole said it was due to a lack of interest in their fate. In falling the body is limp and lifeless, while that of a sober man would probably be very nearly rigid. In the case of the latter a blow upon any part of the body would be followed by instantaneous contraction of the muscles, having perhaps nearly as much force as the blow itself. It was stated by the physician that often the sudden and violent contraction of the muscles caused by a blow furnished nearly half the force exerted to produce the fracture of a bone. A drunken man's muscles, it was explained, would not respond in a similar way to the shock of the blow, and he would naturally escape that element of danger.—Cleveland Leader.

MARRYING HOUSE-KEEPERS.

A Growing Preference for Who Can Make Home Pleasant.

How did it come about? is a question now asked in regard to the marriage of a popular writer. The same question was asked five years ago when a society man in Boston married a sensible home body, some years his senior. The croakers croaked well, and decided that it was an unfortunate affair or would turn out to be in the end. George Eliot says that this love of "finding out how it came about" is due to "an excess of poetry or stupidity." I don't know as that is just fair, but I do think when a marriage is contrary to established rules, croakers are stupid, and fortunately are often in the wrong in their prophecy. It is written that when a marriage was about to take place King James used to ask: "What is the woman's makdom and her fairness?" The days of "infatuations" are now giving place to a keen outlook in the direction of personal comfort; makdom and fairness stand one side and the question to be answered first, Will this woman make my home restful to me, and will she live on what I can earn? Subtle has been the process that has led to this gradual change, but a change has come.

The brilliant society man referred to is now a regular stay-at-home, for the simple reason his home is as perfect as a home can be made to be. The sunniest, brightest room in the house is his sanctum; here are his favorite books, pictures he likes, the latest magazines, leaves cut, and no end of pipes. When the train whistles into the depot, in which is this fortunate man, a fire is started on the low hearth to make the room cheerful although the warmth is not needed.

To this room he brings his friends, and here husband and wife sit when alone. Every thing that will help his wife to make home a means of grace she reads, on her table are always to be found books and magazines that talk of the higher life of the home. I mean good cooking when I say higher life; a hitherto much neglected part of religion.

This man, formerly out every evening, rarely goes to theater or opera, party or ball, because his home has greater attractions, and he is really now so sensible, well-informed, and amounting to something that his friends are rejoiced that the seemingly incongruous marriage came about.

When I was asked what I considered the reason of this transformation, I answered: "Clean, well-aired rooms, good food, and a wife who is more anxious to be what a German writer calls 'a serene house-wife,' than to keep her weather-eye out to see if she will ever get her rights and vote."—Good Housekeeping.

THE HORSE AT REST.

Curious Facts About the Disposition of Horses to Lie Down.

To a hard-working horse repose is almost as great a necessity as good food, but tired as he may be he is often shy about lying down, even when a bed of nice clean straw is provided for him. The writer once rode a mare seventy miles in a single day. The stable in which she was put for the night was as comfortable in every way as it could be made, but she stood the whole night through. She ate her oats and hay and then went to sleep, leaning forward with her breast against the manger. There are horses that have never been seen to lie down, and if they have ever done so it was only for a short time, and at an hour when they were likely to be seen. No marks have ever been discovered upon their coats which would indicate that they had ever been lying down. A horse is recalled now that occupied for fifteen years, from the time he was two years old, the first stall in grandfather's stable. Up to the hour he died no one had ever seen him lying down, and several times after wearisome drives of about eight or ten hours, a watch was placed on him to see if during the night he would lie down; but he was never caught in that position, and he could not be tempted to recline by the sweetest and cleanest of bedding. He died literally upon his feet. He was taken sick, and in giving him a drench from a long-necked bottle, with his head pulled up to a beam, he suddenly fell back and expired.

Unless a horse lies down regularly his rest can not be complete, and his joints and sinews stiffen; and, while it is true that horses that sleep in a standing position continue to work for many years, it is equally true that they would continue to work for many years longer, and perform their work much better, if they rested naturally. Young horses from a country stable may refuse to lie down when put into a stable in town, and the habit may become confirmed unless inducements are offered. Horses can be taught to lie down, and they can also be taught to be as neat and cleanly in their habits as individuals.

It is a very rare thing for horses afflicted with a disease that superinduces fever to lie down. They will stand up until nature becomes completely exhausted, and their limbs refuse to sustain them. They have an instinct which teaches them if they lie down it may be difficult for them to get upon their feet again. A sick horse, because of his evident knowledge of his own condition and his inability to communicate the symptoms and the nature of it, commends himself to human sympathy more than any other animal. Horses have a horror of death, and especially dread death in their own kind. A horse may be sick in company with a stableful of horses, and the others will not notice him at al, but the moment he dies there is consternation throughout the entire stable. A horse may be absolutely fearless of every inanimate thing that comes to his notice, but will be frightened beyond measure at the sight of one of his own kind lying dead by the roadside.—Horses and Stable.

ROBBED BY WEEDS.

The Difference Between Two Pieces of Farm Land Described by a Traveler.

I have in mind two pieces of corn growing contiguously, only the line fence between the fields indicating the ownership of the two pieces. The quality of land is evidently the same in both and the corn on both pieces had grown to about the same height. There was apparently but little difference in the two fields at the time the spindles began to show in the stalks. But really there was this difference—one received frequent and careful cultivation with a view to destroy all weed growth; the other had only superficial manipulation of the soil. The careful hand which had with great painstaking—and this kind goeth not out without such—sought to eradicate root and branch of these troublesome "tenants-at-will" in one piece was wanting in the other. The weather now came on dry and hot. The corn in the clean rows spread itself like a green bay tree, and held on wonderfully late into the season before the leaves rolled or gave much evidence that the dry weather was telling upon it. In the other lot a carpet of green weeds in the shape of barnyard grass, Roman wormwood, sorrel and smartweed sprang up between the rows, and not only purloined the nutriment of the soil, but what was of full as much consequence to the corn plants, drank in the moisture afforded by dews and scant showers and with their network of fibrous, surface-feeding roots imbibed the moisture from the soil, and practically throttled the corn on its own ground, and set its leaves curling three weeks before the others, stunting its growth and diminishing the crop fully one-half below that of the clean-kept field.—Massachusetts Ploughman.

But it would be greatly the gainer if the old truths were enforced from newer points of view, if the treatment of texts were less mechanical, if the style were less conventional, if the range of topics was as full of variety as the Scriptures themselves—if, in a word, it were more interesting."

CONSTRUCTION OF SILOS.

Suggestions Offered at the Cleveland Ensilage Convention.

At the recent Ensilage Convention in Cleveland a vote was taken on building silos; twelve voted for double boarding with lath and plaster, three for double boarding with tarred paper and seven for only one thickness of matched narrow lumber on the inside of studding. Great care should be taken to have the walls of the silo smooth and vertical so that the ensilage shall settle evenly. It is better to build too large than too small; have a good height, but avoid the deep caverns from which the ensilage must be raised by machinery.

The dimensions of the last silo built at the college are 18x30x22, with a partition in the center, making two silos each 15x18 outside measurement; total capacity about 200 tons. The walls are made of 2x12 studding one foot apart and well tied by strong iron rods running from side to side. On the outside ordinary stock boards battened and painted made the finish. On the inside the studding was first covered with culls put on horizontally. On these a layer of tarred paper, then a second covering of boards put on perpendicularly. Doors open from each silo into the feeding rooms adjacent.

A cheaper form, often used and recommended by others, is made with 2x8 or 10 studding, set 16 inches apart, weather boarding on the outside and the inside made as above, with two thicknesses of inch boards, with tarred paper between them, nailed on the studding. Wooden silos should be firmly fastened together to resist the heavy lateral pressure caused by the settling and weight inside. It is said that any crop suitable for feeding in its green state will make good ensilage, but the corn plant is manifestly superior to any other. Here again there has been a change in opinion and practice. Formerly it was put into the silo very green. It is now known that it should be more mature, and not be cut for ensilage until the ears begin to glaze. Thick seeding for ensilage and spindling stalks without ears, have been disregarded. Cutting into short lengths is preferable. Occasionally, but rarely, corn has been put in uncut.

There are still some unsettled points about ensilage. At the first rapid filling was advocated; then came a change of opinion, and the theory was advanced that if the silo was filled slowly and its contents allowed to heat up to 120 or 130 degrees the germs that cause fermentation would be destroyed. This theory of making sweet ensilage by slow filling has been generally accepted and practiced for a few years; but there are some very intelligent dissenters who believe the bacteria are not killed at 130 degrees, but are at their best at that temperature, and that the improved condition of ensilage for two or three years past is due to ensilaging corn when more nearly matured than formerly, rather than to slow filling. Ensilage should be weighted moderately and covered in such a way as to exclude the air as much as possible, but extra heavy weighting is not now considered necessary.—N. Y. World.

How to Feed the Ducks.

The duck egg is very large and rich, and it naturally follows that there must be a variety and sufficient quantity of the best food. Let the morning meal be a thoroughly cooked mixture of bran, ground oats, corn-meal and some kind of vegetables, like boiled potatoes, turnips, beets and carrots. Give the mash in the proportion of four parts bran, two parts ground oats and one part corn-meal. Occasionally add a handful of ground oyster shells and ground bone, with three or four handfuls of ground beef scraps or dessicated fish. A pint of gluten meal, cottonseed meal or linseed meal, mixed with the other feed, to twenty-five ducks, will be found very beneficial. At noon feed whole oats and wheat, and at night whole corn in cold weather, and give an abundance of pure water at all times. Laths tacked over the feeding and drinking troughs will prevent wast of grain and water. Buttermilk is also excellent for laying ducks. When this plan of feeding is followed, you may expect the number of eggs will nearly equal the total number of layers, and you will get eggs that will hatch.—Farm and Home.

DISEASES IN BOOKS.

How Boston Will Guard Against Them by Quarantine Measures.

A new departure which the Boston health authorities have made as a measure for preventing the spread of disease is so palpably wise that other cities will doubtless be quick to adopt it. It has long been recognized that library books of the circulating description were an admirable medium for conveying contagious and infectious complaints from house to house. When people are sick they can only amuse themselves with reading, and no sooner do they fall ill than the nearest library is drawn upon for volumes of entertaining fiction, etc. During their perusal, germs of a dangerous nature, set afloat by the patient's breath or otherwise, are apt to lodge between the leaves, to be taken in by subsequent readers. Some of these obnoxious bacilli retain their vitality for quite a while, so that one can never be sure when he takes out a library book that he is not making a bid for a variety of physical ailments from scarlet fever to mumps. As a partial precaution against this the Boston Board of Health will hereafter cause the public library card in each family where a communicable disease is found to exist to be stamped, so as to indicate the presence of infection or contagion there. The library will thereafter allow no books to be taken out on this card until the trouble is officially reported as gone. Furthermore, when books are returned from a house where such disease has appeared they will be carefully disinfected before being reissued. This system is expected to reduce the number of deaths from diphtheria and other complaints of the sort by an appreciable percentage annually; for this is the greatest reading community in the world, and it is supplied with books mainly by the public library here, which is a gigantic institution with branches in every part of the city.

In other ways, too, the library board will do its best to keep its books in a healthy condition as soon as its new building is ready for occupancy. The "stack system" will be used there. By it no display at all is made of the volumes, which are simply placed on iron shelves, back to back, with just enough room between the bookcases to make a narrow passage-way. The offices and reading-rooms will be in another part of the building, and no heat will be admitted, winter or summer, to the apartments where the books are kept. Thus they can be kept cold, with plenty of fresh air. Both these points are desirable, for heat makes books decay and bad air causes mold and rot. Being on iron shelves they can not well burn. Books of themselves can not well be set afire; they will only smolder. It is likely that the Governor of the State will call on the militia to execute the colossal task of transporting the 500,000 volumes from the old library to the new.—Boston Letter.

FUNNY MARK TWAIN.

Anecdotes Showing That His Humor Is Not Confined to His Writings.

Mark Twain at home is not more serious than his writings would lead one to expect. He has always been fond of perpetrating jokes for which his wife has only of late years, through practical education, been able to prepare herself.

When, for instance, Mr. Clemens, on the lecture platform, once drew out a dilapidated handkerchief, worn to shreds, and after gazing at it in an astonished fashion, apologized, saying that he had been "obliged to borrow one from Mr. ——," naming some important personage of the town, his wife, sitting with a friend in the audience, has turned to her neighbor in the most distressed way and said:

"People will think I do not properly take care of my husband's clothes."

It is true that Mr. Clemens has no tendency toward dudishness, and that he sometimes appears in a costume more befitting a poor author than a publisher-millionaire; but every body has his taste! He is careless and absent-minded, and sometimes forgets some of the requirements of the age for the embellishment of mankind.

At any rate, he is said to have called upon Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe without a necktie one day after her return from the South. When he came back from his visit he hurried to his wife to tell her how their neighbor had withstood the journey and of the present condition of her health. But he was stopped in the midst of his story by the horrified look in his wife's face.

"You don't mean to say that you have been to see Mrs. Stowe?" said she. "Why, you haven't got on any necktie."

He professed great chagrin at his carelessness and rushed up stairs, apparently to remedy the defect in his toilet. When he came back, some time later, he laughingly tossed his wife a letter and a necktie.

It seems that Mr. Clemens had written to Mrs. Stowe in his own inimitable fashion that as he had found he had committed the unpardonable crime of calling on her without a necktie he now sent her one, hoping to mitigate the sentence which she would pass upon him for his carelessness. The note which he handed his wife was a clever reply which Mrs. Stowe had sent back with the necktie.—Toledo Blade.

—It is believed by naturalists that partridges never indulge in more than twelve eggs for a "setting," and consequently the Smithsonian Institute has for several years offered a reward of ten dollars for a partridge's nest containing more than a dozen eggs. Recently a party of Worchester girls pulled down the purse by presenting a nest containing fifteen eggs.

THE TURTLE'S HOME.

An Immense Rendezvous of the Reptiles on an Orinoco Island.

In the northern part of the South American continent, but a few hundred miles from the Atlantic coast, there lies a range of great mountains, or rather several ranges of mountains, which have been for many years practically an unexplored region. These are the mountains lying between the basins of the Orinoco and Amazon rivers, and between Brazil on the southward and Guinea and Venezuela on the northward. They are known to contain several lofty cataracts, and other physical features of great interest.

The Sierra Parima, a mountain range and plateau lying wholly within the republic of Venezuela, has lately been explored for the first time by a European, by M. Chaffanjon, a French geographer. He traced the sources of the Orinoco river to a little torrent which falls in a series of cascades from one of the mountains of the Parima.

One of the features of interest which M. Chaffanjon describes in his account of his journey was an immense rendezvous of turtles, which had gathered for the purpose of laying their eggs, on the little island of Buena Vista, in the Orinoco.

"Many turtles are to be encountered," M. Chaffanjon says, "all along the Orinoco, but at this island of Buena Vista, where nature seems to have arranged every thing for their convenience, their number is very great. The island is about a league in length and surrounded by sloping banks of sand. In this fine sand the turtles deposit their eggs, which are hatched by the heat of the sun.

"Some time in the month of February thousands of turtles come out upon the shore of the island as well as upon the neighboring banks of the river, and begin promenading up and down as if ascertaining whether it is entirely safe to lay their eggs. But they do not begin laying until March. Then they dig a number of little holes in the sand, in which each female deposits from eighty to one hundred and twenty eggs."

The French traveler observed the habits of these animals by hiding himself, wrapped in his blanket, behind a hillock of sand close to the edge of the river. A little after nightfall the turtles began coming out of the water, proceeding very cautiously, holding their heads erect and waiting long, as if they feared the approach of their human enemies. By-and-by, as if reassured, they came out in great numbers, and began sporting about the sand.

The half-breed Indians who accompanied M. Chaffanjon assured him, however, that the turtles would not begin to lay their eggs until the Southern Cross, which is the characteristic object of the firmament in the Southern hemisphere, was completely formed—that is, not until the four stars which form the cross had moved on through the heavens, until they were perpendicular with the horizon.

In fact, at midnight the great mass of the turtles had gone back into the river without laying, leaving but a few of their companions behind them to act as sentinels. But at half-past two in the morning, at the moment when the Southern Cross seemed exactly perpendicular with the horizon, a great fluttering was perceived on the shore of the river; the turtles were coming out in battalions.

They scattered rapidly in every direction, digging up the sand, laying their eggs and covering them over again, and apparently taking great pains to leave the surface looking as they found it.

M. Chaffanjon and his companions captured three of these turtles, the shell of one of which measured eighty-five inches in length by twenty-three in width. Its weight was more than sixty-seven pounds.

The natives capture large numbers of the eggs of these turtles, as well as of the creatures themselves, which are used in the manufacture of a kind of oil.

The appearance of the turtles upon the beach at the apparent moment of the complete formation the Southern Cross, on each night during their laying season, is undoubtedly due to coincidence, and the supestitious natives connect the two circumstances, just as the ancient Egyptians connected the setting of the constellation Arcturus with the rising of the Nile.—Youth's Companion.

The Nature of Mushrooms.

It is a curious thing that concerning the mushroom, which is to be found everywhere in such abundance, and which would make so valuable an article of food if properly used, Americans are generally so ignorant that as a rule they can not tell it from a toadstool; and although nearly every Irishwoman can bring in a basket of mushrooms out of hand, even then many are afraid to eat them. Certain people will claim that any thing with gills—parallel edges lining all the under side—is edible, but will not eat it themselves; others claim that the gill must be of a particular color. These will have only the mushroom grown in a cellar, those only the mushroom grown with nothing between it and the sky. The mushroom loved in Italy is rejected in England, and the best English mushroom of all is regarded in Italy as of the same nature as the evil-eye. It would be well worth while to have some instruction made common as to the general nature of this growth, the innocence of some species and the deleterious quality of others.—San Francisco Argonaut.

—An odd scene occurred the other day in two hay fields not an eighth of a mile a part in Lancaster, Pa. In one all work was stopped for the day by a pouring rain, while in the other not a drop fell all day.

ORIGIN OF ENGLAND'S SA

The Dried-Up Bays from Which Country Obtains Her Supplies.

Our English salt supply is chiefly rived from the Cheshire and Worce shire salt regions, which are of tri age. Many of the places at wh salt is mined have names en wich, such as Northwich, Midd Nantwich, Droitwich, Netherwic Shirleywich. This termination itself curiously significant, as Mr. Taylor has shown, of the necessary co nect on between salt and the sea. Th earliest known way of producing was of course in shallow pans o sea-shore, at the bottom of called in Norse and early wick or wich; and the materi duced is still known in tr salt. By and by, when pe discover the inland brine mines, they transferred familiar name, a wich where the salt was m to be known as wy wich, for example, a wich, where the dr were paid at the tim Conqueror's com the great survey But the good easy-go ple who gave these quain inland wiches had pro that they were really a up bays, and tha mined from their ancient bay salt old inland sea ev grees a countless exactly as the Dea Salt Lake are getti own time.

Such, nevertheless, case. A good-sized Cas spread across the cent and north of Ireland i bounded here and the Hull can make out, by ains, the Cheviots and and with the Peak of I Isle of Man standing islands from its blu like most other inland British Caspian began and to shrivel away to ever smaller mensions. In Devonshire, where it appears to have first dried up, we got no salt, but only red marl, with here and there a cubical cast, filling a hole once occupied by rock-salt, though the percolation of the rain has long since melted out that very soluble substance and replaced it by a mere mold in the characteristic square shape of salt crystals. But Worcestershire and Cheshire we the seat of the inland sea when it ha contracted to the dimensions of a mer salt lake and begun to throw down dissolved saline materials. One of Cheshire beds is sometimes a hundr feet thick of almost pure and crystalline rock salt. The absence of fossils show that animals must have had as bad time of it there as in the Dead Se our modern Palestine.

The Droitwich brine pits ha known for many centuries, since were worked (and taxed) even be Norman conquest, as were man similar wells elsewhere. But al mining of rock salt, as su gland, dates back only as far as of King Charles II., or more to the very year in which th grim's Progress" was conceiv written by John Bunyan. During particular summer, an enterp person at Nantwich had sunk a for coal, which he failed to find; on his way down he came unexpec across the bed of rock salt, then first time discovered as a native al. Since that fortunate accident beds have been so energetically work and the springs so energetically pumpe that some of the towns built on top o them have got undermined, and no threaten from year to year, in the mo literal sense, to cave in. In fact, or two subsidences of considerable tent have already taken place, du part, no doubt, to the dissolving action of rain water, but in part also to the mode of working. The mines are approached by a shaft; and when you get down to the level of the old sea bottom, you find yourself in a sort of artificial gallery, whose roof, with all the world on top of it, is supported every here and there by massive pillars, about fifte feet thick. Considering that the sal ies often a hundred and fifty yards deep, and that these pillars have to bear the weight of all that depth of so rock, it is not surprising that sub dences should sometimes occur abandoned shafts, where the water allowed to collect, and slowly dissol away the supporting columns.—Corn hill Magazine.

BUTTONS.

Their Manufacture, Styles and the Materials Used.

The making of a button is by no means as simple a thing as one might believe. A metal button, for instance, passes through six or seven hands and as many different processes. The material—steel, brass or white metal, as may be—comes to the shop in long rolls. These are first cut into squares of a convenient shape and then put through the cutting machine, coming out as a plain disc. If a raised button is to be made the disc is stamped and is then ready for the lower disc and the eyelets. After being polished it is put into the hands of the electroplater, whence it emerges at last an orthodox button.

Engraved buttons are much more expensive than the stamped or molded ones, as the engraving is mostly done by hand. All kinds of fantastic tracery is indulged in. Fashion rules supreme in buttons as well as in hats and handkerchiefs. Last year the Parisan belles adorned their walking-coats with bronze pigs and birds, and the swells who rode in Hyde Park fastened their redingotes with racing hounds or yelping puppies. The reign of animals seems to be over now, and flowers, Byzantine scrolls and Egyptian heads have taken their place.

Bone and wood have lost caste, but jet and the imitations of it, out of which Victor Hugo's convict hero made his fortune, are still considered good form. Satin and silk buttons, painted, fluffed or embroidered, are in demand for full dress.—Chicago Tribune.

TOILERS OF THE RIVER.

ARACTERISTICS OF THE INLAND RIVER FISHERMEN.

of a People That Enjoy Life in Out of Season—Something About Methods of Catching Red Horse, Cats and Buffaloes.

When the snows have melted off the mountains and the waters have become warmer; when the buds of the red stemmed water maples that line the banks of the rivers, and streams begin to swell and when the warming influ- the sun draws out the "frost" bluff sides, and the first spring occur; then the river fishermen ir work.

Some of them occupy the winter months in rogressional hunt- ls, quails, turtle cks, geese, water ns, sparrows and a ds, which, if known ame, would not be rved up fictitiously, are dingly, are the victims of less hunters.

G AND NETTING.

pal occupation of this s I have said before, what is called a "trot people are unfamiliar of fishing I will ex- of a long tar enameled ut a quarter of an inch ckness, and it reaches across, or nearly across, the river. Dangling from it, at a distance of a yard or so apart, are short linen lines or linking. These are supplied with one or more hooks, each of varying sizes. One fisherman generally has four or five such lines, and with a dip net and catch net his outfit is mplete. The dip net is a fine meshed ntrivance, with a frame shaped like he letter D, the part of the frame corre- sponding to the perpendicular stroke in e letter resting on the ground. The t is shoved up the mouths of springs, ecks, branches, etc., and is designed to ake in all crawfish, minnows and other nfortunate small fry which unluckily ll in the way. The catch net is an in- with the use of which nearly s familiar.

best and favorite bait is small, crawfish, or "crawa," as they are These the giant red horse, the d sun perch, the mud cats, the g buffalo and their kindred of tribe take with avidity. An- on for the popular use of this r bait is the fact that it cannot ed off by the sundry minnows, nd molly hogs that always in- baited grounds. Tad poles, bull gs, molly hogs, rot guts, grubs, grass- pers and eel meat all make very ing bait.

e fish, as for instance the buffalo e red horse, require a special line a special hook. The buffalo line is rt and very strong, and is provided ith specially made buffalo hooks. The d horse always swallows the bait, and e it needs a very slender hook. The as a rule, are very expert in ssion.

unter and trapper make wood- a fine art. They have the habits and peculiarities of the river designers. They know the singular traits of the black perch; have watched and studied he drum in all characteristic doings. They listen, perhaps, with a pleasurable motion to his weird yet realistic drum- ing under the gliding keel of the wl. They are naturalists in a true ense of the word.

FRESH WATER PEARLS.

People who have dealings with coun- storekeepers may have noticed a eheat on their letter heads, to the ect that they buy and sell fresh water arls. The river fishermen are the men at collect this new article of com- merce. In some counties in the "back ry" statistics show that the pearl- dustry has done more to enrich counties than any other com- ce.

The fishermen choose a mussel bed of the desired quality and then begin the work of opening mussels. The most favorable localities are generally in the neighborhood of fine sand and shallow water. The pearl is formed, according to the discovery of the river naturalists, by fine sand, working in between the glands of the mussel's biceps which produces a secretion that ultimately results in a pearl. A perfect pearl is smooth, opaque and hard. Their value depends upon their clearness and "grain."

The fisherman himself, however, is more worthy our attention. His optimism is ever topmost; his good nature and jollity are characteristic. Times may be hard with the bricklayer, the carpenter, and the farmer, and the markets are always open for fish, and when an unseasonable time comes, he knows of its coming, and can, if he wish, prepare for it.

Sometimes you will find a fisherman who is not o'er honest, who merits, perhaps, the old couplet:

Fish'man dance, and fish'man sing,
All fish'man steal mos' any little thing.

And such are not rare exception either.

But they stick to their professions with a persistency that is not easily understood, and their wives and children are, as a rule, well cared for.—Beverly Edward Cummings in Atlanta Sunny South.

DIED.

BISHOP—At Reno, Nevada, October 11th, 1888, Simeon Ira Bishop, aged 21 years and 5 months.

He was with us but a short time, but in that short time we learned to love him as only a parent can, Suffering as he constantly was, yet, he was good-natured, kind, and generous to a fault. The sorrowing relatives have our heartfelt sympathy, in this, their hour of grief.

The Elliott case has cost this county $3,400.

White Smith has been appointed Deputy District Attorney.

Robt. O'Neil, of Bishop, was in town on Wednesday.

I H. and Mary Mulholland left for Los Angeles last Tuesday.

After November 1st the road poll tax will be three dollars.

Several drummers have visited Independence during the week.

Mr. Matthews, of San Francisco, is making Independence a business call.

Clem Ogg and John Hughes, an old Inyoite, were in town last Wednesday.

Crocker Bros., of Big Pine, have built nine miles of fencing on their property.

Hon. M. M. Estee was re-elected Grand Master, of the Masonic Grand Lodge of California.

Sheriff Eldred has gone to Death Valley on official business, and will not return for ten days.

The Assessment Roll for this year (exclusive of special school taxes) foots up $38,767.37.

Mr. Maxon, of the firm of Maxon & Ackley, Sacramento, is spending a few days in Independence and vicinity.

C. Mulholland, of. Independence, was appointed Grand Senior Steward at the recent meeting of the Masonic Grand Lodge.

Those who attended the Bishop Fair speak very highly of the treatment which they received at the hands of the people of that thriving place.

Bishop may well be proud of her new public school house. It is a splendid building, and speaks volumes for the intelligence of that community.

Hon. M. M. Estee is making an earnest effort to bring the delegates to the Pan-American Congress to this coast, and it is devoutly to be hoped he will succeed.

Now that a start has been made in that direction, many dollars of Eastern capital will be invested in building flumes and establishing irrigation districts in the West.

The tourist hotels of Switzerland get an annual revenue of $10,000,000. The time is not far distant when the tourist hotels of Southern California will exceed that sum.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence at 11 a. m.

Several parties in the valley have traded horses for wagons, harness, etc., with Mr. Maxon, of Sacramento. Mr. Maxon will drive out about 150 head so taken in exchanges.

Los Angeles wants that beet sugar refinery that Mr. Spreckles proposes to build and there should be no trouble in securing a guarantee of twice the acreage he asks for.—Los Angeles Tribune.

Gus Walker has taken a relapse. The other two men are steadily improving. Dr. Woodin went down again Thursday to attend them. He says he will pull them through all right.

Supervisor Robinson, who inspected the new bridge across Owens River at Big Pine a few days ago, states that the bridge is about finished and that contractor Hampton has done a first-class job.

Attention is called to Nathan Rhine's column advertisement in this issue. Mr. Rhine carries one of the largest and best stocks of general merchandise to be found on this side of the mountains.

Many letters are being received by residents of Southern California from friends in the East asking for information about this section. These inquiries are the forerunners of a personal visit.—Tribune.

San Diego's first train load of raisins consisting of twelve cars from the El Cajon Valley was sent out over the Santa Fe yesterday, consigned to Chicago. Who said the city of "bay'n climate" had no back country?—Tribune.

At the last session of the Legislature a law was passed making it optional with the Tax Collector to visit the various townships to collect taxes, unless the Board of Supervisors, on or before the first Monday in October, direct that the taxes must be collected in the several townships of the county. No order was made this year, therefore the Collector can insist on having all taxes paid at his office.

A WONDERFUL COLT.

Axtell trots a mile in 2:12.

At Terre Haute, Indiana, Oct. 11th, the famous horse Axtell made a mile in 2:12. When it is done by a three-year-old stallion at a trotting gait it means a record that will stand for many a day. It means the acme of physical endurance, courage and all that goes to make the king of all horses. The fourth day of the fall meeting brought out a crowd as large and enthusiastic as ever a perfect Indian summer shown upon, to witness an event that one is fortunate to witness in a lifetime—the great Axtell to beat the 3-year-old record (2:13¾) held by he California filly Sunol.

When brought out for the warming up heat he moved with such freedom and determination that but few thought he could stand, but that would knock one and three-quarter seconds from it the wildest enthusiast did not dream. George Starr was behind Father John as a helper. Williams nodded for the word at the second attempt, and the great flight was begun with that smooth action for which Axtell is noted.

The first quarter was reached in 33. The clip is made faster to the half in 1,05-¼. "Too fast" says Colonel Conley, and a sigh goes up from the crowd as it is felt that the drive is made too soon. Still the game colt goes on faster and faster. 32¼ is the gait at the three-quarters post, with never a falter. He breasts the hill and turns into the stretch. A shout goes up "He will do it." On he comes and without a wabble or false stroke, he finished the mile, strong in 2:12. Thus, at one stroke he reduced the 3 year-old record one and three-quarters seconds: also the record for stallions of all ages.

Colonel Conley, of Chicago, has purchased the great trotting stallion Axtell, for $105,000. It is supposed that he represents a syndicate. This is the highest price ever paid in the world for a horse of any description. It is understood the great colt will go into Budd Doble's stable.

Barbecue.

The Barbecue given by the Pioneers at Bishop last Saturday was a pronounced success. Between one and two o'clock the procession formed; headed by the Bishop Band, after them the Pioneers, then the Native Sons, followed by the citizens and their families. The procession marched from the Main street to Munzinger and Philippey's grove where the exercises took place. The opening address was made by the Hon. S. G. Sneden, in which he gave a brief sketch of the Pioneers of the valley. He was listened to with marked attention by the large crowd that was present. P. W. Forbes, Esq. followed with a few pleasant words of advice for the benefit of the Native Sons and Daughters, which, if carried out, will gain for them the confidence and respect of all mankind. The remarks of both gentlemen were highly appreciated as was evidenced by frequent interruptions of applause. After the speaking and music by the Band, all present were invited to take part in the feast. Of good things there was enough and to spare; and every one seemed highly pleased with the Old Pioneers.

Lower California.

The report comes from Washington that the scheme to purchase the peninsula of Lower California, from Mexico, is being revived. When the Senate Irrigation Committee was making its tour of inspection it found that the great Yuma Desert could all be irrigated and made productive by turning on the water from the Colorado River. It further discovered that the water could only be turned on some twelve miles below the Mexican line. The committee also learned that the only practical way to accomplish the reclamation of the more than 2,000,000 acres would be for this country to acquire Lower California; and it is asserted that they will recommend the purchase to Congress. Lower California ought by right to belong to the United States. It is entirely isolated from the remainder of Mexico. Its direct connection is with this State. For many years considered a barren waste, it is now known to be rich in minerals of all kinds, and its purchase would be even more profitable than was that of Alaska.—Los Angeles Tribune.

"Kicked the Bucket"

On the morning of October 10th at Beowawe, Nevada, at about 6 o'clock the dead body of a stranger was found by Henry Egbert hanging in the barn of the Cortez Stage Company. The man was about forty years old, had black hair and a full, dark beard. He was about four feet eight inches tall, of medium build, and appearently of German descent. There were no papers or marks found to identify him. In order to accomplish the suicide the man took a small bale rope and fastened it to a cross-beam overhead, then he stood up on a tin bucket and adjusted a slipnoose around his neck and kicked the bucket from under him. The decision of the Coroner's jury was that suicide was committed by "kicking the bucket."

Finger Amputated.

Some time ago A. D. Gilbert's right hand came in contact with a certain Mexican's teeth, thereby cutting the third finger. Blood poisoning set in and in order to save his arm he had Drs. Woodin amputate the finger.

Geo. M. Gill, Esq., and family leave today (Saturday) for Stockton. Mr. Gill's health is very poor but he thinks a change of climate and medical treatment will help him. We sincerely hope they may.

Thomas Twaddle, of Daggett, has sued the Cook Springs M. & M. Company for $2852 50. This company owns the property formerly owned and worked by the Ibex M. & M. Co., and is situated in Death Valley.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid is said to be growing restive at the French capital, and will probably not retain his post of Minister to France upwards of a year, being anxious to get back to his paper. This is a forcible illustration of the charms of journalism.

"There is no question as to the location of the Fair at Independence having been a mistake, so far as the convenience of the people of Alpine and Mono are concerned. The location of District Fairs should be as central as possible, for the convenience of the greater number. The selection of a site for the permanent location of the Fair should not have been made until the people of Alpine and Mono had been consulted. The place of residence of a majority of the Directors should cut no figure in such matters. Both the above named counties would prefer Bishop to Independence, it being fifty miles nearer and in the best part of Inyo county. As the Directors have gone to considerable expense for permanent improvements at Independence the Directors should hold their Fairs at Bishop and Independence, alternately, as we have often recommended. This would insure a better feeling among the Inyoites and make the 18th District Fairs more successful. Try it, friends, and "Let us have peace."—Chronicle-Union.

The Breton Mills

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy, and published by arrangement with him.]

"Yes, yes; show her in." How wild he was to-night. Why Bertha was married to the man she had chosen, long ago; if she came back, what comfort for him? If she were not happy with this man after all! Oh, God save her from such a fate, since he had paid such a price that she might be happy. God forbid that all his torment be for nothing. Philip was rapidly walking the room. But supposing—and his heart stopped beating at the thought—she not married and had come back to after all—what other woman would him now—what then, could he for-

[illegible]le agitated and hastened you are surprised to see [illegible]t"—

"I know you are surprised to see me."

"Do not distress yourself," he said gravely, recovering his self possession. Was this his first visit of condolence, and so soon?

"It was about Miss Bertha." Then she caught her breath and went on as if she were afraid he would interrupt her, he started so violently. "I know what a lover you are—if mine had only been like you;" she dropped her eyes and went on without looking at him, "but the girl you liked so much that you were blind to how mean she was, she never loved you; she never cared anything for you."

Philip had moved uneasily in his chair as she began, but now he sat still as death, with his eyes fixed, as if in some fatal charm, on the girl's face. She grew pale as she talked, all but one bright spot in either cheek.

"I could tell it when your name was spoken before her; women notice things like that—and when she expected you—and when she expected the other."

His eyes fell in shame. He wished a mountain would fall on him to shield his hurt face from this poor girl's scrutiny. But she [illegible]s if she took pleasure in his wince- "If you could have seen how her [illegible]at his coming, and her voice, so shook and stumbled when she And how her hands would [illegible]tten in his—at a look. "[illegible] not stand this," he cried, starting to [illegible] feet. "Do you think I am made of stone?"

"Wasn't it a pretty sight? I used to love to hang out of my window to see it, or follow her out on Sunday walks. Her kind of women make the biggest fools of themselves; so cold and lofty like you would think them angels; when all of a sudden they lose their heads, and there's nothing too wild for them to do for some man, till they get over it." Her eyes were all ablaze with hate, but Philip hung on the scornful lips as if it were not poison he drank from them.

"But she did not get over it," he faltered when she stopped. He raised his hands to his beating temples; his fingers were cold

"[illegible]t is it; it lasted longer than I counted on. I thought she'd come to her senses before she could do anything rash. And then I supposed he wouldn't leave the village and what he was doing here, just yet."

"But why didn't you tell me?"

"What could you have done? She cared nothing for you. But I was doing the best I knew, if they hadn't been too quick for me. I was waiting till I thought she was just mad over the man. I never supposed they would be so quick;" her bosom rose and fell as if it were hard for her to catch her breath. "I knew one thing was sure, and when it would hurt me the most I was going to have tried it. If [illegible]d only hurried." She rose, sobbing [illegible]ntly, but she shed no tears. Philip had [illegible]onsideration for her emotion.

"What was it? oh, why didn't you do it?" His form trembled as if he stood in a winter's blast, while drops of perspiration gathered on his forehead.

"I—I—hated so to—to break his heart. I—I knew he would—would never get over it. He ain't the kind that"—

"Curse him!" cried Philip, "what is he to me?"

"I was going to tell him that she was engaged to you. I knew he would never forgive her for deceiving him."

"And he didn't know it?"

"Ah, if he had, he was that honest—you don't know him. But I was too slow, and now, my God, my God!" Then she rose to her feet and tied her veil tightly about her face and moved toward the door. But Philip Breton was there before and held it.

"Tell me first what you came here for to-night?" The answer came sharp as a knife.

"Because I wanted to make you hate that woman too. It made me mad that you should think her so pure and good."

"But why should you hate her? I never could—never." His hand loosened on the door knob and he leaned back. Jane Graves could have gone if she would.

"And don't you hate her now?" she almost screamed at him, "when I have told you how she kissed and fondled him."

"Hush!"

"Well, I hate her, because she stole away my lover. May his love touch her yet to disgust; may his kisses turn bitter on her lips." The door closed after his visitor, and Philip glanced at the clock, which pointed to 12. Only half the night gone then! He sat down and dropped his head on his folded arms again.

CHAPTER XVI.

WHAT WILL THEY BRING?

Days passed till they made weeks, and weeks till they made months, and no change came for the mills or for the lives of the creatures who worked within their grim walls, except the change from poor to more poor.

His acquaintances saw new expressions on his face—the open, boyish look had gone, and his voice had new tones of decision; his step had grown firmer and his eyes met a glance with a new steadiness.

One morning the three men who had been once on the fire escape committee met in the doorway of No. 2 mill, restored after the fire. They had left their work for a breath of fresh air.

"He is closer than his father; he scrimps and saves like a poor cuss trying to support a family on $5 the week. What show is there for us?"

"Ye'll mind it's all jist as I told ye, Bill Rogers," suggested Graves, the comfort of 'I told you so' being left to him out of the general wreck. "Jist as I told ye that night more'n a six month ago in front of old Breton's. As soon as the lad feels his oats that's the last of his kind heart."

"The boy's had hard luck since then," said Rogers, handling his pipe out of old force of habit. "P'raps he's punishin' us for it. It seems so strange somehow his changin' all so sudden."

"Taint that," said Graves, as he turned to go back to work, and then lingering a moment longer; "It is the natur' of a man and crops out as sure as he gets his swing. There ain't a one of us but would make a meaner rich man than him. It comes easy to be a labor reformer and radical as long as a fellow is poor, and it's just as easy for a man to talk beautiful if he ain't looked to to do nothing. But it makes a man drunk when he feels the reins in his hands, and him nothin' but a man of the same stuff as the rest on us. Look at Curran now; how much better'n the rest is he? He deserted us at the most critical moment. Somethin' made him throw us up as if we had all of a sudden sickened on his stomach. We're poor stuff, all on us, boys. I never seen a finer feller than that Curran, but he's forgot all about the wrongs and rights he used to holler so purty about. There's no chance for us in any man's mercy; we must depend on ourselves."

At this very moment Phi'ip Breton was pressing the little brass bell on his counting room table. For an answer his paymaster came in with his pen, wet from the ink, in his hand.

"Do we pay our help enough?"

A thousand eager voices would have shouted a no to him that would have shaken the foundations of stone, but Mr. Jennings, the paymaster, put his pen behind his ear, took it down, looked keenly at it, then in surprise at the young mill owner.

"We can get 1,000 as good for the same, if that is what you mean." Ah, what chance have the poor mills people, when the young master choo es s ch advisers as this!

"No," said Philip, slowly. "It isn't exactly what I mean; can we raise the wages?"

"Can you; why yes, I suppose you can step right into the mills and give a $100 bill to every hand. But you couldn't afford to do that thing long, and I don't think it would do anybody any good. I wouldn't assume to advise you, sir, but why not just as well go up street and insist on paying a fancy price for your flour?"

"But don't they find it hard to live on what we give them? And what a life it is at that," suggested Philip, sadly. Apparently he had not quite forgotten them.

"No doubt, no doubt!" repeated the paymaster with the querulousness of his class, "but is there any sense in putting in your or my flat? You can't make a ninety cent laborer worth a dollar and a quarter by giving it to him. You insult him and damage business by making it all uncertain with the gratuitous element."

"I see you don't believe in benevolence, my dear Jennings," and Philip smiled curiously.

"Yes, I do, for sick people and paupers, but if you don't want to make paupers of everybody you mustn't"—

"But I am not a pauper, and I never carned a penny in my life till a few months ago." Philip's eyes flashed at a sudden revelation.

"But, ah—but that is different. Drop that then. To make our cloth there are a number of expenses; there is the mill and the machinery, the money locked up in fabrics and material. These are fixed; you don't think it your duty to pay extra prices for raw material, nor make a gratuity with every dollar you spend on machinery, no matter how poor the man that sells to you. Now comes another element, labor. That should be as fixed as the rest and all calculations based on its market price. When you go to market with your cloth you don't ask any gratuity, nor does the buyer claim any; the price is fixed better than the caprice of a moment could fix it. The element of labor enters into the cost. The difference between the cost and price is your profit. If labor stands you in its market price your profit will reward your efforts, and it will pay you to keep up your mill. If you paid higher wages your profits would be small; you would give up your enterprise and all would suffer."

"I didn't know you could be so eager. But supposing they tell me my profit is too large, that my labor pays me so well I ought to make it up to them." The young proprietor was looking musingly out of the window where the autumn wind was chasing the russet leaves in savage glee. Mr. Jennings, the paymaster, had reached the door, but waited a moment to clinch his argument.

"Then if you lost money your help ought to contribute. But it might not be at all their fault that you lost, any more than it is to their credit you succeed. Their labor in quantity and quality would be just the same. What reason in changing its valuation? No, I am sure there is but one way, to measure the value of your labor as you do everything else, by what it will bring."

"Not quite everything," said Philip; but he said it so low the argumentative Jennings did not hear it. All he heard was just as he was closing his door:

"Please send in the overseer of No. 1 weave room."

It was but a few moments, during which Philip did not move from his seat, before the overseer came in, stroking his apron deferentially.

"Mr. Bright, the men and girls complain; they say they ought to be paid by the day instead of by the piece."

"Which ones complain? The lazy ones, I guess. Why surely, Mr. Breton, it wouldn't be right to pay the best weaver and the poorest the same."

"Why not?" asked Philip, with unchanged features watching the look of astonishment that shone on the man's round fat face. "Why not, if we paid them all the highest price?"

"Well sir, it wouldn't be a month before bad and good would all be worth about the same, and that as little as the poorest of them. It would be a poor way to encourage them to be smart."

"Does Graves work in your room?"

"Yes, but he is just going out for this mornin'—his"—

"Send him in if you can find him." Philip rose to his feet now, and was walking the room impatiently when John Graves slouched in. He turned on him as if he was going to do violence to his visitor, but it was only a question he hurled at him.

"What do you think ought to be changed in the mill? Speak up now, and let me know your mind."

"I think we work too hard for our pay, then," drawled the laborer, but his mind was in an unusually excited condition.

"That is because the public want such goods as ours so cheap."

"There's other things to cut on besides labor forever and ever. Oh, no, ye can't buy poor cotton, it would show in the cloth; ye can't save on machinery, it would spoil yer sales; but if we carders and weavers and spinners be cut, it don't leave a mark on the cloth. But it leaves deep gashes in our hearts and joys, you be sure." Graves looked at the young man to see if he might go on, but he could not read his master's face. He hesitated a moment and then he continued.

"There aint a poor bent girl in the mill but might live a life so happy it would make a strong man cry to think of it. We are of more account than your machinery. No beltin' or patent self acting springs could do our work; it takes immortal souls, and intellects in the image of God to do it. It's the same sort of work you do, and compare what the two of us gets. We aint fairly paid till we gets, the weakest of us, a taste of the sweet things in this world we have longed for so long. I don't care what yer wise book men says." Was the young proprietor angry, he stood so grave and still? What a change! Time was when pity would have shone on every line of his face. But he might have been a statue for all appearance of melting in him now.

"I pay you the market price, as much as the other mill owners."

Well, God have mercy on his poor children, if Philip Breton could make that excuse! The man sat down without an invitation, and leaned his brawny elbows on the table.

"Now see here, you told me to speak my mind, and I am agoin' to. We are poor; we ain't got nothin'; we can't lay back and wait for our price. We want somethin' to eat today; we come to you for work; we must have work, if it only earns us a loaf of bread. Is it right, then, to value us at what we can be got for? If we could haggle with ye, and hang off the way a little ready cash lets a man do, there might be some sense in it. But you never let us get enough ahead for that. It's work or go hungry with us. The poorer we gets, the tighter ye can squeeze us, and I sometimes wonder why ye gives us as much as ye do. I s'pose a man might live on a little less. And it's all business, as ye say."

Philip had seated himself, but he said nothing. He had given the man the privilege of his tongue, and he did not seem disposed to stop him.

"Is the right price of a thing what a man 'll give for it? If they had the money, men would give $1,000,000 for a breath of air, when they're stifled. Would it be right to pump off the air, and then let it on at $1,000,000 a breathing? If you was drowning, you'd give $1,000,000 to be saved if it was only to hold out a pole to yer. Is that a fair price for holdin' out a pole? We're starvin' unless we can get a bite to eat. Is it any more right to bargain with us for a life of hard work, for just enough to live on? A man wants somethin' more than food. He wants to send his children to school, to get a loatin' hour now and then, to make himself somethin' besides a brute. He wants—he wants some such things and chances as you have. Why, squire, we're all men together." The man's eyes looked across at Philip with a vague wistfulness, as if he were thinking of the beautiful possibilities of a life so far all drudgery and want.

"But what is there to do?" exclaimed Philip in an impatient tone that put to flight all the workman's foolish fancies. The young man's heart seemed changed to flint. "You don't want to be objects of charity, do you?"

John Graves straightened his arms along the table; then he stood up.

"Charity! Well, no, not such charity as picks a creature up today as soft as a baby, and drops him to-morrow like a dog. But if payin' yer help enough of yer gain so they can know what life is—if that is charity, as you call it, give it to us. Ye needn't be so precious fraid of hurtin' the laboring classes, as they call 'em, by treatin' 'em too well. They're sinkin' every day lower and lower, and lots of fellows in specs keep a warnin' you not to spoil 'em, not to hurt their pride, or break their spirit by givin' 'em something. As if kindness ever hurt any human soul. Not that I would call it charity; they earns every mite ye'll ever give 'em."

"But if the mills or employers don't make such gains as you seem to take for granted"—

"If there ain't money made, why, nobody can find no fault not to get big pay. All I mean is when money is made, and that's pretty often, we ought to have some share in it."

"Don't go, John, I want to ask you"—

"I must; I asked out for today," and the door closed after the man. For quite a while after his last visitor had gone, Philip sat with his eyes fixed on the door knob in intense abstraction. Was he angry at the audacity of the common laborer? When he pushed back his chair and rose to his feet, running his hands through his hair, he made one exclamation:

"How blind." But whom he meant, whether his class or the laborers, did not appear from his tone or from the bitter smile on his lips. John Graves would have told in a moment that the young proprietor meant no good to his help. The man had had a glimmer of hope that Philip Breton might only be waiting for an opportunity, but this interview had dispelled it from his mind.

It was some little time afterwards that Philip left his counting room and made his way up the street. He was dressed in somberest black, and his silk hat was subdued with a wide band of crape. But his dress was no more melancholy than his face. When under pressure of business, one would not have noticed it so especially, but the instant he was thrown back upon himself, his face became as sad and hopeless as the face of the most wretched laborer in his mill. He was tasting the most bitter dregs in life, he thought. What soul could be more crushed than his? The time was when it would have been impossible for him to see a human creature suffer without a thrill of sympathy. It would have seemed a cruel and unnatural stroke of fortune, which it was for him to prevent or cure. But he had learned better, he thought. Suffering was common to all; there was no good of trying to patch up this life or that; the terrible disease was forever at work. Conditions made but little difference; rich and poor, high and low, agonized together over some form of broken hope, some unsatisfied hunger.

OF HEBREW ORIGIN.

An Ancient Hymn the Original of the House That Jack Built.

It is said that the Jewish original of this celebrated cumulative is an altered translation of an ancient parabolical hymn which the Jews were wont to sing at the Feast of the Passover. It was written in the Chaldee language, and may be found in "Septer Haggadah," vol. xxiii.

There is a tenth stanza beginning: "Then came the Holy One—Blessed be He—that killed the Angel of Death," etc.

The following is the interpretation of the parable:

1. The kid, one of the pure animals, denotes the Hebrews. The father who purchased it is Jehovah, who is represented as sustaining this relation with the Hebrew nation. The two pieces of money signify Moses and Aaron, through whose mediation the Hebrews were brought out of Egypt.

2. The cat is the Assyrians, by whom the ten tribes were carried into captivity.

3. The dog symbolizes the Babylonians.

4. The stick or staff signifies the Persians.

5. The fire indicates the Grecian Empire under Alexander the Great.

6. The water betokens the Romans, or the fourth of the great monarchies to which the Jews were subjected.

7. The ox means the Saracens, who subdued Palestine and brought it under the authority of the Caliph.

8. The butcher denotes the Crusaders, who wrested the Holy Land from the grasp of the Saracens.

9. The Angel of Death is the Turkish Power, by whose might Palestine was taken from the Franks.

10. The beginning of this stanza was designed to show that God will take signal vengeance on the Turks, immediately after whose overthrow the Jews will be restored to their own land, where they will dwell in safety under the rule of the long-expected Messiah.—Notes and Queries.

THE ONLY WHITE ELEPHANT IN THE WORLD

Has at last arrived, and after a great expense and much trouble, can be seen free of cost quietly enjoying the sea breezes that waft across the marshes near the 16th street station, Oakland, Cal., where for the present he is to be quartered. This ponderous animal was imported to the United States by the Sierra Chemical Company, the manufacturers of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure that has so recently gained a position as the leading Kidney and Liver Cure on this coast. All druggists have these valuable goods for sale. White elephants in their own country are a religious phenomena and are worshiped by the natives with all the faith they possess. He is, at this writing, in the charge of Mr. V. P. Mitchell, Oakland's only naturalist, at whose command he quietly submits to any and all calls. Mr. Mitchell has perfect control over this great and truly wonderful beast of the jungle. His proportions are immense, standing 20 feet high by 50 feet from head to tail. His tusks are 10 feet long, and as he stands with the sun shining upon his magnificent pure white skin, the effect upon the looker-on is marvelous, being that of an immense mountain of living snow. Don't fail to see this natural curiosity. It is an event of a lifetime—without money or price. All Overland and Berkeley trains pass the station, 16th street. It will pay everybody to see this monarch of the animal world.

Proper Care of the Eyes.

In consequence of the increase of affections of the eye a specialist has recently formulated the following rules to be observed in the care of the eyes for school work: A comfortable temperature, dry and warm feet, good ventilation, clothing at the neck and on other parts of the body loose, posture erect, and never read lying down or stooping; but little study before breakfast or directly after a hearty meal; none at all at twilight or late at night; use great caution about study after recovery from fever; have light abundant, but not dazzling, not allowing the sun to shine on desks or objects in front of the scholars, and letting the light come from the left hand, or left and rear; hold book at right angles to the line of sight, or nearly so; give eyes frequent rest by looking up. The distance of the book from the eye should be about fifteen inches. The usual indication of strain is redness of the rim of the eyelid, betokening a congested state of the inner surface, which may be accompanied with some pain. When the eye tires easily rest is not the proper remedy, but the use of glasses of sufficient power to aid in accommodating the eye to vision.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

GORDON'S GREAT LUCK.

A Louisiana State Lottery Ticket Cashe for Five Dollars Draws Five Thousand Dollars.

R. J. Gordon, who keeps a little cigar store on K street, between Third and Fourth, was a considerable winner by the July drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, and in a peculiar way. He explained to a Bee reported this morning how he came into possession of the winning ticket. "The day the list of th drawing arrived," he said, "Clinton Woodworth came into the store and said: 'I have won an approximation prize of $5, and I want you to cash the ticket.' I said: 'Are you sure your ticket won?' and he replied: 'Yes; the number is 58,607 and '07' were the last two figures of the number winning the second capital prize.'

"That satisfied me, and I threw him $5 and put the ticket in my vest pocket. About two hours afterward there were half a dozen fellows in the store looking over the list, and I pulled out the ticket and said: 'Boys, see if that won anything.' Well, sir, in about a minute one of them yelled out:

"'Why, Gordon, you have won $5,000.'

"I wouldn't believe it at first, but when I looked for myself there it was—the ticket called for one-twentieth of the Second Capital Prize of $100,000. Of course the news was all over town in a short time, and The Bee has had an account of how Woodworth wanted a 'divy' and how he began legal proceedings. We fixed the matter up amicably, the ticket was sent to New Orleans, and in a few days the money arrived. How did we divide it? Oh, that's of no interest to the public," and Mr. Gordon smiled in a way to indicate that he lost nothing by the transaction. The money must have been most gratefully received, as Mr. Gordon is physically incapacitated from hard labor, and it was doubtless joyfully welcomed by Mr. Woodworth who is a hardworking carpenter employed on a river steamer.—Sacramento (Cal.) Bee August 17.

NO CURE NO PAY.

It is a pretty severe test of any doctor's skill when the payment of his fee is made conditional upon his curing his patient. Yet after having, for many years, observed the thousands of marvelous cures effected in liver, blood and lung diseases, by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, its manufacturers feel warranted in selling it, as they are now doing, through all druggists, the world over, under a certificate of positive guarantee that it will either benefit or cure in every case of disease for which they recommend it, if taken in time and given a fair trial, or money paid for it will be promptly refunded. Torpid liver, or "biliousness," impure blood, skin eruptions, scrofulous sores and swellings, consumption (which is scrofula of the lungs), all yield to this wonderful medicine. It is both tonic or strength-restoring, and alterative or blood cleansing.

SWEPT BY THE TIDE OF POPULARITY

To the topmost pinnacle of success, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters stands a shining proof of what genuine merit, backed by the living force of proven facts, can attain. The North and South American continents, Europe, Australia, the West Indies, Guatemala, and Mexico have all contributed wide patronage and testimony of the most favorable kind—but unsolicited—to swell the reputation of this sterling remedy. Among the maladies for which the most convincing public and professional testimony proves that it is a benign curative, are chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague and ague cake, dyspepsia, liver complaint, nervousness, debility, kidney and bladder complaints. It mitigates the infirmities of age, hastens convalescence, has a tendency to prevent ill consequences from exposure and exhaustion. Persons of sedentary habits and laborious occupations will find it an ever useful tonic.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE CURED.

About two years ago our daughter had congestion of the kidneys, which developed into Bright's Disease. Her body was swollen to an enormous size—measuring 45 inches around the waist, and 18 inches below the knee. After physicians had given up her case, I determined to have her try Dr. Kennedy's "Favorite Remedy," of Rondout, N. Y. Gradually the swelling was reduced from 45 to 29 inches. She began to gain Strength, and was able to walk without fatigue. We do not know how to express our gratitude for what it has done for our child. We are confident the Favorite Remedy will do all that is claimed for it—Surely God has blessed it in this case, and we earnestly recommend it to all suffering from kidney disorders.—S. D. Rochester, N. Y., March 18, '86.

For many years I have been troubled with severe pains in the back of my head and neck, the pain being so severe at times that I was nearly insane, and my friends feared that I would be. Lumps as large as a hickory-nut, would swell up on my forehead and neck. I tried many different kinds of medicines and physicians, but none seemed to reach my case, until I commenced the use of Dr. Pardee's Rheumatic Remedy, and before I had used it four days, the pain left my neck and shoulders and went to my hips and limbs. I continued taking the remedy, and the disease seemed to work downward but there was but little pain. I am still using the remedy, and I feel confident it will entirely cure me; for I am so much better and stronger than I have been for years. I cheerfully recommend it to all.

Very respectfully yours,
MRS. PHŒBE WHEATON.

Sworn Statement from a Well-known Individual.

Lockport, N. Y.

A short time ago I was afflicted with rheumatism so badly that I could not move. My hands and limbs were all swollen. One leg was so badly swollen that I burst the skin. The Sheriff of our County advised me to try Dr. Pardee's Rheumatic Remedy, and bought me a bottle. After taking the remedy one day I felt relieved and in less than two weeks I was able to go to work and have not felt rheumatism since. Three bottles cured me, and I recommend it to all who are suffering from rheumatism.

HERRINGS FOR SARDINES.

What Nature Has Done for the French, Man Made for the Shrewd Yankee.

The rich, spicy flavor of the French sardine was not there, but only the unmistakable taste of the native herring. The Yankees could not discover any means by which the herring taste could be eradicated, and the sardine business was pronounced a failure, but our smart New Yorkers, after a few experiments, hit upon a mixture of oils and spices for a packing sauce, which made a sardine of a herring in a twinkling and a gigantic industry has sprung from the simple discovery. Not only are sardines made from common herring now, but from sea trout, a fish called a moranec and several other finny species, all herring of lesser or greater growth.

The herring of which sardines are made are never over four inches long, and the catching of the fish keeps hundreds of people busy along the coasts of Maine and New Brunswick. The herring go in shoals like mackerel, and the price received for them is governed entirely by the condition of the fisheries. Sometimes the fish swarm along the coasts, and hauls are made with unvarying success. Then the fisherman can expect no more than $5 a hogshead for his herring. Again, his nets may be but poorly patronized, and he has his recompense in a higher price, frequently obtaining $15 and $20 a hogshead. These big prices are generally obtained early in the spring.

A herring fishery is a simple thing. Small trees or brush are thrust into the sandy bottom of the sea, arranged in a line running out probably one hundred feet or more and then curving back to the shore again. This is called a trap, and inside of this a huge net is set. When the tide is going out the net is raised, and the fish that come up with it are taken out with scoop nets. Sometimes this catch will be so large that the weight of the fish will break the bottom out of the big net, and the great heap of fish will nearly all escape. Then, again, the fishermen are able to carry in a bushel bag all the herring that are caught in a haul. Herring, like mackerel, will follow a light on the water, and some fishermen take advantage of this to fish for them in a peculiar way. Two or three fishermen go in a boat. They are provided with torches made of cotton batting saturated with kerosene. Dark nights are chosen, and the boats are rowed along the shores, with a torch in the bow of each boat. It is soon known when a school of herring is reached, for the fish dash frantically after the wake of light made by the torch, and make the water seethe and boil in their rush. The fishermen have short poles, on one end of which is a small scoop net. They dip the herring out of the water with these as fast as the nets can be handled, and so intent are the fish on the light that the net does not disturb them in the least. In this way boat load after boat load of future sardines are captured in a short time.

The way these herring are handled at the factories is a sight well worth going all the way to Maine to see. After being captured the fish are taken immediately to the factories. They are laid in heaps on long tables. I have heard some of the native fishermen around here talk about their skill in skinning a catfish. If they could see some of the boys and girls who work in these sardine factories clean these herring they would never mention skinning a catfish again. The fish are cleaned as soon as they come in. I stood and watched a seven-year-old girl go through the operation and timed her. She beheaded and gutted seventy-five herring every minute for ten minutes without a miss or a half, and they told me there were hundreds more that could do the same thing and keep it up all day. The dexterity is simply marvelous. The head of the fish is cut off and the entrails are removed with one stroke of the knife, but how it is done I am not able to say. Each fish-cleaner has a box at his feet which holds a bushel, and a constant stream of fish is falling from his hands into that box. Every time it is filled the boy or girl has earned ten cents.

The herring are thoroughly washed after being cleaned and are then placed in pickle for an hour. Taken from the pickle, they are laid on trays and placed in a drying-room heated to a high temperature by steam. When dry the fish are boiled in large shallow pans filled with oil, the fish being thoroughly cooked in the oil. Girls and women then pack the herring in the tin boxes in which they are placed in the market. The sauce, a patented article, is poured into the boxes, which are handed over to men who solder on the covers. To remove the air which is sealed in with the fish, and which must be taken out to insure the preservation of the sardines, the boxes are placed in a tank of boiling water for half an hour. On being removed they are placed on an inclined plane. The air inside is then driven to one corner; a workman punctures that corner with an awl; the hot air escapes, and the awl hole is immediately covered with a drop of solder, and the box is air tight. The box then receives its French label, bearing the inscription, 'a l'huille d'olive.' The 'huille d'olive' is made from cotton seed in South Carolina, and isn't the best quality of that, either, not by a good deal. There is a class of these Maine sardines, however, known as prime, which are preserved in the best cotton-seed oil.

New York is the great wholesale center for these Yankee sardines. Some idea of the magnitude of the business may be obtained when I tell you that one factory alone in Lubec, and there are others that are doing as big a business, made and sold nearly two million boxes of sardines last year, to say nothing of sea trout and other brands of transformed herring. The manufacturers or packers make a clear profit of six cents a box, the factory price being about eleven cents a box. These same sardines are retailed every day for forty cents a box, and you will pay half a dollar for a box if you order sardines at your restaurant in New York.—N. Y. Sun.

Very Complimentary.

Old man Estee, the California bungler, has made another amusing and characteristic bungle. When Mme. Modjeska took her formal leave of San Francisco last month Estee made a speech, and, desiring to be particularly felicitous, he assured madame that what was said of Naples is, "See Naples and die" and everybody knows what that means. But "See Modjeska and die" may mean one thing or may mean another.—Chicago News.

Sized Up by a Waiter.

Everybody is agreed that feeing the servants about a hotel is a pernicious practice and one that every free born American should seek to stamp out, but nevertheless the fact stares you in the face that the habit is growing and spreading and becoming more firmly fastened upon guests. You may combat the practice all you will, but there are two reasons why it will be continued. The first is because landlords hire waiters at starvation wages and encourage them to expect blackmail from guests, and the next is because you realize that you suffer a loss of standing at the hands of a waiter if you don't hand over. I had made up my mind this year not to part with one blessed cent to Sambo, and I held to the resolution just one week. Then he was changed off to another table, and next day I accidentally overheard him giving the new waiter some pointers.

"Dat pusson at de foot of de table pays fifty cents a week, an' he ar' a judge, I reckon," he explained. "De fust one on his left ar' good fur six shillins, an' he's a kurnel. De one on de right is a fifty center, an' he's a purfessor. De next two ar' two bit pussons, an' only captains."

"But do one at de head, Julius?"

His Secret.

She—There is a far away look in your eye to-night, George. You are not yourself. You seem to be in anguish of soul. There is something dark and melancholy weighing upon your spirits. What is it, George? You promised to confide all your care, all your troubles to me when we became engaged, to hide nothing from me; but now I perceive you have a secret. Tell me what it is, George. Fear not to place your confidence in me. Are we not engaged? Am I not to be your wife? Have you not sworn to lead me to the altar as soon as you get a raise of salary? Oh! then by the memory of those vows made under the silent stars, by the hopes of the future, I conjure you tell me, tell me what it is distracts your soul.

The Art of Eating Watermelon.

Eating watermelon is an art, learned only by experience. As a dessert it is not a success. It falls too heavily on a dinner. Like a pretty girl, it is best by itself; it loses half its charm by being mixed in a crowd. The melon should be cold. It should be ripe. Its flesh should blush like a graduate. Its heart should glow like a sun kissed cloud at close of day, and its temperature should be as chilly as the smile of a Boston belle. When you get such a treasure do not bother with other food. Open it, gaze on it, bury your face in its sweetness, and let your appreciation run riot.—Baltimore American.

LAFE TURLEY'S WOOING.

How a Young Hoosier Popped the Question to His Best Girl.

Lafe Turley had been courting old man Hite's daughter, Heppie, for a long time; but somehow had never mustered up the courage to ask her to be his wife. One Sunday evening, however, as he and Heppie were spooning together out on the front porch, Lafe so far overcame his bashfulness as to make an attempt to come to some sort of an understanding in this matter.

"Heppie," he began, "it looks as though we wuz goin' ter have a right smart lot o' wheat arter all this year. That bottom field o' mine's ergoin' to pan out fust-rate."

"I'm glad o' that, Lafe," replied Heppie, "but pap says our'n ain't ergoin' ter 'mount ter much."

"My co'n's er lookin' bully, too," continued Lafe; "don't b'lieve I ever seed it a-doin' so well afore at this time o' year."

"Well, Lafe," said Heppie as she smiled winningly into his face, "you're mighty lucky, 'relse you're a tip-top good farmer, I danno which."

"Heppie," said Lafe, impulsively, "I'm both; I've allus been lucky, an' besides, I know as much erbout croppin' an' handlin' stock as ther next feller. An' that ain't all," he continued, "I've got forty acres of good farmin' lan' all paid fer, with a good house on in, an' I wuz a-thinkin'—"

Here he stopped and began whipping the dust out of his trousers with the riding whip which he still had in his hand.

"What wuz it you wuz er thinkin' of Lafe?" queried Heppie softly as she stole a mischievous, yet encouraging, glance at her embarrassed lover.

"Well," said Lafe, with considerable effort, "I wuz thinkin', Heppie, that considerin' as I am tollable lucky, an', 'sides, ain't no fool in farmin' matters, 'at you wouldn't mind marryin' a feller like me, speshully when he loves you so well 'at he kain't find words to tell you about it."

"Lafe," she answered softly, as she nestled closer to him, "I've knowed a long time that you thought more o' me than you did any one else. Yes," she continued, "I love you, Lafe, an' I'll be as good er wife as I can ter yer; but you wuz er long time screwin' up yer courage to the stickin' p'int."

"Well," said Lafe; boldly and utterly regardless of the lie he was about to utter, "I wuz sorter waitin' till I could git things licked inter shape afore I axed you. I don't belive in a feller gittin' a wife until he's got a place ter take her to. Besides, I knowed yer pap wouldn't er let us git married till I'd got some kind of a start, anyhow."

"Lafe Turley, I don't believe you," retorted Heppie, poutingly. "You wasn't certain I'd have yer, an' you wuz afeard ter ax me for fear I'd say no."

"Oh, shucks!" said Lafe, as he hugged her tighter to his bosom. "I wasn't afeard ter ask yer, Heppie, but ef you'd er said no, that would erbout killed me. I'd er got outen old Indeyanny in mighty short order, I'm er tellin' yer."

"Well," said Heppie, "you'd orter 'a' knowed I wouldn't 'a' let you come here so long ef I hadn't 'a' keered a little fer yer."

"Yes, I know," rejoined Lafe, "but gals is such queer critters you kain't just tell much erbout 'em, nohow."

And so he told the truth at last; for had he known what Heppie's answer would have been, it would have saved him many months of torturing anxiety and uncertainty. She was an enigma to him, as are all girls to those whose hearts they hold enthralled, and who, like Lafe, are, as a rule, cowards in the presence of the woman they love. —Ed. R. Pritchard, in Arkansas Traveler.

A Legend for Tea-Drinkers.

There is a curious old Japanese legend which professes to account for the origin of the tea plant. Somewhere about the year 519 A. D., a certain Buddhist priest of great sanctity paid a visit to the Celestial empire, and, in order to devote himself entirely to the service of God, he solemnly vowed upon one occasion that he would not go to sleep for the remainder of his earthly life, but spend his time in perpetual meditation. Years rolled by, until at last one sultry day, nature asserted herself, and the poor devotee of Buddha fell fast asleep. So great was his remorse when he awoke that, in order to preclude the possibility of a repetition of slumber, he there and then cut off both his eyelashes and flung them on the ground. Passing by the spot next day, great was his astonishment at beholding each eyelash metamorphosed into a shrub and exhibiting "the form of an eyelid bordered with lashes, and possessing the gift of hindering sleep." From these two shrubs, concludes the legend, sprang the tea plant.—Gentleman's Magazine.

The Difference in Cattle.

Riding along a country road, you often notice the cattle stand as if they had no expectations; they hardly raise their head as you drive by; while the cattle in the next field will look up with eagerness, as though men and women contributed to their happiness. Now, if you should know the daily life of the animals on these two farms, you would probably find that on one they were fed and housed, but had no pet names, no one greeted them familiarly or petted them; they belonged to the farm, while the bright, animated cattle belonged to the family, and there's a vast difference.—Sir John Lubbock.

PECULIAR FRIENDSHIP.

The Affection of Rarus, the Trotter, for a Terrier Pup.

No sketch of Rarus would be complete without some mention of his remarkable friendship for a dog. When the horse was in California a fireman gave to Splan a wiry-haired Scotch terrier pup, who was then two months old, and weighed when full grown only two pounds. Splan in turn gave the pup to Dave, the groom of Rarus, with the caution not to let the horse hurt him, for on several occasions Rarus had bitten dogs that ventured into his stall. But to this terrier who is described as possessing "almost human intelligence," the trotter took a great fancy, which the dog fully returned. They became fast and inseparable friends.

"Not only," says Mr. Splan, "were they extremely fond of each other, but they showed their affection plainly as did ever a man for a woman. We never took any pains to teach the dog any thing about the horse. Every thing he knew came to him by his own patience. From the time I took him to the stable a pup until I sold Rarus, they were never separated an hour. We once left the dog in the stall while we took the horse to the blacksmith shop, and when we came back we found he had made havoc with every thing there was in there trying to get out, while the horse, during the entire journey, was uneasy, restless, and in general acted as badly as the dog did. Dave remarked that he thought that we had better keep the horse and dog together after that. When Rarus went to the track for exercise or to trot a race the dog would follow Dave around and sit by the gate by his side watching Rarus with as much interest as Dave did. When the horse returned to the stable after a heat and was unchecked, the dog would walk up and climb up on his forward legs and kiss him, the horse always bending his head down to receive the caress. In the stable after work was over Jim and the horse would often frolic like two boys. If the horse lay down Jim would climb on his back, and in that way soon learned to ride him; and whenever I led Rarus out to show him to the public Jim invariably knew what it meant, and it enhanced the value of the performance by the manner in which he would get on the horse's back. On these occasions the horse was shown the halter, and Jimmy, who learned to distinguish such events from those in which the sulky was used, would follow Dave and Rarus out on the quarter-stretch, and then when the halt was made in front of the grand-stand Dave would stoop down and in a flash Jimmy would jump on his back, run up his shoulder, from there leap on the horse's back, and there he would stand, his head high in the air and his tail out stiff behind, barking furiously at the people."

When Rarus was sold to Mr. Bonner Splan sent Jimmy with the horse, rightly judging that it would be cruel to separate them. But in Mr. Bonner's stable there was a bull-terrier in charge, and one day when, for some real or fancied affront, the small dog attacked the larger one the latter took Jimmy by the neck and was fast killing him; but Rarus heard his outcries, and perceiving that his little friend was in danger and distress pulled back on the halter till it broke, rushed out of his stall, and would have made short work with the bull-terrier had he not been restrained by the grooms.—Atlantic Monthly.

PERILS ON THE STREET.

The Little Things That Endanger the Lives of City People.

We stop to chat with a friend and lean against a deadly charged electric pole, and it is all over with the conversation. A passing plumber burns our coat with his unextinguished hand furnace. A passing carpenter lacerates our trousers with a saw. A passing porter imperils our head with a long piece of gas-pipe on his shoulder.

One is annoyed if not endangered by the servant washing a sidewalk with a hose, or a fireman carrying his wriggling serpent up a ladder. A fresh young Italian maid from Cork, with a white muslin nightcap on her head, runs us down with a baby carriage, scarring our shins or necessitating a visit to the chiropodist.

Then there is the woman's umbrella that wasteth at noonday, scooping us up after the manner of a drag-net or impaling us in its blind and headlong charge. All these are side-walk perils. If we undertake to cross the street dangers multiply. The pedestrian has no rights which the driver is bound to respect, and the footfarer, unless a handsome woman, personally conducted by a big policeman, will be subject to being run down by the driver of a beer wagon, or a physician in a hurry, or the chief of the fire department on his "golomping" way to a conflagration, or a coroner intent on beating a rival, or a belated voter, standing out till the last moment for his price, or even a hearse on its business way back from the grave.

Runaway horses are another source of midway perils, and so are wagons turning around corner with long irons or beams projecting from behind. This last might, perhaps, be increased, but these common instances show that man walks the city amid perils scarcely less than those of the desert, the sea, the forest, or even the battlefield, almost as deadly as those encountered and enumerated by St. Paul.

Most of them, indeed, are "perils by false brethren," against which the injunctions and penalties of the law are futile. To avoid misapprehensions, we will add that these lines are not written in the interest of any particular accident insurance company.—Albany (N. Y.) Law Journal.

EFFECTS OF CATARRH.

Mental Disturbances Caused by Impeded Nasal Inspiration.

Considering the fact that chronic nasal catarrh almost always obstinately resists the usual treatment which the victims are wont to prescribe for themselves, many, after experimenting for a time, become discouraged, and allow the disease to run on indefinitely. That would scarcely be the case were all its evil effects rightly estimated. Many of them are well understood generally. There is one, at least, which is seldom duly weighed, even if recognized. We refer to the effect of catarrh on the mind. It surely lessens its vigor. Brain-workers may have noticed that, when suffering from a cold in the head, they have been to no inconsiderable extent mentally disabled. So it is in chronic catarrh. The mental faculties are impaired and the victim more or less dull and listless. It is safe to say that no man can be at his best intellectually while troubled with that affection. Children are quite as often sufferers from catarrh as are adults, and the ill effects of it are even more apparent to them. Dr. Bresgen, of Frankfort-on-the-Main, according to the Philadelphia Medical Reporter, has recently examined many school children. He found that, in many who were notoriously inattentive and slow in making headway, neglected disorders of the ear or nose, such as catarrh or slight inflammations, could be detected. Dr. Bresgen pointed out that an impeded nasal inspiration caused a pressure in the frontal region, which could readily produce a bad effect on mental development. Such children complain of headaches, ringing in the ears and similar conditions, growing more and more inattentive and lazy. Dr. Bresgen's pertinent reports to the secretary of instruction were not needed until the observations of Prof. Guye, of Amsterdam, confirmed the experience of the German observer. Guye found in adults that nasal catarrhs of long standing and of neglected character exert a most deleterious influence over the entire mental condition of the patient. He found as results of the conditions mentioned morbid headaches, vertigo, progressive decrease of the perceptive faculties, disinclination and even inability to work. All of these symptoms disappeared after the cure of the nasal affection. Other observers have also confirmed the views and assertions of Bresgen and Guye. As after measles and scarlet fever, disorders of the nose and ear are of especially frequent occurrence, it seems the duty of the teachers, or rather of a special school physician, to attend immediately to these conditions. Great mental disturbances can in this way be prevented by a timely and trivial attention.—Boston Herald.

ABOUT SUNSTROKES.

Little Danger from Heat as Long as Perspiration Is Free.

The effects of undue exposure to heat vary widely, and are by no means always proportionate to the temperature to which the person has been exposed. The so-called sunstroke, or heat-stroke, may occur either in the direct rays of the sun or in hot rooms, such as laundry rooms or the holds of steamships. Attacks may occur in the night as well as during the day, and, in general, are to be feared at times when the atmosphere is loaded with moisture, so that free perspiration is checked. Experience shows that the drinking of ice-water, when the body is over-heated, is a prolific cause of these attacks.

All degrees of severity are met with, from the lightest attack of headache and dizziness to the sudden stroke which ends in death within a few minutes. Some authorities would make three distinct degrees of heat prostration, although the line is seldom distinctly drawn in any given case.

The first variety includes those cases which show nothing more than a sudden faintness, muscular weakness and dizziness, with, perhaps, nausea and vomiting. The surface of the body is cool, the pulse rapid and feeble. In such cases, rest in a recumbent position in a cool place for a few hours will generally give relief.

In the second class of cases, the respiration and heart's action are affected, and the patient may die suddenly of syncope. Active measures must be entered upon at once. The patient should be removed to a cool spot, the clothing removed or loosened, and cold water applied to the head. Complete recovery from the effects may not take place for years.

The third form is the most severe, and in the majority of cases proves fatal. The sufferer becomes unconscious, the skin is dry, the pulse slow and full, the face flushed and the breathing labored. Generally there is entire unconsciousness, and sometimes convulsions.

The temperature runs excessively high, and the first attempt should be to bring it to the normal point. For this purpose cold baths and the application of ice are indicated. As soon as the temperature is lessened stimulation must be commenced, to counteract the great depression which always follows.

It is important to remember that there is little danger from heat so long as the perspiration is free. By bearing this in mind many who are exposed might no doubt avert the threatened attack by leaving work and seeking shelter as soon as the diminution in perspiration is noticed.—Youth's Companion.

UNGALLANT PROVERBS.

The Part Played by Women in the Laws of Various Peoples.

A contributor to the Freisinnige Zeitung has collected from all the foremost nations of the world a heap of "proverbs of men concerning women." It appears from them that the Southern peoples, who count themselves the most chivalrous and gallant toward the ladies, are more coarse and insulting in their proverbs than the colder Northerners. Although the Germans, the Scandinavians, and the English are complimentary to the women in their proverbs, they are "rarely brutal." The Frenchman says: "A man who has a wife has a plague;" "A man made of straw is worth double as much as a woman made of gold." The Spaniard says: "A woman's advice is never of any use, but unless you follow it she will rail at you as a fool;" "Be on your guard against a bad woman, but do not put your trust in a good woman." "There is only one bad woman, but every husband believes he possesses her." The Italians say: "If a man loses his wife and a farthing he has only lost a farthing." The chief failings of the sex, according to a whole host of English and German proverbs, are changeableness and talkativeness, the former of which is equally true of men and the latter not disagreeable to men in the Latin nations. The charge that "Women's minds and April winds often change," and the statement that "A woman's strength lies in her tongue," appear to be accepted in various readings throughout Northern Europe. The specimen of a Yankee proverb is characteristic: "Women can keep a secret, but it takes a big crowd of them to do it." The Chinese say that "A woman's tongue is her sword," but "She never lets it grow rusty."

HUMAN SACRIFICES.

Terrible Rites Paid to the Iu Iu Gods in New Calabar, Africa.

The steamer Congo brings news from New Calabar of a most revolting sacrifice. It seems that a few months ago the old King of Eboe died, and, as is customary in that part of the country, the traders from New Calabar went up to pay their respects to the new monarch. The traders were aware that for a short time after the old King's death the "Iu Iu" rites are performed, but they thought that these were over. The deceased monarch's name was Imphy, and, to the horror of the English traders, the "Iu Iu" ceremonies were at their highest when they entered Eboe Town.

The rites had been in operation for about two months, and already about forty people had been slain to appease the "Iu Iu" gods. The old King was then lying in a grave which had been dug for him. The hole was a large one and deep. Lying in the same grave were nine of the King's youngest wives, and their deaths had been brought about in the most cruel manner. Each of the poor creatures had both her wrists and ankles broken, so that they could neither walk nor crawl. In this state and suffering the most excruciating pain the unfortunate creatures were placed at the bottom of the grave, seven of them lying side by side. The body of the King was then laid on them in a traverse direction. The two remaining women were laid down by the side of the King, lying exactly like the monarch's body. No food or water was given to the poor creatures, who were left in that position to die. It is said that death did not, as a rule, take place for four or five days. Four men were stationed round the grave, armed with clubs, ready to knock back with these weapons any of the women who, notwithstanding their maimed condition, were able to crawl to the side of the grave.

In other parts of the town further human sacrifices were taking place. Suspended from various trees were the bodies of several men. These poor fellows were also enduring the most agonizing death. In most instances holes had been bored through their feet just by the ankles. Through the holes ropes were drawn and the men were then tied to a high tree. Their heads were, of course, hanging downward. The men were left there to die. The traders, as they were proceeding along, were unwilling witnesses of a frightful sacrificial execution. They saw a number of natives in a group and went to the spot to see what was taking place. To their horror the white men saw a native tied by the feet and neck. The rope attached to the neck was thrown over a tree in one direction and the rope attached to the feet was tied to a tree in the opposite direction. The ropes were then drawn tightly, and when the body was distended to its utmost length another native with a hatchet struck the neck and severed the head from the body. The head was taken to the grave where the King was lying, while the body was eaten by the cannibal natives. The white men could do nothing to stop the barbarous practices, as to interfere with these "religious customs" would not be tolerated by the natives and the lives of the traders would have been in peril. They therefore made as quick a retreat from the town as they could. The traders learned for each of the following ten months there was to be a sacrifice of seven men.—London Standard.

—A few days ago a large pond, about two miles from Abbeville, Ga., sprang a leak in the bottom and dried up. The sound of the escaping water resembled thunder. Many fish were left behind and picked up, but most of them followed the lake.

A GIPSY WEDDING.

The Part Which the Broom-Stick Played in the Ceremonies.

Few things are more simple than a marriage ceremony among the Gypsies, and a description of a wedding as recently witnessed by the writer, will not, we believe, prove uninteresting. There were more than a score of tents at the encampment, where we were temporary guests, and at the opening of each a fire was burning, crackling and blazing away as early as six o'clock in the morning of the day which was to witness the marriage of one of the favorite young girls of the camp. An hour afterward, and an old Gypsy man with silvery hair and bronzed, wrinkled face, with but one eye, stepped on a little mound and began playing the violin, which has but two strings on it. The player's opening piece was the well-known tune, "Haste to the Wedding," to which the younger gypsies were soon dancing with great hilarity. While some of the older women were watching the dancers, others were engaged in culinary preparations. At the opening of one of the tents stood the swarthy-looking masculine Gypsy chief, with his hands in his pockets, steadfastly gazing upon the dancers. At a given signal from the chief, the music and dancing ceased. Two rows of Gypsies, with about twelve or fifteen in each row, were formed, standing face to face, being between four and six feet apart. Half-way down between these rows two Gypsies held up a broomstick about eighteen inches above the ground. All being thus far in readiness, the chief called out the name of the bridegroom, who was a very handsome Gypsy man about twenty-two years of age. His hair and eyes were very dark, and the conformation of his face strongly indicated the race to which he belonged. He wore an olive-colored velveteen coat, red waistcoat, and a glaring-colored handkerchief round his neck. In person he was tall, muscular and well made. In obedience to the chief's command he came from a tent at one side of the encampment, walked between the rows of Gypsies, stepped over the broomstick, turned round, and then stood with his arms akimbo waiting the arrival of his intended wife. The chief then called out the name of the bride, who came from a tent at the opposite side of the encampment. She was about nineteen years of age, rather short of stature, apparently of a healthy and hardy constitution, while the pearly luster of her eyes and long, dark, glossy hair seemed to identify her with the purest remnant of the Gypsy race. She also walked between the two rows of Gypsies, tripped very lightly over the broomstick, which she had no sooner done than the young Gypsy man, in the most gentle and gallant manner imaginable, took her in his arms and completed the ceremony by giving his new-made wife some of the loudest kisses we ever heard in our life. Then the music and dancing were resumed; the whole of the members of the encampment had suspended business; preparations for a good feast were going on; every face looked bright and every heart seemed joyous. The men smoked, the women talked volumes, the children shouted and frolicked; the old horses grazed by the sides of the banks, the donkeys nibbled their coarse food with a self-satisfied air, and looked as if conscious that they were to have that day's respite from their weary toils; even the two or three dogs that were there wagged their tails as if in anticipation of an extra feed or of better and a larger quantity of rations than usual, even without the trouble of having to hunt before any dinner could be allowed them.—Brooklyn Magazine.

Hunting Rattlesnakes.

Up in Berkshire County, Massachusetts, the rattlesnake is hunted every summer for his oil, which sometimes fetches two dollars an ounce. Here is a description of the way the Yankee outwits the serpent: "Choosing a hot summer day, the rattlesnake-hunters saunter forth. One man carries a fish-pole, another a sharp scythe. The fish-pole has a stout wire attached to it, and there is an ordinary pickerel hook on the end of the wire. Moving cautiously through the grass, so as not to disturb the sleeping snake, who is almost always found basking in the warm sun near a loose ledge of rock, one of the men prod his snakeship more or less gently with the fish-pole, being careful also to hold the hook invitingly near to the rattler's head. The snake wakes up angry, makes a dart at the nearest irritating object, which is the fish-hook, and very accommodatingly allows the sharp tines to penetrate his jaws. The man with the fish-pole holds the entrapped rattlesnake at a safe distance, while his comrade moves up and severs the snake's head from his body. The body then is deposited in a bag, and the hunters go in search of another snake.—H[illegible] Times.

—To can fruit, with the juice rich and delicious, you must not put a drop of water in it. The water fades the fruit, and renders it tasteless. Stew fruit in its own juice. The juice can be extracted from over-ripe and inferior fruit to can with. Fruit canned in this way is rich and delicious, and will keep for years.

—Potato Salad.—Cut cold potatoes in small slices. Put into a dish two eggs, seven tablespoonfuls of vinegar, one stablespoonful of butter and half a tea spoonful of mustard. Put the dish into boiling water and stir until the dressing is as thick as good cream. Add salt and pepper and pour all over the potatoes.—Good Housekeeping.

—When fire bricks become cracked they may be mended with a cement formed of equal parts of salt and soapstone powder (which is bought of any druggist). Mix these ingredients with water to a thick paste, and apply. To remove clinkers from fire brick, put an oyster shell or two on a clear, bright fire, and the bricks will be bright and clean.

A VOICE from Ohio. Here is a portrait of Mr. Garrison, of Salem, Ohio. He writes: "Was at work on a farm for $20 a month. I now have an agency for E. C. Allen & Co's albums and publications and often make $20 a day." (Signed) W. H. GARRISON.

William Kline, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: "I have never known anything to sell like your album. Yesterday I took orders enough to pay me over $25." W. J. Elmore, Bangor, Me., writes: "I take an order for your album almost every house I visit. My profit is often as much as $20 for a single day's work." R. C. Broder et al. vs. A. R. Conklin et al.—Filed stipulation.

Supervisors will meet in regular session Nov. 4.

The N. S. G. W. will give a Grand Ball on Thanksgiving evening.

Judge Conklin and wife returned home from San Francisco last Wednesday.

Some very rich ore has been struck in the Erin mine, owned by Nathan Rhine.

V. G. Thompson has retired from the management of the Independence Hotel.

The Assessment Roll of 1889 will be delivered to the Tax-Collector next Monday.

W. W. Yandell, Ben T. Williams and Andy Dell were here last Saturday on land business.

The trial of the Broder—Conklin suit has been continued to Dec. 2, 1889, by stipulation of counsel.

Mrs. Mary A. Clark has commenced an action for a divorce in the Superior Court of Yolo County against Henry L. Clark.

The County Treasurer has received the cash for the Big Pine school bonds. The Board of Supervisors will undoubtedly cancel the old issue.

A postoffice has been established at Coyote Hole. The name of the office is Freeman and F. S. Raymond has been appointed Postmaster.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence at 11 a. m.

We have commenced the publication of the Assessmen Roll in this issue, which will be continued each week until completed. We think it will be found interesting by the public,

San Francisco attorneys are now examining into the legality of the issue of bonds made by this county in 1884. If found correct said bonds will be refunded immediately.

The visit of two gentlemen connected with the Union Pacific R. R. indicates that we may yet have rail connection with the southern lines, which is so much desired by our people.

John Thomas, familiarly known as "Triggy," died at the hospital about two weeks ago. He was 38 years of age, and was well known in the southern portion of this county, where he followed mining for many years.

About two sections of land near the head waters of Kern River, in what is known as the Monache Meadows have been, on recommendation of the Geological Survey, selected as a site for a reservoir, under the Act of Congress dated October 2, 1888. All lands so selected are reserved from settlement or entry.

Another Victim.

Mr. Joshua Brady was in Independence last week on land business. He showed a receipt from W. H. Martin for $320, in payment for Sec. 32, Twp. 16 S, R. 36 E., M. D. M. Only 160 acres in that section have been surveyed and the entire section is in the Mt Whitney Military Reservation, and is not subject to settlement or entry. He states that Martin told him he would make out the papers and send them direct to Washington, that it was not necessary to have anything to do with the local Land Office. This same Martin, has or did have an office in the Flood building, on Market street, San Francisco, is a bilk, and has found many victims judging from all reports received of him. Most of his dupes are men of moderate means and not posted in land matters. We are informed that steps will be taken to protect the public from the evil doings of this man.

Removal of Elliott.

Before the decision was rendered in the Elliott case by the Supreme Court the Sheriff's office received word that in case Elliott got a new trial the people would not allow him to leave the county. After the decision was rendered the Sheriff received information from Bishop that a movement was on foot to lynch Elliott. No attention was paid to this, but on the 15th inst. a well known citizen of this county informed the Under-Sheriff that on the preceding night a number of men had collected at a certain ranch, not far from Independence, with the intention of coming to independence and lynching Elliott. Some parties who had promised to take a hand in the business failed to meet at the appointed time and place. Those who did meet decided to postpone proceedings because they thought they were not strong enough to make the attack. The informer further stated he knew most of the parties and that they are influential citizens. Upon this and other information received the Under-Sheriff made an application, in due form, for an order transferring Elliott to some other jail. The order was made, appointing and designating the jail of Kern county as a safe place for the detention of Elliott. Last Thursday about 6:30 p. m., immediately after the order was made, the Under-Sheriff started for Bakersfield via Mojave with the prisoner, and turned him over to the Sheriff of that County last Saturday night.

BISHOP CORRESPONDENCE.

Editor Independent: The stirring events of the last two or perhaps the last three weeks having completely knocked your correspondent topsy-turvey, he now takes pleasure in gathering himself to relate the incidents thereof.

Our Fair which was in every respect a most complete and gratifying success, nevertheless, was innocently of course, the cause of some serious dissension in the minds of the stolid and conservative burghers of this ancient and honorable vicinage, known in classical language as "Gospel Swamp."

Fortunately or unfortunately as the case may be, God in his wisdom, I suppose, moulded the aforesaid burghers of the aforesaid vicinage out of clay of exceedingly varying temper and quality, removed by as many degrees of difference as the adamantine rock and the quivering aspen leaf. On the question of whiskey yes, or whiskey no, their voices have never been unanimous, and herein is the rock whereon they split, and apropos; this neither verges, borders nor approaches the wonderful nor mysterious. When we reflect on the history of the past, or even cast our eyes along the panorama of the present, we will in no wise wonder that the ordinary institutions of humanity such as the Eastern Slope Agricultural Fair, should be too fragile to withstand the disrupting power of his majesty, King Alcohol, before whom so many bow in reverence; yea, fall prone to the earth. When we reflect that he has wrestled with kings, princes, prelates, potentates and less notable specimens of God's noble works, and in every case his majesty has won the fight when fought to a finish, it is not wonderful that the devotees who worshipped at his shrine awaited confidently, like prophets in the olden time, to see that Jehovah, and not Baal, was God.

Now some of the aforesaid clay figures delight to bask in the smiles of this august monarch, which smile is materialized into a liquid of most pleasant flavor and which fills the mind, if any remains, with the most pleasant fancies, but afterwards with more grave and serious reflections, and to banish those serious reflections, and dull care generally, it is not unusual to take another smile, and even smile and smile again and be a villain still. David was to be found daily in the house of the Lord, but the temples wherein this deity is worshipped are thronged far into the night, while the rising sun often greets the forms of his devotees humbly prostrated on the earth, meekly and almost unconsciously glorifying their master, but you must have heard about him yourself.

But to leave out all religious matters and return to the thread of our narrative, as the novelist would say, many of the burghers alluded to in the first part of the present chapter believe so devoutly in this deity that they will never suffer themselves, nor any of them, to go beyond the reach of his beneficent smile, whose smile has been vulgarly called whiskey, barley bree, rock and rye and fire water, while in classical language it has been styled "refined ruin," "distilled damnation" and the like, but as our epistle is intended to reach the hovel as well as the palace, and to call not the righteous, but sinners, it will be couched in the ordinary vernacular, in which the aforesaid smile is known as whiskey, said to be a key that will open any door.

The aforesaid devotees are so enthusiastic that they can scarcely hear, see, smell or even taste anything but whiskey.

An old gentleman once told your correspondent that the people of Newfoundland were the greatest people for whiskey that he ever saw or even heard of, that with them it was whiskey for dinner, whiskey for breakfast and whiskey for supper, whiskey inside of them and whiskey outside of them, but added the old gentleman, "Now, I believe they are not so bad, I'm tould they'll take a little wather;" but the average Bishop Creeker is made of sterner stuff, does nothing by halves, in the language of the psalmist, goes the whole hog or none, and believes in water for cooking, irrigating and other industrial purposes.

In harmony with the above many (comparatively) were of the opinion that a temporary tabernacle should be erected on the grounds of the Association, wherein thirsty souls might drink deep and long, and whereby many shekels might be accumulated. In former years these devotees filled their cup to overflowing, then emptied the aforesaid cup into themselves, this operation was repeated many times, in hopes that the gentle influence would not depart before their return from the arid region round about the track, but while perishing souls were loudly calling for the water of life, (said to be the life itself), this was found to be entirely inadequate to the demands of a few high-souled individuals who had determined to martyr themselves in the cause.

But the heathen raged and said vain things and plotted against the aforesaid king and his anointed (with whiskey) and sought hard to compass his and their destruction, by whatever means their unholy purpose might be accomplished. Evil awaits not long for an opportunity and accordingly the unbelieving portion of the stockholders, whose name, by the way, is legion, sought the opportunity of the annual election to forbid the generous outpouring of the spirit, and any and all outpouring whatever by a clause to that effect in the by-laws of the corporation, and to cast from the place wherein he officiated in said corporation, one of the most faithful high priests that ever assisted in the outpouring of the spirit or ministered in the temple of Bacchus. To show the almost total depravity of human nature, and the unreasonable and sinful opposition to things spiritual, your correspondent will state that fourteen hundred and seventy odd shares of the stock of the corporation were voted against the outpouring of the spirit on the grounds of the corporation, and about three hundred and forty in favor of spiritual consolation on the aforesaid grounds, whereat the faithful spiritualists waxed exceedingly wroth, and many even swore in their wrath "By G——d they would'nt stand it."

But the tears of heaven that fall alike on the just and unjust, last night descended not in copious showers, but in fierce torrents, reminding us that the Father above looks down in mercy and pity, even on those who strive against him, and by the way as he made them himself it would'nt do to find too much fault with them.

CASSIUS.

P. S. If you think this might awaken an interest in the bosoms of sinners as to the matters and things above stated I'll have this copyrighted, for they say the soul of a sinner is above price, and should it be the means of salvation to two or three of them, we would make our everlasting pile out of it.

[Copyrighted by Charles J. Bellamy, and published by arrangement with him.]

The chapel door stood open, and he stopped and looked in. It was here Bertha and he were to have been married. And it would have been before this—but now. He saw the place where they would have stood together. The church was empty and he walked softly in, as if afraid of disturbing the ghosts of his dead hopes, who haunted yet, perhaps, the sacred spot they glorified in all the dreams of his early manhood. He walked wearily up the echoing aisle and threw himself into a seat. He bowed his head upon the back of the pew in front of him. Had he no shame to come to the rescue of his broken heart? would he grieve forever over a woman that had become another man's wife? She had called on the laws of the land for her protection; he had no right to even think of her now. She was shut away from him forever. It had become a sin for him now to long for her, though she had been so nearly his own wife. There was no place in the world for unmated lovers like him. If she had not married that man! How strange that he had heard nothing of that marriage; her note had not mentioned it, and no one had spoken of it since. Why, his belief in her purity was so absolute he had not even thought to question her marriage, and now it was like a guilty thing, that he permitted himself to entertain for a moment terrible fears. What vengeance would be stern and relentless enough for him who had wrecked the noblest womanhood in the world, who had sullied a purity like an angel's, and insulted a sacred dignity like Bertha's? Oh, it could not be; no man on earth could have been so bold, so impious. How wild his imagination had become.

"Oh, I didn't know but it was young Breton and that Bertha Ellingsworth that was going to be married." Two graceless women had come in and seated themselves in a neighboring pew. Philip had been thinking so intensely until now that an earthquake would hardly have disturbed him.

"That'll never be," giggled the other; "you don't say you didn't know she eloped with that Curran fellow, though it's been kept pretty still?"

"Do tell?" Philip shuddered. Why were creatures like these permitted to touch names like Bertha's? "Married another chap, eh? Well, young Breton never was much for looks, anyhow."

"Married?" Philip started at her tone. "Who said she was married? The shoe's on the other foot. She aint married at all. Handsome fellow like him has a wife in every town, such as they be. That proud minx is only one on 'em." How they rolled the shameful story, like a sweet morsel under their tongues, as if it relieved the blackness of their contemptible souls, that one woman more had singed her angel wings in the pitiless flame of disgrace.

Philip had struggled to his feet. The women blushed like fire and tried to look unconscious, but he did not even glance at them as he moved down the aisle. He could not see very well. Was the chapel full as it seemed? and was that an usher in white kids who was coming toward him and saying:

"Just one minute more; the bridal couple are just coming in."

Bolt upright he sat where he had been guided, and saw as in a dream a white phantom of a woman it seemed and a black shadow of a man go by. "Married? who said she was married? Ah! it was horrible! Perhaps they two, those women fiends, were all that knew the shameful secret. Would it do any good to pray them for the mercy of God to keep it? Would money hire a woman to keep a disgrace that had fallen on a fair sister's name?"

"Aren't you going to salute the bride?" smiled an acquaintance. "This is the marriage of Labor and Capital at last." He had perpetrated his witticism a dozen times at least, and this was the first hearer who had not laughed. Jane Graves and Silas Ellingsworth, Bertha's father—were they mad, or was he?"

"I am ill," he muttered incoherently, as he pushed his way almost roughly out.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE NEW STOCK COMPANY.

The terrible seeds of suspicion sown in Philip Breton's mind bore the bitterest fruits through the dreary winter months. No efforts of his will, nor course of reasoning could comfort him. For a moment he might find relief, but his torment would only return afresh. Humanity are slow to believe good of fellow creatures, but nothing seemed too bad to be true. He thought it might have calmed him to have been assured even of the worst. He believed that he might despise the woman he had elevated to the highest pinnacle of his ideal temple of womanhood, if she had made so little of the most sacred gift of God. But it would have been a violence to his feelings to inquire of those who must know. Her father must know, but his smiling face will reveal nothing, and his very reserve was peopled with horrors for Philip. His wife Jane must know, too, but he could not bear to think of the malicious pleasure she would take in detailing the shameful story to him. She would sate her hate in his misery. But what if it were not a shameful story? Still he could not form his lips to ask. The humiliation of such a question from him, a discarded lover, about her at whose feet he had been proud to sit, shocked him into silence. He even dreaded lest they might speak to him of her, although it had been months since he had heard Bertha's name once breathed.

One evening at the very close of the winter, Philip Breton called a meeting of his help, and the old market hall was packed from door to platform. Reporters were planted by their tables, to catch every word of the mysterious proceedings. Representatives from all the factories in the country elbowed the crowd for their three feet of standing room, eager to learn some new device for making money out of their help as good as the other. But the great audience was strangely silent. It knew not what to expect. Perhaps the economical mill owner was going to announce a new reduction in their wages; everybody said he was reducing everywhere. The feeling in their hearts was more of fear than hope, and it was a look of piteous terror, almost, that they cast at the slight form in black, that came forward on the platform. They reminded Philip of a flock of frightened sheep that had never had a shepherd. Then he thought of a great army massed before the smoking cannon mouth, an army that had never had a general. He saw they feared him.

"I have been for a long time trying to think of some way to make your lives more fair for you, and yet be fair to myself and my class. I have been cutting on expenses to make the whole business machinery as economical as I knew. Now, at last I am ready to take you into my confidence and make you a proposal."

There was a stir in the great audience, as if every man changed his position at the same moment, so as to be sure not to lose one precious word of the new gospel.

"I cannot feel that I ought to give you anything. And I cannot see that it would be reasonable to pay more wages than others pay; that is, than you have now."

A hush had fallen upon the people like death. There was no hope for them, then. Still the speaker went on.

"But if your labor is profitable to me, so that I can pay you your price, and pay my other expenses, and pay me for the time I give to the business what such service as I do is paid elsewhere, and then have something besides"——

The reporters dropped their pens in astonment; was the man mad?

"I am disposed to think that you have earned a share in it." He paused to catch his breath, and one could have heard a pin fall in that crowded room. "My capital should be allowed for, too. In a word, I propose to divide the profits of my mill, after all expenses are paid, into two equal parts hereafter, one for labor, yours and mine, and one for the interest on my money. The part which belongs to labor will be distributed according to the worth of each one's year's work. The one that earns the largest year's pay will have the largest per cent. of that dividend. We shall all be stockholders together, each with a share large or small according to the value of his work."

The building trembled with the roar of applause that went up, and it was several moments before Philip could make himself heard again. He had thought there was nothing left in his life, with love gone out of it, but as he stood that moment with the glad shouts of the poor ringing in his ears, and felt he had led them out of bondage, his heart thrilled with a proud joy that was almost ecstasy. His wealth had brought him a happiness that made even a life like his worth living, had conferred on him a glorious sense of the dignity of manhood which lifted him as on wings.

They must listen while he explained the terms of his plan more fully. He motioned to a dozen boys and took a printed sheet of paper from the pile of similar sheets which he ordered distributed among the workmen. He then read aloud the following from the paper in his hand:

The first divided will be distributed Aug. 1 for the year ending July 1. The surplus is $200,000; $100,000 is set apart as the allowance for capital invested, which leaves $100,000, to be distributed to the labor in proportion to the wages or salary earned by each. The whole amount of wages and salaries earned in the mills was about $320,000. Therefore the rate per cent. of dividend is about 27 7-10 to be calculated on the wages or salary of each man, woman and child as shown by the paymaster's book for the past year. For example, the man whom the pay roll shows to have earned $300 for his year's work, will receive 27 7-10 per cent. on $300 in addition, or about $85.10 as his dividend. The paymaster, who received a salary of $2,000, will receive about $541, and as manager worth a salary of $5,000, I shall receive more than twice the dividend of the paymaster. Certain restrictions will be imposed. First, only one-half of the annual dividend will be in cash, for it would hurt the interests of the mill to withdraw so much from the business. The other half will be in stock, which will draw dividends as the rest of the capital. Second, stock cannot be transferred except to operatives, but will be redeemed at the counting room, after notice, when holders leave the mills, as stock will yield dividends only while holders work in the mills. Holders of stock may hold meetings and choose a committee to examine the books of the company, before the annual distribution of dividends.

When Philip Breton sat down a noisy hum of voices followed as the people read and commented upon the prospectus. The figures looked anything but dull to them. The bright possibilities that came up before their imaginations as they read were such as no gentle cadence of poetry could have given them. Apparently they would never have tired of reading the wonderful words of hope and good cheer over and over, except that the outer door swung open and a tall man's form entered. Philip Breton from the platform saw it and the pride sickened on his heart. The crowd about the door passed the whisper around, and it was hardly one short minute when the building shook again with cheers as they shouted the name of Curran.

Yes, it was he who pushed his way well into the room, and then stopped and took one of the printed sheets, as if he were unconscious of their cheering, and read till his face, that had looked so stern and terrible, softened like a child. Then he mounted a settee for his platform and uncovered his head with a new grace that became him as well as his strength. The old bitterness had gone from his lips; it had given place to a touching sadness that sobered every face that was turned toward him.

"He means to deal well by you; he wants to make you shareholders in your work." Philip had risen excitedly to his feet. The sight of the man who had been with Bertha, who came perhaps but this instant from the woman he had wronged so terribly, was at first almost maddening to him. Ah, how grand and beautiful he was, with his deep mighty chest and shoulders, and his limbs like pillars of some temple. There were no laws for such men as he; the holiest and purest of women love to make themselves base and common things to win smiles from his proud eyes, and men forget their vengeance, and only remember how small and mean they seem before him. But who could look at his melancholy face and the calm dignity that rested upon him always, and believe he could be vile? Yet perhaps nothing was vile or low to him, and even sin was glorified in his eyes when it suited his caprice to sin.

Philip had come to the very edge of the platform and beckoned a friend to him. "Do you see the man talking—the man with the auburn hair curling about his neck? no, don't look yet," his voice was husky with excitement. "Get behind him while he is talking and stop him before he goes out. I must see him and speak with him; I would rather $10,000 than lose him. Quick, now." As Philip sat down again and watched his friend trying to make his way through the close packed crowd he heard Curran's voice again. What was there changed in it? It had lost its old ring, there was a queer drag in it sometimes, and when he used to raise his voice till every nerve tingled for sympathy, he seemed now to let it fall, and his long, sonorous sentences died down at the end like a muffled bell.

"If others were like him," he was saying, "the reform I would die for would come soon, would be upon us."

How slow his friend moved. Philip actually hated the people who were too stupid to get out of his messenger's way.

Had Curran finished, was this all that was left of his eloquence? Yes, he was stepping down and moving toward the door. Philip's friend was almost there, the man must not escape thus, and plunge again with the woman whose life he had blasted into the obscurity he seemed to love. Philip leaped to his feet and almost shouted to the people. All turned their faces expectantly toward him, Curran with the rest his pale worn face. Philip's friend was come almost to him now. If Curran could only be detained for one moment more.

"It will of course be for the interest of all of you," he knew he was talking weakly, but it was no matter, "to earn the most wages you can, to lose the fewest day, to turn off the most piece work." Of course, he spoke too stupidly; Curran turned on his heel and moved toward the door. Almost instantly then Philip Breton gave a sudden short bow to the audience and disappeared back of the platform. He bounded down the narrow stairs, four at a time, and rushed around to the front of the building like one mad, to stare for a moment in the faces of the escaping crowd. Then, wilder than ever at the thought that Curran might have gone out among the first, he ran back and forth after one group and another, but all in vain. Then he forced himself to stop and think, and forthwith made inquiries for Curran's boarding place. He reached the place at last and ran breathlessly up the stairs. In another moment he would know the truth if it killed him to bear it. He must remove the poisonous shadow of suspicion that was polluting all the holiest precincts of his nature. Certainty was better far, for the nerves can brace themselves against the clearly defined features of ever so hideous a monster; far better certainly than this crawling slimy terror that made him ashamed of a manhood that could cherish it. He dared ask Curran for the truth, he did not shrink from it. If the man were innocent he might strike him down for the insult to the purity of his wife. Philip thought such atonement would seem just and proper. But if he were guilty, ah, if Bertha was guilty through him what death was terrible enough for his penalty!

A portly woman, with the unmistakable expression of the expectant boarding mistress on her face and in her attitude, met the pale faced young man at the top of the stairs. She did not recognize the proprietor of the Breton mills, in his slight form. She would have looked for a man of lofty stature and commanding mien, and not a mere lad whom nobody would glance twice at on the street.

"Where is Curran? I—I want him."

"Why, he's just gone; he drove off to Lewiston."

"To Lewiston? Are you sure?" Why, this must be some important personage after all, he was so peremptory. Poor people can bully, but there is a shamefacedness or an over affectation of authority that betrays them; their self consciousness lets the whole secret out.

"Either Lewiston or Raleigh; I can't tell, really, sir. Shall I get you a carriage, Mr.—Mr.?"

"Two horses and a buggy; a driver, too. Tell them it is for Mr. Breton; and," he shouted after the woman, "if they give me a poor horse he will be dead before they ever see him again."

It seemed an hour before the horses drew up before the boarding house door, and another hour before they had left the village behind. Then the little patience Philip had forsook him. He caught the reins from the astonished driver, and at the threatening snap of the whip the horses took their fastest gait.

It was a little past 9 o'clock the next morning that Philip Breton, pale from a sleepless night, knocked at a low studded door in an ill ventilated tenement house, where they told him Curran lived. Within was Bertha, the high bred woman, wonted to the costliest luxuries of wealth. And she was willing, then, to live in such squalor as this to be with the man she loved. Could change have been cruel enough to have touched her? Perhaps an infant hung hungrily on her bosom, and Curran, fallen back into his vulgar traditions, lounged in red flannel shirt sleeves in her presence. Could he bear the sight? But she might be alone; his heart beat faster with terror and hope. She would lift her sweet eyes pleasantly to him—so easy it is for women to forget the agony they have caused. She would hold out her shapely hand to him, but it would be stained and worn from hardships. Should he fall at her feet? Would he be able to remember she was another's—dead to him?

He knocked again, possibly no one was at home.

"Come in." It was a man's voice.

As Philip opened the door he saw the man he sought by the window, eagerly looking up and down the street, as if waiting for some sign. There was no guilty fear or shame in the calm face that was turned to his visitor.

"Breton." He gave him his hand with hearty good will. "Somehow I could not speak last night, but you have begun a noble work. Why, I had rather feel the proud satisfaction you must have, I would rather be in your place than the greatest man in the whole world."

Philip was afraid to look about him. Perhaps Bertha had no wish to speak to him, or else she was not here; there was no atmosphere of a woman's love and care in the place, somehow. But Curran went on in his quick, eager way, "The rich men have the most glorious privilege ever men had. Each man of wealth can let the fountains of light and joy into the lives of a village in some way which shall make his name blessed forever. Instead of that, whole generations of us have to break ourselves in pieces in the effort to wear away their rock. We fail, as the wretched 2,000 creatures who strike here today will fail, to gain one privilege more for ourselves, yet our children may profit from our sacrifices, perhaps, or their children. Anything is better than spiritless, eternal submission."

Philip released his hand from the man's clasp and turned to look about him. No woman's shawl hung on the rack. No baby's shoes or toys were in sight. A man's rude hands had set the chairs in an awkward row. A man's hands made the comfortless looking bed that stood in one corner. There was no soft scent of perfume, such as Bertha would have left behind her if she had but lately gone. Why, Bertha could never have breathed for a moment there. Love can do much, but it cannot make a woman over.

"Where is your wife?" Philip asked in a low, breathless voice. "Bertha."

"Where is your wife?"

The eager look faded from Curran's face, and his blue eyes grew troubled. For an instant he did not answer, but stood with folded arms gazing out into the street.

"What is a wife?" he said at last. "A woman who loves a man and lives in his love, who pines in his absence and listens to the coming of his foot steps, as the sweetest music in the world to her; to whom all the gifts of life would be nothing without him; to whom poverty and disgrace would lose their hatefulness if he shared them. A wife is a sweetheart, a hundred times tenderer and happier." His voice grew bitter and hard for a moment as he added, "No, I have no wife, Bertha has left me."

He heard a shout, and a score of hurrying forms rushed by his window. He turned from the window in a sudden passion of excitement.

"The strike has begun. What pity do the rich deserve? Even their women are taught only to break honest men's hearts. They are beautiful as the angels of heaven and cruel and pitiless as the angels of hell."

"But wait," cried Philip, catching him by the arm. Curran had not yet spoken the longed for words to protect Bertha's name from the insult of another suspicious thought. But a shout rolled up from the street, and another and another in quick succession. Curran shook him off and, catching his hat from the table, sprang down the stairs.

The Russian nobles are rushing to bankruptcy in great numbers. The credit bank for lending money to them on mortgage of their land, established by the Government two or three years ago has now no less than 2,000 estates which will have to be sold by public auction at the end of this year for non-payment of interest on loans.

ANOTHER FORTUNATE MAN.

A Young Breaker Boy at Plymouth Draws a Prize of $5,000.

Upon being informed that a young man in Plymouth, by the name of Herman Barney, had drawn a $5,000 prize in the Louisiana State Lottery, our reporter was instructed to interview him and learn the truth in regard to the report. He found Mr. Barney at the East End Store, on Welsh Hill, a suburb of Plymouth, and about four miles from this city. Mr. Barney is a pleasant young gentleman of about twenty-three years of age. After stating his business the reporter proceeded to interview him.

Rep. "There is a story out, Mr. Barney, to the effect that you have been quite fortunate in a Louisiana State Lottery investment. Is there any truth in the report?" was my first question.

"Yes, sir," he replied, "I was fortunate enough to draw $5,000 in the July drawing."

"What was the number of your ticket?" I next asked him.

"I held ticket No. 58,607 which drew one-twentieth of the second capital prize of $100,000."

"Were any other persons interested with you in your investment?"

"Yes, sir, Andrew Brennan and Logan Harris, both friends of mine, had been sending for tickets every month for some time, and last July I thought I would invest a dollar and see if I could not hit it.

"Which you did, fortunately for you. Did your friends realize anything from their venture?"

"No sir, only in this way. We made an agreement that if either of us should draw anything not less than $5,000, the lucky one should pay the other two one month's wages and also pay the expenses of all three for a month's trip to the seashore."

"Did you take the trip?"

"Not as yet, but we may go in September. But we settled our agreement by my giving them each one hundred dollars. Now, if we go to the seashore each man must pay his own expenses."

"Was this your first investment?"

"Yes sir, however I have sent for a ticket in the September drawing."

Mr. Barney also told me that he had lived there all his life, and had never worked, except in a breaker, up to last July. Then he left, and does not intend to work in one again, for he said, "I have bought one lot with a house on it, and two vacant lots on which I intend building two single houses. When these are completed I will have three dwellings that will bring me in fifteen dollars per month each, and that ought to keep me. Besides I have kept some of the money by me, and if I see a good opportunity to invest to advantage, will do so.—Wilkesbarre (Pa.) Telephone, August 24.

King Humbert, before leaving Naples, ordered that a bronze wreath should as soon as possible be deposited on Garibaldi's grave in place of the flowers he had put there. He said: "Our country and my house owe so much to Garibaldi that this island must bear from myself and my son a tribute of everlasting gratitude."

Tacoma is receiving large additions to its prison inmates, through the influx of desperate characters who have gone to that section to prey upon the hop-pickers in the Puyallup Valley. Burglaries and robberies have been frequent of late, and about one hundred sheriff's deputies have been placed at points along the river.

Things are about even; if you are a boy it is the woodbox, and if you are a girl it is the dishes.

SWEPT BY THE TIDE OF POPULARITY

To the topmost pinnacle of success, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters stands a shining proof of what genuine merit, backed by the living force of proven facts, can attain. The North and South American continents, Europe, Australia, the West Indies, Guatemala, and Mexico have all contributed wide patronage and testimony of the most favorable kind—but unsolicited—to swell the reputation of this sterling remedy. Among the maladies for which the most convincing public and professional testimony proves that it is a benign curative, are chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague and gue cake, dyspepsia, liver complaint, nervousness, debility, kidney and bladder complaints. It mitigates the infirmities of age, hastens convalescence, has a tendency to prevent ill consequences from exposure and exhaustion. Persons of sedentary habits and laborious occupations will find it an ever useful tonic.

For three months I was under the care of an eminent doctor at Albany, but constantly growing worse, went home to die. At this time I was induced to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., and am now robust and strong. The above Picture Represents
CAPTAIN S. GREENWOOD,
Master of the Steamship Kanawha.

About a year ago he observed a strange change in his feelings. He felt tired instead of vigorous; nervous instead of strong. His appetite became poor and his sleep broken. He tried to overcome these feelings, but they would not go. He then noticed pains and irritation in the water channels, and that the fluids passed were often thick and with a scum on top or a brick-dust sediment at the bottom. All these were the sure symptoms of that fearful disease, Catarrh of the Bladder, which has always been considered incurable, and they continued until the Captain was in a terrible condition. But he is the picture of health and vigor to-day, and he owes it entirely to that wonderful medicine, Hunt's Remedy. Capt. Greenwood says: "I am so certain of the great value of Hunt's Remedy, that I always carry a supply on shipboard for the use of my men, and I prescribe it whenever they are ailing. After curing me as it did, and restoring my wife, (whom the best physicians of New York said was dying of tumor,) to perfect health, I swear by it."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

In rythms sweet the poet sings
Of faces fair to see:
His genius stroke he wildly flings
To win our ecstacy.

He writes of mother's whitened hair,
The wrinkles on her brow;
Of other faces waiting there
To greet us home, I trow.

He pens a lay of subtle bliss
Concerning one that's sweet,
Who's waiting with a true love kiss
His lips to fondly meet.

I sing of one that's far above,
'Twill hunger's longing fill—

A new five dollar bill.

TRAILING A THIEF.

A Detective's Long Chase After a Fugitive Cashier.

From Minnesota Through Canada, England, France, Spain and Italy to Switzerland—A Clever Ruse to Avoid Extradition Proceedings.

While a murder is now and then committed without the murderer being brought to justice, and while a proportion of burglars, robbers and embezzlers are bound to escape arrest, from the nature of things, an experience of twenty years in criminal work has satisfied me that no criminal can escape justice if a clue be left to work on, if that clue is persistently followed.

In March, 1865, a man named Vinewood, of Vermont, with another named Adams, of Cincinnati, established a bank in a new town in Minnesota. The former was a bachelor fifty years old, and the latter a young man of twenty-three. Just how they became acquainted I have forgotten, but I believe they first met in a bank in Cincinnati in which Adams was employed as book-keeper. He had $10,000 in cash which a relative had left him, and Vinewood put in $40,000, and a bank with a capital of $50,000 was established. After about a month, when every thing was running smoothly, Vinewood returned to Vermont on business, having the most perfect faith that all would go well in his absence. On the very day he left Adams received deposits from citizens and from the county treasurer aggregating $18,000. The trustees of an institution likewise placed in his vault for safe keeping $20,000 worth of United States bonds.

Up to this date the bank had loaned out about $3,000, and it had $10,000 on deposit in Milwaukee and Chicago. Vinewood left in the morning. That same evening at eight o'clock Adams followed, having taken every dollar in the bank and the securities above mentioned. He left on Sunday night, and of course no one in town could suspect any thing until time for the bank to open on Monday. Then no one knew what had happened or what to do, and no one had Vinewood's address. It was three days before it was known for a fact that Adams had robbed the bank and fled. It was ten days before Vinewood put me on the case and said:

"I want this man run down if it takes ten years and costs me my last cent. Follow him day and night. Do not leave his trail for an hour. I will put $10,000 to your credit in a New York bank, and when that is exhausted I will replace it."

Vinewood was a man of deep feeling, and the robbery had aroused a sense of indignation which could not rest until the robber had been fitly punished. I got several cabinet photographs of Adams as a starter. They all showed him with a mustache. It was likely he would shave that off, and I got a Chicago artist to sketch his face as it would appear without. As he did not wear glasses he would likely put them on as a disguise. I had a sketch made with glasses on his nose and with his straight, long hair cut pretty close. As it was raven black he could not color it. He had gone to Milwaukee and Chicago and checked out every dollar of deposits, and in the latter city he had disposed of the securities for cash. He thus had nearly eighty thousand dollars with him, much of it in small bills. I visited every bank in Chicago, but could not find that he had purchased drafts or exchange. At the express offices there was no record that he had shipped any cash. When he left the bank he only had the sachel in which he was carrying the money. He therefore had no change of clothing. After visiting seven or eight different hotels in Chicago I found where he had registered as "Burt J. Smith, St. Paul." He had made but a slight attempt to disguise his handwriting. He had remained at the hotel a part of the afternoon and over night. Instead of purchasing a trunk he had bought a new suit of clothes and taken his old ones out and sold them second-hand. The new suit was entirely of gray, while his old one was black. This made such a change in his looks that remarks were made when he came to pay his bills.

Two square from the hotel, on the way to the Lake Shore Depot, was a barber shop. I reasoned that Adams would seek to get rid of that mustache before he left Chicago, and after he had left the hotel I could only guess which way he went, but I meant to cover all routes. The barber in the first chair in the shop had all the information wanted. Adams had come in there with his sachel, complained of a sore lip, and had his mustache shaved off. He had in his hand a folder of the Lake Shore road. After the mustache was off he had his hair shingled, and the change in his looks was considerable. The barber had looked him over pretty closely, and had noticed a scar on his neck back of the right ear, as well as a mole on the left cheek, which had been touched out of the negative. I found no trace of him at the depot, but I bought my ticket to Cleveland on theory. Nine times out of ten the criminal who skips from a small town goes to a city to hide. He imagines that in the rush and confusion he will be passed by. Adams might stop in Toledo or Sandusky, but I took my chances on that.

On reaching Cleveland I made inquiries of all the depot officials, but no one had seen him. I went to all the hotels, but he was not registered. I visited all the trunk and clothing stores, but no one remembered a person of his description. I was in despair, when it occurred to me to visit the steamboat offices. At the second place where I called I discovered that he had bought a ticket by the Lake Superior Line for Port Huron. He had waited around for several hours, and had mentioned to at least one person that he had relatives in Port Huron. He had no trunk, but while waiting had bought a new collar and necktie, and had also been shaved again. I went to Port Huron by rail, and there on a hotel register in Adams' handwriting I found the name of "Charles M. Shaw, Cleve., Ohio." Inside of three hours I discovered that he had taken a Grand Trunk train to Hamilton, Ont. At Hamilton I did not have to go out of the depot for information. He had waited two or three hours and taken a train for Buffalo. Here he had got in the way of a baggage truck and had his foot hurt, and the row he made about it caused several officials to remember him.

At Buffalo I expected to lose the trail and have a hard task to pick it up again, and I was not disappointed. I was there two days before I found that Adams had been driven to a boarding-house on Upper Main street, and had lain by for three days with his lame foot. After inquiring of half a hundred hackmen I finally found the right one. Adams had gone to this house on the recommendation of a boarder whom he met on the train. He pretended there to live in New Hampshire, and to be returning home from his cattle ranch in New Mexico. He further pretended to have lost his trunk in a smash-up, and before leaving he bought one, and a lot of clothing. He now changed to a black felt hat and a tweed suit, and gave his name as "L. M. Davis." No one in the house knew what train he took, but I found the expressman who handled his trunk and had it checked for Harrisburg.

At Harrisburg Adams waited in the depot for three hours, and then bought a ticket for Philadelphia. He remained there at the Bingham House two days, and then departed for Baltimore. At Baltimore he went to a boarding house for three days, and it took me a week to discover this, and to learn that he had taken a steamer for New York City, booking his name as Henry Corning. I went to New York by train, and there found he had sailed for Liverpool. I was now two full weeks behind him, but more determined than when the chase began. I picked up four days on him at Liverpool, because he had remained there that long before going to London. He stayed two days only in London before going to Paris. I looked for him in the latter city for five days before I got any trace, and then it was to learn that he had departed for Bordeaux. He was now traveling as an American tourist, had invested in a fine wardrobe, and carried the sachel in his trunk. Its contents were seen by the customs officers in Liverpool and Paris, but he then pretended to be an agent of the Federal Government buying supplies.

At Bordeaux Adams took a sailing ship for Oporto, Spain. He was only eight days ahead of me when he sailed, but when I reached Oporto by the shortest route it was to find that he had departed by steamer for Naples. He remained there five days, and when I appeared and picked up his trail he was only four days ahead, but had gone to Milan. I was only two days behind him there, but he crossed into France, stopped two days in Lyons, went on to Paris, and I was again a full week behind him. I felt that he would now settle down, having dodged about until he was satisfied that no one could track him. I had by this time become pretty well acquainted with his tastes and characteristics. He had of late been spending the stolen funds quite freely, and at Lyons he picked up a woman who went to Paris with him. I returned to Lyons and found who the girl was. She was described as a handsome and captivating Parisian who had come down in search of adventure, and it was known to several that she had made a conquest of the American. After a patient search I found a girl who knew her well, and she explained:

"She fell in love with the American for his money. She will hang to him as long as it lasts. She told me her plans. They are to go to Switzerland for a month, and will then return to Paris for the fall and winter. She would want a week in Paris to get ready for the trip. By this time they are in Switzerland."

I returned to Paris and at once set out for Switzerland, and in two days I was full on their trail. They passed as a bridal couple, and the good looks of the bride caused every body to remember them. I knew that the long chase was nearing its end, and at the same time my anxiety became greater. If Adams had the sand to "kick," he had the money to fight off extradition. One afternoon I reached a hamlet under the shadow of Mont Blanc to find that I had run the fox to earth. He was there registered as "Harry Grafton and wife, New York, U. S. A." As I was the only arrival by the stage, but few noticed me. Two hours later I found Adams alone with his cigar on the veranda, and, drawing up a chair, I bluntly asked:

"Well, how much have you got left?"

"What do you mean, sir?" he demanded, but in a voice betraying trepidation.

"Adams, I have followed you over every mile of your wanderings," I continued. "I am here to take you back to Minnesota for trial."

"But I won't go. You can't extradite me for robbery."

"But I can for murder. You killed Mr. Vinewood in cold blood, and his body was discovered in the bank."

"So help me Heaven, I did not."

"Then who did?"

"Why, he had gone East before I left."

"That is too thin. All the evidence points your way. Will you return without a fight, or will you furnish additional proofs of your guilt by putting me to trouble?"

In an hour he agreed to go. To find himself charged with a murder of which he was innocent overshadowed the robbery of which he was guilty, and he was really anxious to return and prove his innocence of the grave charge. He had spent about $3,000 of the money; the rest was safe and came back with us. He never made me the least trouble on the way, and it was only when he found Vinewood alive and understood the trick that he grew wrathy. He had $7,000 of his own money, and he employed such legal talent that the law was twisted and turned and the jury wrestled with until he finally got clear.—N. Y. Sun.

UNDER A LION'S PAW.

The Thrilling Experience of a Wild Animal Hunter.

"While trapping lions in the Hottentot country for the Hamburg animal house," said Lawrence J. Raymond, a wild animal hunter, "I had opportunities for seeing the king of beasts at his best and for making close observations of his character. No two lions are alike, except in a few leading traits, any more than two men are alike. Every lion is supposed to roar at night when abroad after prey, but not half of them do so. When you read of one charging into a camp you praise his courage, but for every one such case I can show ten where the lion skulked about like a dog. You never find him twice alike. There are plenty of instances where men have been seized by lions and have lived to relate the particulars, though no two agree as to the sensations. I had been out one afternoon with some of the natives to prepare a bait in a rocky ravine. We had built a stout pen of rocks and logs and placed a calf as a bait. The sun was nearly down as we started for camp, and no one had the least suspicion of the presence of danger until a lion, which had been couched beside a bush, sprang out and knocked me down.

"I can say without conceit that I was fairly cool. It had come so suddenly that I had not had time to get 'rattled.' Had I moved my arm to get my pistol the beast would have lowered his head and seized my throat. So long as I lay quiet he would reason that I was dead and give his attention to the natives.

"All of a sudden I barked out like a dog, followed by a growl, and that beast jumped twenty feet in his surprise. He came down between me and the natives and I turned enough to see that his tail was down and he was scared. I uttered more barks and growls, but without moving a hand, and after making a circle clear around me the lion suddenly bolted and went off with a scare that would last him a week."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

She Saw the Rainbow.

An April afternoon it was, and there was a decided moisture in the air. But the lovers seemed impervious to the elements, as they hung carelessly over the fence of the back yard, and said nothing to each other with great alertness, for the space of fifteen or twenty minutes. When at last the young damsel re-entered the paternal dwelling the domestic conundrum she encountered was shot off in this summary fashion:

"Where have you been all this time, Mary Jane? Does it take you half an hour to shake the crumbs out of a table-cloth?"

"No, mamma," demurely replied the ingenious miss; "but I remained out to see the beautiful and charming rainbeaux."—Luther G. Riggs, in St. Louis Magazine.

—The celebrated Kong mountains of Africa are about to follow the Mountains of the Moon, which have been expunged from the map, says the Philadelphia Times. These mountains were supposed to be stretched across Africa for ten degrees of longitude, about two hundred miles north of the Gulf of Guinea. Captain Binger, lately returned from nearly two years of explorations in the almost unknown region north of the Gulf of Guinea, says there is no such range as the Kong mountains.

—A Winnipeg man, speaking of the sudden changes of the climate of Manitoba, remarked that one day it was so cold that the mercury fell so suddenly that it knocked the bottom out of the thermometer; and the next day it rose so rapidly that it sent the top of the glass bang against the ceiling.—Arkansaw Traveler.

LOVE AND MUSIC.

The Apparently Inseparable Union Existing Between Them.

That straight-faced gentleman, Haydn, whose pious habit of inscribing his scores with bits of reverent Latin, will go down to posterity, and who, if this failed, would always be held sacred for his oratorio, "The Creation"—even he fell in love with Mlle. Boselli, despite his wife and his piety. He had her portrait painted, and satisfied all her little whims and fancies, which, like those of all prime donne, were not, of course, inexpensive ones. Good old, but inconstant Haydn! Remembering the predilection his wife—Keller the barber's daughter—had for priests and monks, he can not well be blamed for seeking consolation in the society of one of his most charming singers. It is to be hoped he stopped here, though, from quite a famous compliment which he paid Mrs. Billington, it is to be feared he possessed the knack of ingratiating himself into the favor of the fair sex generally. Reynolds had painted the songstress as Cecilia listening to Celestial music. "Yes," said Haydn, upon being asked for his opinion, "it is, indeed, a beautiful picture—just like her; but—what a mistake." "Where?" inquired the painter. "Why, you have painted her listening to the angels, when you ought to have represented the angels listening to her." By way of extenuation for Haydn, it must be admitted that all the master musicians have been frail in the matter of love and beauty. Beethoven's love letters constitute quite a study in passionate endurance, and are much more creditable to him than the story of his erasing the young English musician Bridgetower's name from the dedication of the famous sonata in A, and substituting that of Kreutzer, a man whom he had never seen, because he had had some quarrel with Bridgetower about a girl—a version of the story, by the way, which is not Beethoven's. Chopin, we know, pined away for George Sand; Dussek was carried off by a Polish Princess; Stradella lost his life through becoming enamored of Hortensia, a strikingly beautiful Roman lady; Marcello became the victim of a hopeless passion for Leonora Manfrotti; Mark Smeaton, an English musician of the sixteenth century, paid the block penalty on Tower Hill for an indiscreet lingering after Anne Boleyn; Bellini expired of a broken heart for a sweetheart whose father would not let her have him; Leonardo da Vinci died at the hand of his mistress; and there are endless other instances not less tragic—others happier in every way—arising out of this apparently inseparable union of love and music.—Gentleman's Magazine.

CURED BY FRIGHT.

An Original Method of Curing Chills and Fever.

The physician who believes that mind and matter act in unison may remember how that truly celebrated great man, Boerhaave, on a certain occasion, cured the ague. That complaint was very prevalent in his neighborhood, and he had treated it with indifferent success, when his noble conceptions of the united agency of mind and matter suggested the following treatment: He desired about a dozen patients, whose fit of the ague came on about the hour of the meridian, to come to him at ten o'clock. They were shown into the same room, and after a little while were informed that the doctor was busy and would wait upon them as soon as possible. At the time the attendant addressed them he placed a number of irons in the fire, which he increased to a considerable size. After the eleventh hour the servant again entered the room, apologied again for the doctor's absence, and turned and paid great attention to the irons that were heating. One of the patients inquired the use of irons, and was informed that they were heating for the purpose of an operation on the patients who had the ague. This was soon whispered from the one to the other. The man had left the room, the doctor came not; and more and more were their attentions directed toward the now red-hot irons. Surmise and conjecture had a strong base to play upon; the red-hot irons were for the ague-patients; every one felt the coming crisis of his own case. They looked and walked about the room; they were soon every one of them in a violent perspiration; and the doctor came not until one o'clock, and the ague-fit came not at all. To his inquiries he found all well; and the time had passed, and not one had upon him the symptoms of his complaint. "And taking them into another room, one by one with care, and caution, and some trifling medicine, he dismissed them, saying that he hoped they would recover without having recourse to any violent remedy. In truth, agitation had excited that apprehenson which had completely cured them of their disorder.—N. Y. Ledger.

He Looked Pleasant.

Mr. Lenz (photographer)—I have not, for a long time, had so good a sitter as you are. The expression is exactly right. How did you gain such control over the facial muscles? Are you an actor?

Mr. Rhodster—No, sir.

Mr. Lenz—Well, well! Perhaps you are a bicyclist?

Mr. Rhodster—Yes, I am.

Mr. Renz—Ah, that explains it! It comes from riding the machine on stone pavements, and trying to look as if you enjoyed it.—Puck.

METHODS OF BURGLARS.

How They Dispose of Bonds, Jewelry and Precious Gems.

"A man must be a good mechanic to be a burglar—a safe-blower," remarked an old detective. "He must have good tools and know how to use them. Now, if you had a drill and undertook to drill a hole through that stovepipe there you would probably make a mess of it. How, then, is an unskillful man going to make out when he has to drill through the hardest steel? An expert burglar must be a good mechanic, know how to use his tools and where to work on a safe. He has to do his work quickly, and use a blow-pipe or some other means of softening the steel. The tools used by expert burglars, the men who rob banks, are of the finest workmanship, and a kit costs $1,000 or more. It takes some capital for one to get a start as a burglar.

"Now," said the detective, "we will suppose burglars rob a bank safe in Washington and get, we will say, $100,000 in negotiable bonds—Chicago & Northwestern, or something like that—bonds that are not registered, but are numbered. The bank has a list of the numbers. They can not, you see, dispose of the bonds in open market; but they will take them to a man who will give them about one-third of their value. If the bonds are worth par, he will give them, say $30,000 cash. That is all they get. Now the man that buys the bonds calls in another man skilled in his line, who goes over them and alters the numbers. For this he receives 10 per cent. of the value of the bonds, or $10,000. The man who bought the bonds has paid out for them so far $40,000. He may figure, you see, as a respectable broker and easily handle them himself. After the bonds are altered he calls in a man known as a 'layer down.' It is this man's business to dispose of or lay down the bonds. For this he gets one-half of the profits. He sells them at the full market value, say $100,000, and gets half of the $60,000 remaining, after the money paid to the burglars and to the man who altered the numbers is deducted."

"But thieves who get diamonds and jewelry?"

"Well, suppose," said the detective, "that a thief has got into a man's house and taken the man's watch, worth, say, $150, his diamond stud worth $100, his wife's diamond earrings, worth, say, $500, and perhaps a diamond ring, too, making the value of all about $1,000. He goes to a fence, who looks at the watch, calculates how much the gold cases will amount to when melted down, says he will have to have a new plate put on the works, so as to alter the number of the watch, and finally gives $25 for it. He takes the diamonds from the settings, examines them and weighs them, and gives perhaps $50 for the stud, $150 for the stones from the ear-rings, and so on, making in all about $250 for the lot. That is all the thief will get for his job. The settings of the stud and ear-rings will be thrown aside. It is the stones that are valuable, and, except in the case of very large and valuable diamonds that are registered, no one could swear positively to them after they are reset. The fence, of course, has to take risks, and many have to keep the stolen diamonds for six months or more. If a fence becomes known, thieves won't put any thing away with him. If it is a choice between two, and one of the two conducts his business so quietly that he has not been discovered, the thief will go to him, though he knows he will get a much smaller sum for what he has to dispose of."—Washington Star.

WEIGHT OF BRAINS.

A Study That Bears Directly Upon the Question of Intellectuality.

The average human brain weighs forty-nine or fifty ounces in the male and about forty-five ounces in the female. Great brain weight is not always associated with intellectual vigor, as is shown by the fact that an idiot is known to have had a brain of over sixty ounces in weight. But notwithstanding the evidence of such cases as that of the idiot referred to, great mental power is generally associated with a brain weight exceeding the average. Cuvier's brain weighed sixty-four ounces. But Gambetta's brain weighed less than the average woman's brain, which is, of course, peculiar because of his great intellectuality. A strange problem is developed by a comparison of the average weight of the male and female brains with the minimum weight of each within the range of intelligence. The average weight of the female brain is about five ounces less than the average weight of a man's brain. If the weight of the brain were an infallible gauge of intellect the average woman would, so to speak, have five ounces less intellect than the average man. But the weight of brain in a man below which idiocy exists is about five ounces higher than it is in a woman. This is what presents the problem. If, say, thirty ounces of brain in a woman saves her from idiocy and thirty-five ounces are requisite in a man, what becomes of man's average of five ounces of brain weight in excess of the average in woman? The conclusion seems to be that a smaller quantity of female brain is essential to intellectuality than of male brain. This is equivalent to saying that the female brain is of a superior quality. In contradiction of this the fact may be cited that in comparison with men but few women of great intellectual vigor have appeared in the world. If the comparison just made held true a woman with a brain of fifty ounces ought to be the equal of a man with a brain of fifty-five ounces.—Denver Republican.

VINCENT DE PAUL.

The Exemplary Life of a Famous Sixteenth Century Hero.

In 1576, in a village within the shadow of the Pyrenn peaks, Vincent de Paul was born. As a boy he was distinguished for his piety and generosity. Returning from the mill he would distribute handfuls of corn among the poor whom he met, and once having accumulated some silver coins he gave them all to a mendicant.

Early evincing a desire for knowledge, his father took him from sheep-tending to a school in Dax. At sixteen he became a sub-tutor and prepared to enter the priesthood, and at twenty-nine a legacy was bequeathed him. One of the men in possession of it fled to Marseilles to avoid payment. Vincent followed, but mercifully exacted only a portion of the debt.

In returning he took ship to Marbonne, and in the Gulf of Lyons they were attacked by Barbary corsairs. Surrendering only after the fiercest resistance, they were carried to Tunis and sold as slaves by their captors, at whose hands they endured the most excruciating torture.

Vincent, having been transferred several times, was finally liberated and taken to Rome by a renegade of Nice, whom he had reclaimed.

His life is a beautiful example of noble, heroic self-sacrifice. All his possessions were given to the poor and he went about instructing and comforting.

In Rome he visited the cells of the conciergerie, had the inmates lodged in clean, wholesome apartments, and taught them to pray. He instructed the floating prisons, compared with which the conciergerie appeared a palace. Passing between the chained ranks his tender heart bled at sight of the despair of some and stoicism of others. One in particular drew his attention. Upon inquiry he discovered that this man had left a wife and five little children to die of want during his imprisonment. Vincent deliberated and then proposed that the prisoner go free, offering himself to fill the vacancy thus occastoned. Finally the officer consented, clothes were changed, and while the liberated prisoner sought his loved ones Vincent, bound with galling fetters, plied his oar on board the dismal ship.

There he remained until his release was obtained by a friend who discovered his whereabouts. He now erected a hospital for sick and dying galley slaves. Soon after was established a refuge for homeless children.

He picked up little waifs in the streets, and, nestled under his long cloak, were carried to that comfortable home. In war, famine, pestilence and slavery his heroism never deserted him, and during the great inundation of the Seine he and his band rowed out over the treacherous waters amid terrible currents, taking food to those in half-submerged houses. His heart was filled with love for God and man and when, in his eightieth year, the summons came, he died as he had lived—a true hero—Philadelphia Press.

FACTS ABOUT PIGEONS.

How Their Homing Faculty Is Tested by Their Owners and Teachers.

Some time this afternoon a trial lot of young birds belonging to "homers" in this city will be liberated from in front of the Inquirer office for flight to the loft of their owners. This is to test their homing faculty. These training journeys, as they are called, are not to teach the birds the way, nor how to fly, but to give them to understand that being put into the basket they are to fly out of it to home. The birds, when put into the basket for the first time, look at each other full of wonder, and their expressive eyes seem to ask: "This means something, but dear me, what?" Sometimes birds from different homes are to be sent in one large hamper, and are brought from the lofts for transfer to it in small baskets. Before the transfer the birds are marked upon the wings with an indelible stamp. While waiting they are placed in open cages. When first put into these the birds are evidently frightened. They do not huddle together, but stand apart. All stand with the head raised in the attitude of attention peculiar to the family. Thus motionless, they watch every move that is made. Neither hunger nor thirst will tempt them for an instant from their watchfulness. The second time they are transferred, if there is no change from the order that was observed in the first, the birds are soon at their ease. They eat, drink and quarrel as if at home. After this the door of the cage and the windows of the room may be open, but the birds will not take advantage of it. They will crowd to the door of the cage and peer around, but will not attempt to pass the portal. If, as it sometimes happens, a bird is crowded out by its fellows, it will not take advantage of the open window, but will return to the cage of its own accord. The bird evidently understands that it is at that place for a purpose and is to remain there until that purpose is served.

When they reach the liberating point and the hour of their release arrives the liberator approaches the baskets and taps gently upon the top. Instantly the birds range themselves in line and prepare for flight. When the cover is lifted they rise and like a flash, without hesitation or indecision, they are off for the home loft, which may be five hundred miles distant. They never make a mistake in their home, but reaching it at the same rapid rate of speed, suddenly drop to the trap platform and with a confident flutter of their feathers enter the loft.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

AN OCEAN ADVENTURE.

Tales of the Prowess of an Armed Monster of the Briny Deep.

Captain E. W. Smith, of the schooner John W. Smart, whose duel with a sword-fish a few days before had brought him to the cot, replied to the questions of a reporter:

"We were cruising off Sconnett Light last week after sword-fish, when it died away to a dead calm. Just about then we sighted a sword-fish. You know, you can see the back fin and tail of the fish sticking out of water, as they swim about feeding on menhaden that always school near the surface. So I took two of the crew and a dory and pulled quietly up along side of him and stuck the iron in him. We use the ordinary 'lily' iron fastened to a pole a yard long. It works on a swivel. When the iron goes in the swivel turns, and acting like the barb to a hook, prevents the iron pulling out. We have a forty-fathom line fastened to the end. Well, we pulled him in and landed him, and soon after got another fish with out much trouble.

"When we struck the third one I knew he was a fighter. We pulled him up and I stepped to the stern of the dory and stuck the lance into him back of the gills twice, when he sounded. The water was clear and I leaned over the stern watching him. He went down about two fathoms and a half, got his bearings, and shot up straight for me. I watched him coming, but couldn't move. He smashed a hole about fifteen inches square in the side of the dory near the bottom and drove the sword into my right thigh clear to the bone. I pushed the sword out of my leg and through the hole in the dory and fell back in the boat. My men pulled for the schooner, landed me and then went off and killed the fish.

"There wasn't a breath of wind stirring, and if it hadn't been for the commander of the cutter Dexter, who brought me here, I reckon I'd have kicked the bucket."

"Ever hear of many such accidents?"

"Yes, lots of 'em. The same day a sailor named Scott on the schooner H. W. Pearse was struck by a fish and badly hurt. Sometimes fatal accidents occur. A Rockport sailor was standing on the thwart of his dory once when a sword-fish that had been harpooned struck the bottom of the boat, throwing him off his balance, so that he fell backward, impaling himself on the sword and killing him. Then, a few years ago, a cousin of mine struck a big fish, got his foot caught in the line and was carried down. We never saw him again. Very often sword-fish strike vessels and set them to leaking, and I have known of schooners being scuttled by fish that have been harpooned by their crews. Most of the fishing is done off Block Island, about eighty sail being off there during the season. The season begins about June 15 and lasts about a month and a half. Eight or ten a day is a good average catch, and they are worth on an average $10 apiece. The fish for the past two years have been more plentiful than ever. Small schooners from eight to thirty tons, with a "pulpit" or stand built at the end of the bowsprit, where the lanceman stands, and carrying crews of from three to eight men, are the kinds that go out. The swords average about twenty-six inches long. The fish run from 100 to 600 pounds. The smack Grocer Phillips, of New London, captured a sword fish weighing 700 pounds, which is the largest on record." Just then the supper for the different patients was brought in, and among other appetizing dishes the reporter noticed nicely fried and browned sword-fish cuts.—Boston Letter.

AN ELECTRIC PLANT.

Its Leaf and Flower Full of Mysteries and Botanical Problems.

M. Fulbert-Dumonton, in the course of a curious and interesting article on electricity in the animal and vegetable world, says: "The vegetable world possesses also its electrical species. Has there not been discovered in the forests of India a strange plant which possesses to a very high degree astonishing magnetic powers? It has been badly named the Philotacca electrica. The hand which breaks a leaf from this plant receives immediately a shock equal to that which is produced by the conductor of an induction coil. At a distance of six metres a magnetic needle is affected by it, and it will be quite deranged if brought near. The energy of this singular influence varies with the hour of the day. All powerful about two o'clock in the afternoon, it is absolutely annulled during the night. At times of storm its intensity augments to striking proportions. During rain the plant seems to succumb, and bends its head during a thunder shower; it remains there without force or virtue even if one should shelter it with an umbrella. No shock is felt at that time in breaking the leaves, and the needle is unaffected beside it. One never by any chance sees a bird or insect alight on the electric plant; an instinct seems to warn them that they would find there sudden death. It is also important to remark that where it grows none of the magnetic metals are found; neither iron, nor cobalt, nor nickel, an undeniable proof that the electric force belongs exclusively to the plant. Light and heat, phosphorescence, magnetism, electricity, how many mysteries and botanical problems does this wonderous Indian plant conceal within its leaf and flower."—La Nature.

—The average monthly temperature of San Francisco for the last fifteen years has been 55½ degrees. The highest for any month was 59 degrees and the lowest 50 degrees.

William Kline, Harrisburg, Pa., writes: "I have never known anything to sell like your album. Yesterday I took orders enough to pay me over $25." W. J. Hunt, Bangor, Me., writes: "I take an order for your album at a man at every house I visit. My profit is often as much as $20 a day for a single day's work." COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County, California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

TUESDAY, Oct. 29, 1889.

I. J. Woodin vs. Joseph Fernbach—Issued writ of execution.

See notice to tax-payers.

J. C. Eddy is expected here next Tuesday.

Joe Seely still has hopes of getting married.

The Board of Supervisors will meet on Monday.

W. F. Matlack has moved into his new residence.

H. J. Robinson, of Georges Creek, has gone to San Francisco.

The owners of cattle in this vicinity are making their annual round-up.

Peter Meyers, of Keeler, made Independence a brief visit on Tuesday.

Mr. Henry Fehrman has moved into the house lately occupied by W. F. Matlack.

This is about the time of year when the faithful vaquero gets in his finest work.

Dr. S. A. Chapman, of Bishop, a first-class dentist, will soon visit Independence.

Miners are locating and working new mines in the foothills above Big Pine. The ore is of high grade.

Judge Conklin is fitting up the front room, on the ground floor, of the Masonic Hall building for a law office.

Rudolph Schober passed through Independence last Saturday on his way to Mojave for a load of freight.

George Thorpe and M. Laprairie have gone to the Alabama hills, where they intend to engage in mining.

Mr. Neil McLean come up from Cerro Gordo last Tuesday morning. He reports lively times in that portion of the county.

Gus Walker, of Olancha, who has been so seriously ill from the effects of blood-poisoning, arrived at Independence last Tuesday. He is rapidly improving.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence at 11 a. m.

Sheriff Eldred and Mr. Alexander returned last Sunday from their trip to Death Valley. They were absent thirteen days. They report times as quiet in that section of the county.

A. Cohn, of A. Cohn & Co., Bishop, has been in San Francisco purchasing an immense stock of dry goods, clothing and general merchandise, which will be sold at a small profit.

Ad Smith, of Big Pine, has gone to Mojave to get the furniture. The happy event will take place about the time that snow flies. Ad seems to be losing flesh since he has determined to take the responsibility of becoming a benedict

"Pap" Walker was in town last Saturday and had a petition drawn up asking the Postmaster-General to establish a mail route from Freeman (Coyote Holes) to Olancha. If the petition is granted we will have a direct mail communication with Mojave, Los Angeles and other southern points. The petition is being extensively signed throughout the valley.

ELLIOTT.

The next move in the Elliott case will be fixing the time for a new trial. The defendant has the right to file an application for a change of venue, and if the application is awarded then the Court of the county to which the case is transferred fixes the time of trial. The Supreme Court of this State has held in the case of the People vs. Bush, 68 Cal., that "in cases of felony, where the prisoner's life or liberty is in peril, he has the right to be present, and must be present, during the whole of the trial, and until the final judgment."

Section 1043 of our Penal Code provides that the defendant must be present in person when on trial for a felony.

In Arkansas a statute of the same kind was in force, and the Supreme Court of that State said of it that it was "declaratory and affirmatory of the common law which would not allow any proceeding affecting life or liberty to be had in the absence of the prisoner, and when any steps was to be taken in the cause the prisoner was to be present personally, lest in so important a matter he should be prejudiced. The care of the law for his safety was extended through the whole trial, from his arraignment to his final conviction or acquittal."

If Elliott cannot waive his constitutional right to be personally present then he will have to be brought back from Kern county, whether he is granted a change of venue or not. We understand that Elliott's attorney wants the case transferred to either Placer county or Los Angeles. If transferred to Placer county he will attend to it, and if it is transferred to Los Angeles a Los Angeles friend of Elliott's will defend him. If the case is transferred this county will have to pay one or more attorneys for prosecuting Elliott, and we would suggest that if the case is transferred that this county employ an attorney who is familiar with all the facts in the case. We are informed that the District Attorney can move for a change of venue.

BIG PINE ITEMS.

Eds. Independent:—Now that our crops are garnered we are looking forward to improvements in the near future.

The Stockholders of the Big Pine Canal have concluded to resume work about the 5th prox. It is proposed to put on a force of about fifteen men, and some thirty-five horses—machinery for excavation, scrapers, etc., having been heretofore ordered. The incumbrance (an ill-survey as we are informed) has been removed by a re-survey by Surveyor McKnight, and the two deep cuts—heretofore great obstacles—carry a fine volume of water far beyond the Schuyler ranch. Much of this energy and advancement is due to the "push" of the Crocker Bros.

POW-WOW.

The Indians have gathered from far and near, and now are about completing their annual "big eat" and fandango. The war dance was pronounced a decided success by all the white gentry attending. There were fully four hundred Red Men in attendance, among the noted was the Bowers family of war-time fame.

SCHOOL.

Our teacher is puzzled in regard to a mathematical question; how he can seat forty-nine pupils in a room that heretofore accommodated three dozen or less. But now, we understand, bonds for a new school house have been placed, and the money in the hands of County Treasurer. The contract for the new school building has been let to Mr. Chas. Wonacott, of Bishop Creek, for the sum of $1937, and said contractor, being a skilled and rapid architect our people are pleased that pupils of the district will soon have a suitable room for accommodation. We have visited the old shell—and our opinion is that a new house has long been sadly needed.

The petition for a weekly mail via. Mojave is being circulated here, and signed by all, irrespective of immediate interests. We would hail with pleasure the old stage again up this way.

Our village is agog to-day with excitement caused by the selling and trading of a large number of blooded horses, imported from Nevada by Mr. W. Nichols, of Oakland.

Now that King Pharaoh, or Faro, reigns among us, some of his subjects look happy, for a time; but alas! how dejected and sad-looking are the countenances of the many! Such is the fate of those "who buck at the kings."

A large number of our dance-attending burghers turned out en masse, on Friday night last to welcome home the Misses Bell, who have been absent for some time past visiting relatives in Arkansas. The party was one of the most enjoyable in the vicinity for some time. We also indulged in the "skip" at the Crocker Hotel on Saturday, and were loth to leave until the young hours of Sunday, when conscience commanded us to desist.

Mrs. Ober has again returned home, after a long absence at the Bay. Mr. J. Free and family have started for their former home in Illinois.

Chas. Wonacott, of Bishop, has been with us for a few days on contract business. More anon. WANDERER.

DESERT LAND LOCATIONS.

The following article is clipped from the S. F. Chronicle:

"Entrymen of Desert lands are making a strong bid for public sympathy in connection with their claims to the public domain. The bill passed by the last Congress relating to surveys for irrigation gave the Secretary of the Interior extensive powers for the reservation of all lands recommended by the director of the Geological Survey as necessary or suitable for reservoir sites and for the extension of irrigation canals. It fixed the date of reservation at October 30, 1888, and any entries made after that time were at the entryman's risk. The Commissioner of the General Land Office holds the law to be mandatory, and will set aside all entries of lands said by the director of the survey to be necessary for its purpose.

This action is right and proper and commendable in every aspect. In 99 cases out of every 100 the entry of arid or desert lands is purely and wholly for purposes of speculation, and to enable the entryman to control more or less of the water supply which might be needed for a general system of irrigation. The entryman has not the faintest idea of reclaiming and cultivating the land. All he wants is to get title enough so that the Government will have to buy him out, or so that he can combine with other desert land proprietors to control the water supply.

The Commissioner blocked this game in the only way in which it could be blocked, by avoiding all the entries of such lands and refusing to allow any of them to be segregated from the public domain. When it was evident that Congress had fairly committed the nation to the policy of reclaiming the arid lands it was clearly the duty of the subordinate officers of the Government to aid in carrying out that policy, and the most effectual way to do it was to make speculators keep their hands off the land until it was fully determined how much of it would be needed for the carrying out of the plan of irrigation.

These entrymen will probably go to Congress with their tale of woe and try to persuade that body that they are deeply injured; but Senators and Representatives from the far West, who know what desert lands are in their present condition, will not be easily convinced that the entrymen have been materially damaged. One who is debarred from securing title to a tract of land which would scarcely support lizards and horned toads cannot have any very strong claim on Congress for relief, more especially when it is shown that this now worthless land, if kept out of the hands of locators, may become valuable by the perfection of a system of irrigation. When these facts are explained to Congress it is to be feared that the entryman on desert land who has been prevented from getting title will receive but little comfort or consolation from the lawmaking power."

We think the above article is too sweeping to apply to locators of land in Owens valley. Undoubtedly some locations have been made wholly for speculative purposes, but most of them were made in good faith for the purpose of reclaiming the land and acquiring title. The Geological Survey Commission should make haste, select what it wants reserved for sites, etc., and not keep millions of acres of land tied up from entry and settlement.

COUNTY BONDS.

Last Wednesday the County Clerk received a telegram from San Francisco stating that an attorney of that city had given it as his opinion that the bonds issued by Inyo county in 1884 are illegal, and that the German Savings and Loan Society refuses to purchase the new proposed bonds for the reason that the issue of 1884 being illegal the new issue would therefore be no better.

On May 8, 1884 an Act entititled "An Act to provide for funding the indebtedness of counties in certain cases," was approved, which Act was passed to cover the matter of funding the indebtedness of this and other counties. When said act was passed Inyo county had outstanding $17,000 of the bonds issued in 1872, and warrants and accrued interest thereon, amounting to the further sum of $68,000, all of which bonds, warrants and accrued interest were funded and refunded by the issue of $85,000 7 per cent. bonds in 1884. Previous to the issue there was a question whether or not the county could refund, but the Act above referred to cured all apparent irregularities, and ex-Chief Justice Rhodes, who passed upon the bonds in 1884, declared them to be legal. Attorneys, who are not infallible, occasionally reach a wrong conclusion of law, and we hope that the San Francisco attorney above referred to is mistaken when he says the issue of 1884 is illegal.

When the Board of Supervisors fixed the rate of taxation for this year at 2½ per cent., last October, it was taken for granted that we could and would refund before next January, otherwise the rate of taxation for this year would have been higher. We are still sanguine that refunding, so necessary for the financial welfare of our county, will yet be accomplished. If the issue of 1884 is illegal action can be brought and a decree be had prohibiting the further payment of any bonds of that issue, but we do not think there is a man in this county who would favor such proceedings.

He Got Left.

There is a certain young man in Independence (not Johnson) who wants to get married. Some time ago he was told by "some of the boys" that a young lady would arrive here last Wednesday evening for the purpose of marrying him. He was delighted, and immediately commenced making preparations for the wedding. He ordered a $45 suit of clothes, bought a new hat, etc., and Wednesday forenoon he made his toilet in Uncle John Lank's back yard. Then he was ready for business. He applied for a marriage license, but was persuaded to wait until the young lady arrived, when it would be issued. With as much patience as a man in his condition ever showed, he awaited the arrival of the bride, but no bride appeared. He still lives, but the boys don't think it safe to ask him how he feels.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WHY COULDN'T SHE HAVE WAITED?

The new maid, who showed Philip Breton into Mrs. Ellingsworth's parlor, was not nearly as pretty as her predecessor in office, but he was too much absorbed with his delicate errand to take any notice of her. Bertha was alone somewhere, deserted, unprotected. Something must be done for her. It was a strange place to seek pity for her, in the woman's bosom which he had seen heaving in hate of her; but a magnanimous heart is wont to count on the generosity of others. The maid had said Mr. Ellingsworth was not in, and so he was left to appeal to the womanly tenderness of his wife.

He rose suddenly from the satin covered sofa and looked wonderingly at a woman's form in the doorway. Could this be the poor little factory girl, this fashionably dressed woman, with a train like a queen's? He had stupidly enough expected to find her in the same old calico dress, perhaps with the dingy, plaid shawl about her shoulders.

But the girl was not so sensitive as to be annoyed. Had not she kept him waiting while she dressed on purpose to enjoy a triumph? And now she was quite pleased at the plain evidence of it. She smiled rather consciously as she extended her jeweled little hand to him.

"Why haven't you called before?" Her voice had lost the desperate or sullen tone he remembered in it of old, but he was not sure he liked it any better. He bowed, like any gentleman, as he touched her hand, and noticed the great gold bracelets on her slim wrists. Philip was unpleasantly reminded of manacles, and then the massive chain around her neck, with a huge locket shaped like a padlock, had suggestions, too, of a sort, he fancied, the girl would hardly have liked if she had thought of them. He glanced at her olive cheeks, and the slightly oblique eyes, and the voluptuous fullness of her form. How could an American village have produced so perfect an odalisque?

"I did not wish to interrupt your honeymoon." He seated himself again.

She was looking oddly at him, as if curious whether he had forgotten her indiscreet visit, when she had told him of her own broken heart.

Philip suddenly met her eyes as she sat opposite him. "The truth is, Mrs. Ellingsworth, I have hardly been in the mood for polite calls of late. I suppose you understand."

"How should I?" She elevated her dark brows rather unpleasantly as if to dismiss, once for all, any further confidences with him. Philip smiled, in spite of himself, at her tactics.

"Do you know where Bertha is?" he asked, simply.

A sudden flash of color lit up her cheeks. "I hate the very name of her," she exclaimed, as she rose as if to leave him. She was not yet wonted to the customs of her new rank.

"Don't go," he urged, "I am so anxious to know where she is. No doubt you have cause to be angry with her," Philip did not notice the growing passion in the girl's eyes, "but you surely would not have her starve to death, or suffer and die alone."

"Perhaps not," Jane meant to smile, but she only produced the effect of showing the cruel white of her teeth. "Hasn't she got—" the word stuck in her throat, "him?"

"Why, didn't you know," cried Philip breathlessly, "she has left him? She is alone somewhere, for all we know, in want; think of it, and she too proud to——"

"Left her—husband?"

"If he was her husband I didn't know," he hurried on, as if afraid of the answer that would come; "I never heard, and I didn't like to ask."

She had seated herself on the pink satin beside him and caught his hands as she bent toward him to read his thoughts before he spoke.

"Did you hear they were not married?" she almost hissed at him.

"Why, yes, that is—" he looked away in his shame. "It was told about the village, but you know better, of course." He tried to laugh, then grew sober again. "How vile of them to whisper it, and it was vile of me to let even the taint of a fear into my mind."

But she did not answer him yes or no. Her eyes had grown preternaturally large, and there was a happiness in them as if she looked right into the gates of heaven. All the common expressions were gone from her face. One could read there now nothing but purity and sweetness, such as make up the substance of dreams of love.

"And he is alone. Oh! where is he? I must know. I must go to him. It cannot be true." The angelic look flitted, the exquisite drooping at the corners of her mouth was gone.

"If you have dared to lie to me." Philip was perfectly astonished at the sudden change in her face and voice. Her black eyes blazed ungovernable passion into his. The quick transition from the height of blissful hope to the depths of deep despair seemed to bear her over the line of humanity. "Tell me, have you lied to make a show of me?"

She trembled for an instant, like a wild creature before a spring, then she clutched with her hot supple fingers at his throat, magnificent as a tigress and in every motion a perfect, terrible grace. Philip threw her from him as he would some untamed animal; it was hard to remember her womanhood then.

She sat where he had left her, as if just awoke from a terrible nightmare, her fingers parted and curved and moved spasmodically as if she yet held him by the throat. Then she buried her face in the cushion in a flood of tears.

"I didn't know what I was doing," she sobbed. "Don't remember it," I was mad." She rose tremblingly to her feet and came forward covering her face with her hands. She might have been an abused child, so gentle and sweet she seemed now. She took down her hands from her face; what man could be so cold and hard as to stand against such eyes as hers looking through their tears.

But she was alone.

CHAPTER XIX.

A RADICAL.

"Oh, my God, my God, why couldn't I have waited?"

She tore the gold chain from her neck and cast it on the floor. Her husband had given it to her, and she hated him at this moment and the proud name he had put upon her. She had rather one smile of that other's than all these empty golden favors.

"I am sick of their soft ways and their lying tongues," she moaned; "why didn't I wait?" Jane Ellingsworth began to walk rapidly about the room, wrenching the great gold bands about her wrists, unconscious that she chafed and bruised the skin

"I might have known God would not deny him to me. I wanted him so much. Oh, my love, my darling, I would have fought for you, I would have starved for you. It would have been sweet with you, and I could not wait one year. I might have known it would come, but I could not wait." She drove her nails into her flesh as she clasped them in her anguish. She panted for breath; her rich silk dress seemed to suffocate her, and the perfumed air was too heavy and dead; it seemed to strangle her.

"He is free; he would have opened his arms to me. He may be coming now to ask me to go with him. He could never have loved that cold, bloodless creature. Ah, how I could have loved him. I would have taught him that a woman can love."

She unclasped her hands and laid them fall gently to her side, and her convulsed face took on a new, soft tenderness. "I would go with him," she murmured. "A hungry heart cannot feed on such things as these. Oh, but he would not have me, a low creature who has sold herself; he would not have me. He would despise me; he would not even look at me.

She fell back in one of the satin covered chairs she had bought with her husband's money, and cried and sobbed till the salt fountains dried up. It was then, while she sat silent and tearless, looking at her bruised wrists and at the wounds her nails had made, that she heard a familiar, delicate tread in the hall. It was as well Mr. Ellingsworth did not catch the expression on her set, weary face as his tall form appeared in the doorway. He seemed to her fancy that moment the most terrible monster in the world, this elegant figure of a man, whose disposition was the very essence of refinement, and she dropped her eyes to the carpet as he came toward her with his eternal smile.

"All alone, Jennie? Why you have dropped your chain, here it is on the floor."

"Oh, thank you," but she shuddered in spite of herself as he seated himself near her and warmed her hands fondly between his own soft, white palms.

"My little girl," he began.

Yes, she was his, his and no other's, his every day and hour of her life, for hadn't he bought her, and what better title was there than that by purchase? She raised her eyes and made them rest on his fine, smooth shaven face. She had never noticed before a certain cold and cruel light in his eyes, as if he could enjoy keenly the torture of a living soul, or that beside the sensual lines of his finely chiseled mouth there was a suggestion of an exquisite brutality on the thin lips. She trembled before him.

"I have a favor to ask of you." He looked admiringly at her as he spoke. Mr. Ellingsworth never tired of the rich, oriental type of his wife's beauty. If Bertha's mother had been like her there need never have been any unpleasant stories in the community on her score. And Jane was lovelier than ever today, with this peculiar brilliancy in her eyes and the bright red spot on either dark cheek. She didn't know how to furnish her parlor very well, but he had never yet been sorry he married her. She seemed to understand so well how to manage him, never too fond, always a little on her guard, like a judicious artist, who will not let even the most ardent admirer come too near his canvas.

"It is about Bertha," he continued, not seeming to notice her start. "She has left that fellow. I haven't troubled you before, but she has been alone up in Vineboro for a good many months. I think best she should come home now. It will be in better taste"——

Mr. Ellingsworth rose to his feet at a rumbling noise and stepped to the window. When he came back the color had faded from Jane's cheeks and her small mouth closed very tight. Her hands were trembling violently, but she had hid them in the folds of her dress, so her husband could not see her intense excitement. Her heart was beating loudly; her old madness seemed coming upon her again, but this man's cold, smiling face subdued her.

"When is she coming?"

"I didn't know but that was the carriage; well, I suppose she may be here," he glanced at his gold faced watch, "perhaps in an hour or two."

The girl's lips quivered; she almost broke into a passion of angry words; the hate that seethed in her heart for that woman was almost bubbling forth its bitterness. But the cool assurance on her husband's face, as his keen, pitiless eyes seemed to search out all the secrets of her soul, cowed the woman. She rose and moved, as one in a dream, toward the door.

"I must get things ready then." And so this was what her gentle voiced husband called asking a favor of her. She did not love him, but she feared him, now, as she remembered her secret. She would obey his nod as if she were his dog, she would study the signs on his placid face. He had never anything but smiles and kind speeches for her, but she would have sunk into the very earth at his feet rather than that he should open his mysterious armory of instruments of deadly torture for the soul.

"Well, well, I thought she would make more fuss."

The afternoon sun was well down on his last stretch when Philip Breton came back from his factory, and up the street toward Mr. Ellingsworth's house. There was some one with him, a man so tall and slight that the weight of his head, which was quite large, seemed to bow him. It was an old gentleman, to judge from the wrinkles on his face, but he had hardly enough hair to show whether it was gray or only flaxen.

"You have done splendidly, my boy!" It was an old acquaintance of Philip's, whom he had used to talk philosophy with at college, one of those benevolent minded gentlemen who are so optimistic that they have to go to boys for sympathy. "Splendidly," he repeated, "only why stop just where you are? If every mill owner would do in his mill what you have done, it would be a grand thing for this world. But they won't. Now you have started beautifully, but there is too much business to your plan."

Philip smiled argumentatively. It was like his boyhood returned to hear the old man's mellow tones.

"But, Mr. Philbrick, an honest business man can do more good than a dozen impracticable philanthropists like you."

"But think of the things that business principles never can regard. Your help work ten weary hours a day, all ther poor lives; business demands that, doesn't it? Well, I say that is where benevolence must come in. It is terrible to be shut up as they are; it kills body, mind and soul. Business principles never can save them," said the old gentleman, turning his kindly eyes on the young mill owner; "philanthropy, I don't care what you call it, some gentle spirit of love ought to lift the burden that crushes the life and hope out of them, contrary to business principles, higher than business principles."

As Mr. Philbrick finished, a close carriage rolled by them and stopped a little beyond, where a gentleman and lady stood to welcome the visitor.

"Your reforms," answered Philip, after a moment's thought, "should be founded on business principles. Then the force of the business instinct will carry them out. Otherwise"— he lifted his hat to Mrs. Ellingsworth, but she did not seem to notice him; her eyes were fixed on her husband, who was in the act of handing a lady out of the carriage. The lady wore a traveling suit of a blue shade. Her face was hid as she stepped down, showing a white feather in the back of her hat, and a few strands of golden hair below. Then she raised her face as the carriage rolled away, and a wild, sweet thrill of pain shot through Philip's heart, while every nerve in his body tingled like finely tuned stringed instruments, trembling in sympathy with a resounding chord. His feet refused to take him away, while his hungry eyes devoured Bertha's beauty, for it was no other than she come back—his lost darling found again. His heart warmed, as he looked, into a divine glow; how cold it had been, and so long. A great burden of weariness seemed lifted from him. It was as if, after a dreary old age, the sweet peace of childhood was born in him again.

For the moment he forgot everything that had come between them, as in the bright, perfumed morning a child forgets the dreary night just past. But the long night had changed her; the exquisite roundness of her face and form had gone; even her grand blue eyes seemed faded like her cheeks, once so rich in their sunset glow. And he only yearned over her the more tenderly—the new element of pity seemed only wanting before to glorify his love into a religion. He longed to rush to her, putting away her father, who had no caresses for her, and his wife, who was darting flashes of hate at the unwelcome guest. He would enfold her in his arms. She would be glad for them at last; such love as his made the closest kin in the world. He took a step toward her, but no one saw him.

His hungry eyes devoured Bertha's beauty.

The eyes of the two women met. Their wills met and struggled for the mastery in that moment. Undisguised hate was in one face, lofty contempt in the other. There had been one gentle, wistful expression in Bertha's face as she first alighted, but there was no trace of it now. She had drawn herself up to her full height, so that the other woman seemed like a child before her, and her hand, as it fell to her side, opened outward in a gesture of disdain for the creature her father had chosen for his wife. It was hardly a second before her rare lips parted. They at least had not changed. Jane winced for fear of some bitter taunt. She had learned how terrible a blow well trained tongues can give; but the words were only some polite commonplace; the tone—well, it caused Mr. Ellingsworth to glance critically at his wife. She seemed vulgar in his eyes for the first time. Jane tried to brazen it out, but her face only took on an expression of pugnacious insignificance.

"What was it you were saying?" resumed Mr. Philbrick as Philip overtook him.

"I had forgotten."

"Speaking of business?" suggested the other, and then continued himself, not displeased at an extra turn. "Business, I say, is heartless and cruel as death. It is pitiless, and pity is the noblest of emotions; it is ungenerous, it is unfair, we have had enough of it when it grinds so terribly."

Mr. Philbrick thought his tirade would surely fetch an enthusiastic retort. But Philip only walked on by his side in silence; he seemed intent on some beautiful masses of cloud just behind the sun, as he sped on his way to the west.

"Can't afford it, can't afford it," went on the old gentleman, gesticulating with his forefinger; "that is what you would say, I presume; of course you can't if the upper classes waste the wealth they do. I tell you there is no sense or excuse for a man spending ten and twenty and fifty thousand dollars a year. Why, it is a good workman in your mill who earns ten thousand dollars in a lifetime, adding all his days' wages together. There ought to be more fairness about these things. Such men as you, Philip Breton, get too much—more than any reasonable creature could want. Now, you ought to go right to work and distribute your surplus—I mean your real surplus—back where it came from, among the poor. It takes but very little money to buy what can make a life comfortable and complete. The rich are always complaining that they don't enjoy life more than the middle classes, but they manage to waste what would make a thousand wretched homes happy without one pang of conscience."

"But what do you want me to do?" asked Philip in astonishment.

The old gentleman's face was flushed with enthusiasm.

"Why I want you to take hold, and begin to make things equal, by paying back your surplus in one form or another. Give them better homes to live in. Shorten their hours so they can have a little existence besides drudgery; pay them better wages."

Philip looked distressed and doubtful. He had thought the subject over carefully and believed he had done a great deal already for his poor. His philanthropic friend would turn the whole world topsey turvey.

"Why, you know what the books say—that giving so much would spoil all the spirit and patience of the working classes."

"Mere arguments devised to soothe the consciences of the rich," explained Mr. Philbrick with a grand air. "Though there is such a thing as unwise benevolence, encouraging paupers and beggars; but a man who works every day of his life isn't a beggar. Your father made a good investment that brings you in say a quarter million a year. That is rather above what you pay your best workman; but it doesn't hurt your manliness any, my boy. The poorest paid hand in your factory works a great deal harder than you; you needn't be afraid of degrading his manhood until he gets a quarter million."

"But wouldn't they hang off on their oars unless they had to struggle for a livelihood?"

"My dear Philip, you wouldn't think it necessary to starve a horse, and hang a bag of oats just before his nose to make him go. Better feed him the oats, and a healthy animal likes to go. Do you lie off on your oars? You could afford it a thousand times better than they. Give them a chance for hope and ambition, and it will produce the best work ever known. Who lives here?"

He stopped in front of a graceful little cottage, through whose open windows one could see into cheerful, well furnished rooms. A row of maple saplings had been lately set in front, and plenty of green shrubs and ample vines gave the place a most charming air.

"John Graves, one of my workmen. His daughter married rich, and it is her husband's money which has worked the remarkable transformation." Philip was very glad to change the subject. "John's wife was sick—supposed to be an invalid. See that ladylike woman watering the hanging pot? that is she. Ellingsworth's money made the change. As for Graves himself, he used to be bowed almost like a cripple. He was as melancholy as an undertaker, and he had good reason to be, poor fellow. He used to pull a great slouch hat down over his face to hide as much as he could of himself. Well, you wouldn't know him now; he is as respectable a looking man as one often sees, and they say he works as hard as ever."

STRUCK A FORTUNE.

A Newspaper Carrier Who Won $30,000 in the Louisiana State Lottery.

In a neat little brick cottage, at No. 3407 LaSalle street, there resides the happiest and snuggest little family of Germans that could be found in many a mile's hunt. It is the home of Charles Meinhardt, his wife and little 3-year old daughter. Only a few months ago, Mr. Meinhardt was in tolerably fair circumstances, now he is what may be called the Jay Gould of West St. Louis. In short, at the last drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery he held a tenth part of the number 87,835, which drew the capital prize of $300,000. A Star-Sayings reporter called at the residence of Mr Meinhardt this morning. Mr. Meinhardt was out on some speculation, but his wife met the reporter and said: "We are now a very happy family. We won $30,000 and got every cent of it a few days ago. It was a very lucky thing, and we have only been playing the lottery for about four months. I have been buying all the tickets, but I get them under my husband's name. I bought this lucky one and took $2 out of his pocket to buy it, and I'm glad I did it now. My husband will continue to carry papers, but he will invest in real estate to a considerable extent. I would like to see somebody else do as well as we. We intend to play a little every now and then."

Two other gentlemen of this city held one-twentieth tickets and each drew $15,000, one through the Lafayette and the other through the Fourth National Bank. Besides the above luck of St. Louisans, there are any number of people holding numbers for smaller prizes. The heaviest winners at this drawing were all in pretty fair circumstances, and now that they have acquired sudden wealth, intend to have a pretty good time out of it. Two of them are investing in real estate in the West End. Mr. Meinhardt, while still carrying papers, is contemplating a trip to the old country with his family.—St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Sayings August 28.

HOW I SAVED MY LIFE.

I was taken sick while at the dinner table with terrible distress in my stomach. Before this I had been hearty and strong. For fourteen days I kept getting worse, despite the efforts of two doctors. I lost forty pounds, and was satisfied that I could live but a few days. My trouble was Stomach and Liver Complaint, resulting in an attack of bilious colic. At this time I saw Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., advertised, and sent for a bottle. I also sent for my physician, and told him that I was going to try the Favorite Remedy. He examined it and told me to use it three days and let him know the result. In the three days I walked four miles. Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy has saved my life.—W. S. Bitzer, Slate Mills, Ross Co., Ohio.

The above Picture Represents

CAPTAIN S. GREENWOOD,

Master of the Steamship Kanawha.

About a year ago he observed a strange change in his feelings. He felt tired instead of vigorous; nervous instead of strong. His appetite became poor and his sleep broken. He tried to overcome these feelings, but they would not go. He then noticed pains and irritation in the water channels, and that the fluids passed were often thick and with a scum on top or a brick-dust sediment at the bottom. All these were the sure symptoms of that fearful disease, Catarrh of the Bladder, which has always been considered incurable, and they continued until the Captain was in a terrible condition. But he is the picture of health and vigor to-day, and he owes it entirely to that wonderful medicine, Hunt's Remedy. Capt. Greenwood says: "I am so certain of the great value of Hunt's Remedy, that I always carry a supply on shipboard for the use of my men, and I prescribe it whenever they are ailing. After curing me as it did, and restoring my wife, (whom the best physicians of New York said was dying of tumor,) to perfect health, I swear by it."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

FACING THE FIRE.

Miss Janey's Self-Sacrifice and Its Reward.

"She's a cry-baby!" said Tom. "I hate girls that's always weepin'. She was 'fraid the fire would catch us. Just as though I couldn't take care of one girl." Tom was ten and Dell seven, and he domineered over her in a most aggravating manner, but she couldn't stand that and turned on him, stamping her foot passionately.

"Tom Earle, you're the awfullest story fibber. You know I wasn't afraid for us, but, oh, Janey," turning her dirty, woe-begone little face to the older sister, "Dolly went over to the big ravine, and I most know she will be burned up, 'cause she is so poky. She was the best friend I had, and I slapped her just dreadful this morning 'cause she wouldn't give me the biggest piece of candy. O-oo-ve if Dolly dies I'll die too; I know I will," and burying her face in Janey's damp dress she wailed in a most dolorous fashion.

"Come, Dell, dry your eyes. I'll take you and Tom home and then go after Dolly. Here, Tom, put Dell on in front of me and you climb on behind. Brete won't like it, but I guess he'll have to stand it. What possessed Dolly to go home by the ravine? It's a mile out of her way."

"We didn't want her to go that way, but she said there was a nest of cotton-tails down there and she wanted to take them home," sobbed Dell.

"The hateful little city flirt," broke in Tom. "I was going with her to carry 'em home if she'd go havers, and she said she didn't like to go with barefooted boys. And I told her she didn't haf to. I don't care nothin' for girls, no how," he added defiantly.

Janey was too busy with her thoughts to answer, and the sure-footed Brete soon took them home, where Mrs. Earle gathered the children to her heart with an inward prayer of thanksgiving.

Janey only paused long enough to dip the blanket once again in the trough, then spreading it full length over Brete she jumped on his back and called to Tom to bring her the other.

"What in the dickins are you going to do now, Jane?" asked the irrepressible as he obeyed her order.

"I am going after Dolly Landis."

"Janey, daughter," said the mother, tremulously, putting out a restraining hand.

"No, mother," said Janey, decidedly, "I must go. Just think, it might have been Dell, you know; I won't be in much danger. If the fire comes too close I have my wet blankets, and if I am surrounded I can cover up in them and turn Brete loose. I have my matches to use in case I can."

As she rode away she felt the wind changing, thus bringing the fire more directly to the ravine, towards which she was speeding, and at the same time menacing the little home. She looked back just once and the fleeting glimpse was never forgotten. The sun, like a great yellow ball lazily sliding down the western sky, was flooding the prairie and far-distant hills in mellow light. Away to the north the trees on Ash creek stood out green and tall, and east of them lay the blackened prairie over which the flames had just swept; behind her lay the little farm with its broad acres of ripened corn, while just before her, each moment lessening the distance, leaped and roared the prairie fire, writhing and twisting through the taller grass like so many fiery serpents. Between it and her lay the old Santa Fe trail, grass-grown now and a weak barrier to such an element. Slight as it was it mattered not to her, for she had to cross it to reach the ravine.

Setting her teeth hard, she urged Brete on, crossing the trail and heading for the ravine, which was only a few rods away. The fire was perilously near, but just before her she saw the small figure of a child scrambling over the bank and knew it was Dolly. Brete was snorting and almost unmanageable from fear, and just on the edge of the ravine a blazing tumble weed borne on the wind fell in front of him. He gave a frightened plunge, which sent both horse and rider rolling to the bottom of the deep gully. Half stunned by the fall, Janey attempted to rise, but found it impossible because of the pain in her ankle. At her side lay the faithful pony, his head doubled under him and neck broken. Dolly, with her dinner-basket held tight in her hand, was half rolling, half sliding down the bank after her.

"Oh, Miss Janey, I was so afraid somebody wouldn't come and my rabbits would get burned; just see 'em," and, drawing aside the napkin, she showed Janey three little cotton-tails nestling in the tiny basket. "You'll take care of us now, won't you, Miss Janey?" she asked, confidingly, as she put the napkin carefully back.

"Dear child," returned Janey, tenderly, in an agony of pain and grief for her dead pony. "I'll do my best for you, but you must do just as I tell you. Can you unbuckle Brete's girth?"

"I'm 'fraid to; he's so dead."

Janey smiled a little bitterly. "Well, perhaps I can do it," and working her way to his side, she unfastened the girth and by much tugging pulled the blanket off, the tears running down on his pretty mane. A shrill scream from Dolly roused her from her bitter reflections.

"Oh, Miss Janey, the fire is most to us."

"God help us, then," thought the poor girl as she called Dolly to her. "Now sit down on this blanket and when the fire comes close to you, you must cover all up with it. If you swallow any of the hot air it will kill you."

Dolly began to cry as she gingerly seated herself on the wet blanket. "It's so nasty and damp, Miss Janey," she sobbed.

"Be thankful for that. The fire is so close I can hear it crackling. I am going to burn a little of the grass around us." Working her way a little distance she lighted a match and set the grass blazing. It swept merrily up over the bank, and when it would have eaten in toward the child, she beat it out with one of the blankets. At last, with white, drawn face, she crawled to Dolly. The air about them grew close and hot and burning grass fell all over them. The land here was low and the grass was mixed with blue stem, a species of grass that grew several feet high and made intense heat. With the feeble strength at her command, Janey brushed the burning particles away till Dolly, screaming with fright, sprang into her lap, leaving both exposed to the fiery bath. By main force Janey held the frenzied child down and drew the blanket over them, but Dolly's frantic struggles made them slip, leaving Janey's head and shoulders uncovered. Her hair crisped and singed and her hands blistered; her face grew hot, then cool, and then all was dark. * * *

"Am I dead?" asked a weak voice from among the pillows.

"No, daughter, nor near it now, thank Heaven; but you must not talk."

"But what makes my voice sound so queer and what ails my head? Where is my hair?" persisted the thin little voice.

"Gone up in the chariot of fire, Jane," answered Tom, coming in just then.

"And Dolly?" she gasped, as the awful day of trial came to memory.

"Doll's all right; a heap sight better off 'an you are. I tell you we've been having a time with you the last six weeks."

"Six weeks! Oh, Tom, is this October?"

"You bet; the 'a t day at that."

"And I didn't go to school after all?"

There was a piteous tone in the weak voice that Tom couldn't stand. "Mother, I'm going to tell her," he cried, impulsively.

"She must promise to keep perfectly quiet, then."

"Indeed, I will be quiet, mother. Now, Tom, tell me quick, all about it."

"Well, to begin with, you hadn't got half a mile away when Colonel Landis came riding up on the lookout for Dolly, but before he got to the trail after you the fire was all around him, and he knew it was no use to go on. Just as quick as the fire passed the men from Lane's and Colonel Landis started out to hunt you. Dolly had started home, but the ground was hot and burned her feet and she was crying, and, jiminy crickets! what a ugly-looking young 'un she was. Her face was as black as my pup. We found you down in the ravine and thought you was dead, sure. Your curls was all burned off, and your eyebrows and lashes and your face and hands all blistered. Poor Brete was pretty badly burned, too. You broke your ankle in the tumble. Colonel Landis brought you home, and here you've been for six weeks, screeching: 'Dolly, dear, you'll get burned.' I took care of her, after all," concluded Tom, loftily, "and she had to ride on a mule, too; it most killed her."

"And the corn?" questioned Janey.

"All burned, and mighty near took the barn, too."

"Poor father," sighed Janey, softly.

"Poor nuthin'. Why, Jane, you're a regular heroine, and Colonel Landis is going to send you to school three years! Fact! He's got it all fixed, and he's given father three cows and built us another stable, and there's the spankin'ist black pony in the stable all saddled and bridled, all fit for a fight."

"Tom, you're exciting Janey," remonstrated the gentle mother.

"And he's yours, and Colonel Landis says if he was to give you his gold mine in Arizona it wouldn't pay you for saving Doll's life. What did you say, mother?" grinned Tom, as he danced a jig about the room, satisfied to quit his story.

"What does it all mean, mother?" gasped Janey, in wild-eyed amazement. Tom had rattled his story off so fast that the weak brain hardly comprehended the half that had befallen her.

"It is true, just as Tom has told you, dear," replied her mother, "and here is Colonel Landis to see you."

"Words are a poor return for all you have done for me, Miss Janey, but I wanted to thank you in person for saving to me all that makes life worth living. Dolly is all I have in the world, my one treasure, and I shall not forget that you risked your life for her. I brought the little maid with me today. She wanted to see you very much, she said."

"I just wanted to tell you, Miss Janey, that the rabbits weren't burned a tinty bit, and I've got 'em every one right now, but they're pretty big. I'll give you one all for yourself, even if you did make me sit on a nasty, wet blanket."

Mrs. Janey Landis has that rabbit yet. It is stuffed, however, and occupies a prominent place in her cabinet, and, strange to relate, people do say that she makes an excellent stepmother. In her palatial city home, however, there are no prairie fires to fight, for which Colonel Landis, Dolly and Mamma Janey are dutifully thankful.—N. Y. Evening World.

A SCIENTIFIC TEACHER.

How He Rather More Than Filled the Bill.

"Two year ago this fall," said Uncle Josiah Windless, "there come 'long a young feller with a pale yeller face an' head, an a slick lookin', but slim, figger, and wanted the position o' schoolteacher in our deestric'. I was et thet time a member o' the School Board. I have sense lost the office, owin' partly to a slight change, politically, in the surroundin' kentry, and partly to the dereliction o' some o' my friends.

"Well, this was a nice appearin', polite young feller, an' I soon foun' by throwin' him some questions cal'ated to briskly sound his education, ef he hed any, thet he knowed a-plenty to teach in our deestric', an' p'r'aps some over. I then tole 'im plainly thet although his mental equlibrium, like, was, in my mind, fully established, his physical mold of form har'ly denoted the necessary amount of muscle er wind fer the place.

"We'd been considerably bothered, I told 'im, by hevin' hed sich slender, unwholesome chaps, who hed rashly undertook to run the school, git worsted in every encounter of importance they'd hed with some o' the more advanced scholars. Durin' the last term, on two or three 'casions, the onsidedness o' these contests hed resulted in the entire disruption, sorter, o' the school, an' the retirin' to the neighborin' woods o' the school-teacher.

"'Nothing,' I said, 'seemed to tend to the disorganization an' gineral disquietin' o' the educational system of our community as to hev a teacher take holt o' it thet hed only mediocre attainments in back-heelin', co'lar-an'-elbow an' plum out-an'-out knockin' down an' fallin' onto. I candidly tole 'im that I's afeered he'd be winded in a few roun's even by some o' the younger an' less ambitious pupils. What could we, the School Board, hev to expect, then, when he's tackled, an' tackled he would be, by one or more o' the head scholars, weighin', after harvest, one hundred and ninety pounds in their bare feet. There was pupils on the roll o' thet little country school, thet with one solid jolt under the hat rim, could show him more stars than all the colleges an' observatories in the hull Western Reserve.

"He looked a leedle excited an' more earnest, like, at this, but said right o' he'd undertake it anyway ef he could hev the chance, as he was hard up an' wanted money bad to complete his theological studies. I smiled some et the idee o' how them big six-foot students ud help pave his way to the ministery.

"Well, we concluded to give 'im a chance, as he knew somethin' already, an' was quiet an' willin' to learn more, an' we hoped this experience would, on the whole, at least not have a tendency to upset, but strengthen, rather, his purpose in life. The day-school opened; I made it a pint to go roun' to the school-house, long 'bout the middle o' the forenoon, determined rather 'n to hev the clever young feller hurt I'd take a han' myself. On enterin' the school-room I's surprised to at fust see nobody but the slim young teacher, an' him very dejected an' anxious lookin'. Goin' a ways up the aisle, I seed two o' the ole time ringleaders o' school-house rackets settin' quietly in a corner pale an' streaked an' with heads tied up, but very intent on their lessons.

"'My friend,' said the teacher, 'I'm afeered your no doubt well intended description o' these pupils, was, unwisely, very much overdrawn. B'lievin' implicity, every word ye uttered, I come yere determined to win er 't 'd be the fault o' the referee. An' when these two fellers showed 'et they 's spilin' fer a fight, I give it to 'em without a single stipulation, an' the best I hed in the shop, never thinkin' but what they knew somethin' o' sparrin'. Yere ye see the result.' sweeping his arms languidly over the empty benches an' towards the two damaged but studious youths in the corner. 'O' course,' he continued, 'I knocked out the greenies too quick for common exercise, an' so doin' innocently got in on 'em so hard that they 'll be no good to study, though now ever so keen, fer two weeks. The rest o' the school tuck to the woods before the close o' the fust an' only roun'.'

"Sinkin' back into a disp'rited heap, he wound up with: 'I'm feered I've busted the school up.'

"An would ye believe it? We couldn't no more git a single scholar to go to school agin to thet feller than nothin'! So we finally hed to fire 'im with two hull months' unearned pay in his pockets."—Sam, the Scaramouch.

A Fine Piece of Engineering.

The Bellows Falls (Vt.) Canal Company finished work on their massive head-gates that have been over a year in building at a cost of nearly two hundred thousand dollars. Over the huge archways and piers forming the gates is a big building of brick, holding the machinery that operates the gates. A thirty-five horse-power engine drives two hundred feet on main shafting, with thirteen large pulleys, seventy-two and seventy-eight inches in diameter, and eight counter-shafts with thirty-two-inch clutch pulleys running in opposite directions, that the shaft may be started or stopped either to lower or raise the gates, each gate being moved independently of the others. The implements for opening the gates consist of big iron screws twenty feet long passing through the hub of heavy gears connected with the machinery above. The gates are among the finest pieces of engineering in New England. In all the blasting that has been done no one has been killed.—N. Y. Post.

Overworked Menials.

A rather good-looking cook was hired out in the family of a wealthy man living in Dallas, Tex. One day her employer put his arm around her and kissed her, whereupon she dropped a courtesy and said, modestly:

"Don't put yourself to so much trouble. In all the other places where I've been the coachman had to attend to that, but perhaps he is kept busy here kissing the lady of the house."—Texas Siftings.

MY SWEETHEART

I'm in love with a fair little maiden—
With her eyes, with her lips, with her hands,
With her dozens of dear little dimples—
And although she's petite
On her sweet little feet,
Tis a wonder to me how she stands.

And she loves me, this dear little maiden;
And her hands, and her eyes, and her lips,
And her dimples, all giving me welcome—
In a sweet, artless way
Have their say, every day,
As to meet me she lovingly trips.

Will she wed me, this sweet little maiden?
—Bless you, no! That she never will do.
But, when I have told you the reason,
I haven't a fear
'Twill appear to you queer;
For I'm thirty—while she's only two!

A STRANGE STORY.

The Remarkable Resurrection of a Common Sailor.

How a Dead Man Returned to Life to Admonish Commodore Rodgers and His Former Comrades—An Incident of the War of 1813.

Archibald Forbes contributes to Belgravia the curious story found below. He says: Concerning the history of the subjoined curious narrative, the original manuscript of which, written in now faded ink on the rough dingy paper of sixty years ago, was placed in my hands in the course of a recent visit to America, only a few words are necessary. The narrative is addressed to "Mrs. Rodgers and sister," and appears to have been written at the request of the former lady, after the author's return from the sea on the termination of his service as surgeon of the frigate President, the famous fighting cruiser of the American republic in the war with England of 1812-14. Commodore Rodgers, who commanded the President during the war, and who was the husband of the lady for whom the account was written, gave to Dr. Turk's narrative his indorsement of its perfect accuracy. Of the authenticity of the document there can be no possibility of a doubt.

"Some time in the latter part of December, 1813, a man by the name of William Kemble, aged twenty-three (a seaman on board of the United States frigate President, commanded by Commodore John Rodgers, on a cruise, then near the Western Islands), was brought to me from one of the tops, in which he was stationed, having burst a vessel in his lungs, the blood gushing with great violence from his mouth and nostrils. With much difficulty I succeeded in stopping the discharge, and he was put upon remedies suited to his case. I visited him often, and had the best of opportunity of becoming acquainted with his temper, habits and intellectual attainments; and under all circumstances, during his illness, found his language and behavior such as stamped him the rough, profane and illiterate sailor. It is my belief, although I can not positively assert it, that he could not either read or write. It is certain that his conversation never differed in the least from that of the most ignorant and abandoned of his associates, constantly mixed with oaths and the lowest vulgarity. Had he possessed talents or learning, he must have betrayed it to me during his long confinement.

"In the early part of January, 1814, a vessel bore down upon us with every appearance of an English frigate. All hands were called to quarters, and after a short and animated address by the Commodore to the crew, all prepared to do their duty. Before I descended to the cockpit, well knowing Kemble's spirit and how anxious he would be to partake of the glorious victory (defeat never entered our thoughts), I thought it best to visit him. After stating to him the peculiar situation he was in, and the great danger he would be exposed to by the least emotion, I entreated and ordered him not to stir during the action, which he promised to observe. We were soon obliged to fire. At the sound of the first gun he could restrain himself no longer, but regardless of my admonitions and of his own danger, he rushed upon deck and flew to his gun, laying hold to help run her out. A fresh and tremendous discharge from his lungs was the consequence, and he was brought down to me again in a most deplorable state. I apprehended immediate death, but by the application of the proper remedies I succeeded once more in stopping the hemorrhage, by which he was reduced to a state of the most extreme debility. Being near the equator and suffering much from heat, his hammock was slung on the gun-deck between the ports, affording the best circulation of air. He continued for some time free from hemorrhage, but was under the constant use of medicine, and was confined to a particular diet. This made him fretful, and he would frequently charge my mates with starving him, at the same time damning them in the true sailor fashion. After some time, being again called to quarters at night, he was necessarily removed below to the sick berth (commonly called bay.) This was followed by another discharge of blood from his lungs, which was renewed at intervals until his death.

"On January 17, in the afternoon, Dr. Birchmore, my first mate, came to me on deck, and reported Kemble to be dead. I directed him to see that his messmates did what was usual on such occasions preparatory to committing his remains to the deep. About two hours after this Dr. Birchmore again called on me. He said that Kemble had come to life, and was holding forth to the sailors in a strange way. I directly went down, where I witnessed one of the most remarkable and unaccountable transactions that, perhaps, had ever fallen to the lot of man to behold. Kemble had awakened as it were from sleep, raised himself up and called for his messmates in particular, and those men who were not on duty to attend to his words. He told them he had experienced death, but was allowed a short space of time to return and give them, as well as the officers, some direction for their future conduct in life. In this situation I found him, surrounded by the crew, all mute with astonishment, and paying the most serious attention to every word that escaped from his lips. The oldest men were in tears, not a dry eye was to be seen, or a whisper heard; all was as solemn as the grave. His whole body was cold as death could make it. There was no pulsation in the wrists, the temples or the chest perceptible. His voice was clear and powerful, his eyes uncommonly brilliant and animated. After a short and pertinent address to the medical gentlemen, he told me in a peremptory manner to bring Commodore Rodgers to him, as he had something to say to him before he finally left us. The Commodore consented to go with me, when a scene was presented truly novel and indescribable, and calculated to fill with awe the stoutest heart. The sick bay (or berth) in which he lay is entirely set apart to the use of those who are confined to their beds by illness. Supported by the surgeons, surrounded by his weeping and astonished comrades, a crowd of spectators looking through the lattice work which inclosed the room, a common japanned lamp throwing out a sickly light, and a candle held opposite his face by an attendant, was the situation of things when our worthy commander made his appearance; and well does he remember the effect produced by so uncommon a spectacle, especially when followed by the utterance of these words from the mouth of one long supposed to have been dead: 'Commodore Rodgers, I have sent for you, sir, being commissioned by a higher power to address you for a short time, and to deliver the message intrusted to me when I was permitted to revisit the earth. Once I trembled in your presence, and was eager to obey your commands; but now I am your superior, being no longer an inhabitant of the earth. I have seen the glories of the world of spirits. I am not permitted to make known what I have beheld; indeed, were I not forbidden, language would be inadequate to the task; 'tis enough for you and the crew to know that I have been sent back to earth to reanimate for a few hours my lifeless body, commissioned by God to perform the work I am now engaged in. He then, in language so chaste and appropriate that it would not have disgraced the lips or the pen of a divine, took a hasty view of the moral and religious duties incumbent on the commander of a ship of war. He reviewed the vices prevalent on shipboard, pointed out the relative duties of officers and men, and concluded by urging the necessity of reformation and repentance. He did not, as was feared by our brave commander, attempt to prove the sinfulness of fighting and wars; but, on the contrary, warmly recommended to the men the performance of their duty to their country with courage and fidelity. His speeches occupied about three-quarters of an hour, and if the whole could have been taken down at the time, they would have made a considerable pamphlet, which would no doubt have been in great demand. Dr. Birchmore, now at Boston, heard all the addresses, I only the last.

"When he finished with the Commodore, his head dropped upon his breast, his eyes closed, and he appeared to have passed through a second death. No pulsation nor the least degree of warmth could be perceived during the time that he was speaking. I ordered him to be laid aside, and left him. * *

"I retired to bed, deeply reflecting upon the past, unable to sleep, when about nine o'clock p. m., many hours after Kemble had been laid by, I was called out of bed to visit a man taken suddenly ill in his hammock, hanging near Kemble's apartment. It was an hour when all but the watch on deck had turned in; general silence reigned, and all the lights below were out, with the exception of a single lamp in the sick apartment, where lay the remains of Kemble. I had bled the sick man—he was relieved. I entered the sick-room before I retired to replace something and was turning round to leave it, being alone, when suddenly I was almost petrified upon beholding Kemble sitting up in his berth with his eyes (which had regained their former brilliancy and intelligence) fixed intently upon mine. I became, for a moment, speechless and motionless. Thinks I to myself, what have I done, or left undone, in this man's case that would cause him thus to stare at me at this late hour, and alone? I waited a long time in painful suspense, dreading some horrid disclosure, when I was relieved by his commanding me to fetch him some water. With what alacrity I obeyed can easily be imagined. I gave him a tin mug containing water, which he put to his mouth, drank off the contents, and returned to me; then laid himself quietly down for the last time. His situation was precisely the same in every respect as before described. The time was now expired which, he had said, was given him to remain in the body. The next day by noon, all hands attended as usual to hear the funeral service read, and see his remains consigned to a watery grave. It was an unusually solemn period. Seamen are naturally superstitious, and on this occasion their minds had been wrought upon in a singular manner. Decorum is always observed by sailors at such times; but now they were all affected to tears, and when the body was slid from the plank into the sea, every one rushed instinctively to the ship's side to take a last look. The usual weights had been attached to the feet, yet, as if in compliment to their anxiety to see more of him, the body rose perpendicularly from the water breast-high two or three times. This incident added greatly to the astonishment already created in the minds of the men. I beg leave to remark that it was not proper to keep the body longer in the warm latitude we were in.

"I have now given a short and very imperfect sketch of the important events attending the last illness and death of William Kemble. It is submitted to the ladies in this State, begging they will excuse haste and inaccuracy. The change procured upon the crew was for a time remarkable. It appeared as if they would never smile or swear again. The effect wore off by degrees, except when the subject was renewed. "W. TURK."

—Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, recently told a correspondent that literary activity in the United States is on the increase, and that about one thousand more copyrights have been granted during 1885 than at a corresponding time in 1884. This increase is largely due to the great number of articles copyrighted by newspapers and magazines. Of his "American Almanac," Mr. Spofford said: "It has not a very large circulation. The library edition reached last year about eighteen hundred, and seven thousand of the paper edition were sold, the last, however, at so cheap a price that they barely paid the cost of publication."—*N. ONLY FOR AWHILE!

Dearie, draw your chair beside me,
For I love to have you near,
And I have some words to tell you,
That you soon or late must hear!
Closer, dearie, for the darkness
Seems to me to come apace,
And, altho' the daylight lingers,
I can scarcely see your face.

Dearie, we have one together
Liv'd, and been for fifty years;
Fac'd the world, and fought its battles,
Thro' its hopes and thro' its fears;
Now for one the fight is ending,
I am first ordain'd to fall,
Leaving you alone, my dearie,
You, who are my all in all!

Dearie, stay those tears, I pray you,
Hard it is stout heart to keep!
But to me 'tis, in this moment,
Harder still to see you weep!
We are only parting, dearie,
For awhile; there! take my hand!
Kiss me, for my soul is pluming
For the bright Eternal Land!

Just as Glad to See an Actor.

Gen. Custer, Lawrence Barrett and Stuart Robson went over to Brooklyn years ago to hear Mr. Beecher preach. After the sermon the three went around to the house of a friend where Mr. Beecher was to come immediately after church. They were seated in the parlor chatting as the great preacher came in. The names had been given to him in the hall. As soon as he reached the threshold of the parlor door he said, "Mr. Robson!" The actor went over and extended his hand.

"I am delighted to see you, delighted to see you. But you are a much younger looking man than I expected to find."

"Oh, I am 45 years at least, Mr. Beecher," replied Robson.

"I shouldn't think it, sir; I shouldn't think it. You are a very young man to be secretary of the navy."

"I am not Mr. Robson, the secretary of the navy, but Mr. Robson, the actor."

"Oh, it makes no difference," said Mr. Beecher, "I am glad to see you notwithstanding my mistake."

But he lost no time in turning from him to pay court to Gen. Custer. As he had made a mistake on the political end he made up for it by paying court to the military hero until the discussion became general.—New York Star.

Defect in Educational System.

Perhaps the most serious defect of the system of liberal education now prevalent in the United States is its lack of a truly progressive character. It is full of fits and starts. It is too disjointed and fragmentary. This is partly because there are no settled principles of procedure, fixing the order and amounts of the studies; and partly because there is no power which can secure teachers that know precisely what they are expected, fitted and permitted to teach. The consequence is that the different years of school life too much resemble the different successive sessions of our legislatures. Milton somewhere describes the process of legislation as "hatching a lie with the heat of jurisdiction." Fortunately, the process also consists in killing the brood of lies already hatched by previous legislation. Now the process of education in this country is by no means so bad in this regard as the process of legislation; but in certain respects the former too much resembles the latter.—Professor George Trumbull Ladd, of Yale college, in Scribner.

He Didn't Pronounce It That Way.

An old fellow from the country, who has plenty of money invested, some of it in an uptown hotel of the family sort, was approached on the first day of opening it by a natty young man with a debonair smile.

"Have you any rooms en suite?" he asked.

"Any what?" inquired the new landlord.

"Rooms en suite."

"See here, young man, how many of them are you?" asked the granger.

"Just me and Mamie—I mean my wife. We—we haven't been married long. She sent me around to see if you had any suites."

"Well, you go home and tell her to come right along. We've got plenty of rooms, and when you and she are in them they'll be too sweet for anything. If we haven't got rooms in sweets we'll have sweets in rooms. Come again, young feller."—New York News.

Tennyson.

A poet should never grow old—or he should not let it be known. There might be a secret league among the kinsfolk of poets to prevent the discovery of the date of their birth. Aged philosophers seem in the natural order of things, but the man that writes of youth, love and the fair face of nature, or the passions which rarely exist beyond middle age, should never grow old. Lord Tennyson at 80 does not seem as if he could be the poet, Alfred Tennyson, but the fact that he was born on Aug. 6, 1809, is being proclaimed by all the papers. The New York Times says: "In combined length and distinction there is in English literature no contemporary or recent parallel to Tennyson's career."—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Lucky Blunders.

The much maligned compositor and proof reader have saved one newspaper from serious loss. The Gazette de France is the lucky sheet. Accused with several other papers of printing without authority the act of accusation against General Boulanger, The Gazette escaped on showing that owing to serious mistakes in composition and proof reading the document it published was not a true copy of the act and that the offense contemplated by law had not been committed. The other papers whose compositors and proof readers were above reproach were convicted and fined.—Chicago Tribune.

Reason Dethroned.

Judge—Did you ever notice any signs of insanity in the deceased?

Witness (a member of the legislature)—Well, once, when he was a member of the legislature, he introduced a bill that wasn't a particle of interest to anybody—except taxpayers.—New York Weekly.

CORRESPONDENCE.

C. MULHOLLAND, ESQ.

Dear Sir:—I have received several copies of your paper and have been gratified with the information which I have obtained by it; but nothing has more pleased me which I have seen in it, than a brief item regarding one W. H. Martin. In 1886, before I had sustained the buggy upset, which has since disabled me a good deal, I had an idea of going up to Inyo county, and noticing Martin's advertisement of his great International Company, his office then being on California street, I called in and interviewed him. He then occupied a fine office, and he did also have a nice large room, some months ago, in the Flood building. But one thing I noticed particularly was his assumption, as being equal to that of a confidence operator. I proposed to go up to Inyo county, and there to examine the lands, and was willing if satisfied to make a purchase of anything in his hands, to pay a commission for his having brought it to my notice, but I was disinclined to purchase or to invest money entirely on his representations. But I saw that did not suit him, except to get hold of some of the ready cash in hand. Well I thought that perhaps he might be an honest und truthful man, but his style and manner did not so impress me; in fact although I have never known anything to impugn the man's character here, yet I must say that he did not gain my confidence so that I would be willing to entrust him with my money, without more substantial backing than he has ever displayed to my observation.

* * * * * * *

One of the things which I have learned from your paper, is the existence, by it's advertisement of a freight company for hauling from Mojave to Bishop Creek, which shows how badly the people of your county are in need of better railroad communication, as the charges by rail must be quite high over the existing lines to enable team hauling for such a distance. Very likely however the freights hauled by that company, are what are shipped from the East over the southern lines, that is the Atchison system or the S. P, by Texas, or from Southern California. But a direct route out would evidently be of great advantage to Inyo County.

It has got to be so late and the rainy season having already commenced, as it would appear, I will probably not be able to make your county a visit this season. And when I have said th t much, it leaves the proposition of ever going there very uncertain, as an old man nearly 68 years of age, who is encumbered with many infirmities and disabilities, cannot calculate with much certainty of doing anything in the future. I believe that the altitude and the dry climate of your county would be well adapted to my condition of health; but it is inconvenient for me to travel now and make personal observation for myself, and my business and property matters are a good deal scattered about at present, and require my personal attention hereabouts for awhile. I may get up in your county next season, but as to what the future may bring forth I hardly can calculate upon at this time. The only thing which I have heard alleged against your climate is that it is quite windy in Owens River valley for a part of each year. But as to how much of a drawback that may be, I am unable to understand without more definite knowledge concerning it.

Hoping that this rather length communication will not prove tiresome, I remain

Yours respectfully,
M. M. CHIPMAN, M. D.
404 Turk St., San Francisco.

State Irrigation.

Mr Lincoln Fowler, of Phoenix, Arizona, sends us a copy of a bill he has drafted for the reclamation of arid lands. It provides for the cession of all such lands to the States and Territories within which they lie, the proceeds of their sale to be devoted to the construction of irrigation works. We do not approve of all the details of Mr. Fowler's scheme, but the central idea is sound. The actual work of irrigation, after the field is thoroughly mapped out, belongs more to the States than to the National Government. But if the Government retains the lands to be benefited the States cannot afford to reclaim them. If all the arid lands in California were ceded to the State, we should be justified in carrying out a complete and perfect system of irrigation. It would not be good policy to sell the land, at least not at first. The State should keep it and rent it. In that way the public would get the benefit of the "unearned increment" which the growth of population would soon add to the value of the soil, and the payment of the irrigation bonds would be no burden to anybody.—S. F. Examiner.

The Office Towel.

Bob Burdette writes as follows: "When I think of the towel, the old-fashioned towel, that used to hang up by the printing-house door, I think that nobody in these days of shoddy can hammer out iron to wear as it wore. The tramp who abused it, the devil who used it, the comp. who got at it when these two were gone, the make-up and foreman, the editor, poor man, each rubbed some grime off while they put a heap on. In, over and under, 'twas blacker than thunder, 'twas harder than poverty, rougher than sin; from the roller suspended, it never was bended, and it flapped on the wall like a banner of tin. It grew thicker and rougher and harder and tougher, and daily put on a more inky hue, until one windy morning, without any warning, it fell on the floor and was broken in two."

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

"He isn't degraded any, then?" asked Mr. Philbrick slyly, as they walked on again, "by his good fortune."

"I cannot carry out your proposal, it isn't in my line. I am a business man and must work in character. I actually feel as if I had made quite a step, for me."

"A step!" cried his companion, eagerly reaching out to clasp his hand. "A stride, only I want you to go clear to the goal."

"I am too slow for you," smiled Philip, sadly, as he shook his head. "What I have attempted seems enough for one life work. I don't want to risk it all by a new experiment. Here we are at my house, won't you come in?"

They stood at the gate. The front door stood invitingly open, showing the broad oaken staircase, and still beyond, the table set for the evening meal.

"Not to-night, thank you." Mr. Philbrick shook his hand for parting, but did not seem quite ready to go.

"Tea is all ready," urged Philip, "and I am quite alone."

"Oh no, my train leaves," he made an excuse to look at his watch, "in half an hour." Still he hesitated.

At last he laid his hand gently on Philip's arm.

"You are young and have probably a long life of usefulness before you. But a man can never tell." Philip looked in surprise at him. "You may change your mind, or give up your work; if you should want to, just let me know, I would like to buy you out and run things on my plan."

"But you are not rich enough. You probably know the valuation of the Breton Mills," answered Philip, a little proudly.

"I could pay you something, and you wouldn't drive too hard a bargain. You would be glad, perhaps, to contribute in that way."

Philip burst into a hearty laugh; his honest old friend was losing his wits. Give up his factory, and his own scheme that was his only hope in life! But Mr. Philbrick did not smile. He seemed actually serious and awaiting an answer.

"Well, I will give you the first chance when I want to sell."

The old gentleman's earnestness sobered Philip in spite of himself. He was sorry he had laughed. Perhaps he had been mocking his own destiny. The philanthropist's proposal began to affect him as a death's head at a feast. He was afraid he could not forget it. Did his friend know him better than he knew himself? Did he see elements of weakness in his character that would be sure to wreck his beautiful hopes?

Philip walked slowly up to his door. Once he turned and looked after the bent but still vigorous figure of the bad prophet. No doubt he was already planning how to revolutionize the whole management of the mill.

"I will never speak with him again," he muttered.

Then he looked back at his house again. It was in that very doorway, open as it was now, that Bertha had stood and kissed her hand to him the last time she had been at his home. That was when his chief thoughts of life were as a wedding journey—that was before the first cloud had dimmed his sunlight. And now she had returned. She had shamed her father's house and her mother's pure memory. She had shamed him who had been her lover since childhood, and all for a man she did not love enough to stay with him. Still he could not help that first tumultuous throb of his heart, the unreasoning wave of joy that had swept over him at the very sight of her changed, tired face. She had done her worst to spoil his life, to drive peace and happiness from his soul, but that pure, steady glow in his heart, ah, it was love yet.

Philip's heart was very full of bitterness, the fruit of his love instead of peace. He stopped midway to his door, and plucked a rose, slowly tore out its blushing petals and let the summer breeze carry them away.

The great work for the poor he had commenced would have made him the happiest man in the world if she could have shared his enthusiasm with him. His was the disposition even and sweet, just the one to get the most contentment out of his life, but loneliness was terrible to him.

"Perhaps it is better so," he said aloud, as he crushed the fragment of the flower in his hand. No doubt he was light and weak, and it was only under the pressure of a great burden that he could accomplish anything. That gave him intensity. And then Bertha might have weakened his purpose if he formed one, not sympathizing with him, and it had not been her wont to sympathize with him. His very devotion to her might have made him waver, or for very happiness he might not have thought of anything but his bride. If a man has a great work to do it is better to be alone. Two souls never can have but a single thought, and the least friction might delay his progress; the least discouragement might hinder his footsteps on the mountain bringing glad tidings to the wretched.

All that peril had been saved him. Curran had proved a better friend to the people than he thought, even when he deserted them, in breaking in upon Philip Breton's idle dream of love.

Perhaps it was from Bertha's shame had sprung all the good that blessed a thousand hopeless lives.

Philip shuddered as he went up the broad stone steps to his silent house. It seemed infamous to associate the thought of shame with the woman whose beautiful, high bred face he had looked into again today. And Bertha was in the very village with him; the great outside world had given her back safe. He need not tremble for her any more, for her father's arm protected her.

He looked across the fields, where he could see one gable of the house that held her, almost hidden by overshadowing trees. Perhaps she was in her room this moment weeping bitter tears for the sweet, rare life she had lost by her madness.

He passed his hand over his eyes.

"Must she suffer forever—for what she has repented of, and the streams of despair flow always through her heart, washed whiter than snow?"

He walked into his home, and through the echoing hall and stood in the door of his dining room. There were sideboards and chairs enough to provide for a party—the table glittered with its massive plate, and glistened with exquisite china, but only one seat was placed.

CHAPTER XX.

VERY ODD.

It was an hour later than usual the next afternoon that Philip pushed back his chair from the office table preparatory to going home. He did not acknowledge to himself a certain sweet excitement that affected him as he rose to his feet, much less the cause of it; and he laid it to ordinary masculine vanity that he paused a moment before a mirror before he went out.

It was not the same face he used to see in the glass. His black moustache had grown heavy and completely hid his rather unartistic upper lip, but it was not that had changed him so much. His forehead had some new lines in it and there was, somehow, a firmer look about the corners of his mouth; the youth and freshness that had lasted for twenty-six summers had given place on the twenty-seventh. There was a self poise and suggestion of reserved force in him now that stood for some very rapid development of character.

As Philip went up the hill, his quick eyes caught a glimpse of a woman's dress by Mr. Ellingsworth's gate, and in a few steps more he could see it was the shade of blue Bertha loved. Why might it not be Bertha, why not, except that he was so eager it should be? He hurried as much as he dared—how strongly his heart was beating. She might turn any moment and go into the house. He tried to think of what he could say to her if it was she.

Yes, it was Bertha. Her face was turned away, showing him only the perfect Greek profile and the uncovered coils of her wonderful golden hair. Her hand rested on the gate as she looked off on the hills. How grand her thoughts must be to harmonize with the superb dignity of her face. Philip felt guilty at disturbing her, but it had been so long. He came quite near, so near that the magnetic thrill of her presence touched him more deeply, more tenderly, he thought, than of old, but she had not turned. He saw the path of careworn lines across her forehead that had been as smooth as marble. There was a faded look on her cheeks, less full than they used to be, and their exquisite color less evenly spread. Her hand was whiter and showed its blue veins almost painfully. His heart ached over her, his proud Bertha. Why could not God have spared her! He would rather have died and saved her the care and suffering that had stricken her loveliness. Then she turned at the sound of footsteps, and a great wave of tenderness swept over his soul. He looked at her so eagerly, so gently that it seemed her face might soften a little, but it did not, nor was there any mark of startled surprise at his coming so suddenly upon her.

"It is you Philip?" Even her voice was changed, there was a new hardness in it. She reached out her cold white hand to him.

For a moment he did not speak. It seemed as if his heart would break, there was such a stress upon it. And then he was afraid she might be ashamed before him, ashamed of the terrible injustice she had done him, ashamed of the blot that had touched her name. But whatever she might have felt, there was no sign of any emotion on her impassive face.

"And you are the mill owner now," she said. "How old it seems." She smiled graciously, but still he could not speak. He could only look down at the thin, blue veined hand he held, and keep back the sob that trembled on his lips for his lost love.

And that smile and such words as those were all she had for him at last. He had to look away for strength to speak. He must think of some commonplace that would not startle her repose. Ah! there was the doorway where she had given him the first ardent caress of his life the last time he had talked with her, the night she forsook him. Did she remember, he wondered? He looked back at the cold, beautiful eyes, and the amused smile yet lingered on her lips.

"Yes, it does seem very odd."

Philip dipped his pen in the inkstand. He was sitting in his study at home, later in the afternoon than usual. Nothing unimportant could have detained him so long from his factory, and, besides, there was a look of unusual solemnity on his face. Philip Breton had just written his will. It was a very elaborate instrument, prepared from memoranda of the ablest lawyer in the state. A moment ago he had signed it, and the names of the witnesses were not dry yet. He had been uneasy for a long time that the destiny of the thousand creatures who worked in his mill, and of their successors forever, should hang on so feeble a thread as a human life, which might snap before he could give spontaneous energy to the plans that now only lived in his brain. He wrote in large, plain letter across the back of the paper, "The Last Will and Testament of Philip Breton." Then he read the whole instrument over again—the magna charta of Bretonville. How glad the village would be when his will came to be known—when it was found that the mill owner had not been satisfied with what he could do in his lifetime, but had placed his benevolence on a perpetual footing, had reached back his hand from his grave to shower blessings on the laboring poor God had committed to his charge. Some men had wives and children to work for, to defend, to hope for. If he had been happy, and blessed with love and kisses, he might have been like the rest, never listening to the groans of his poor under burdens too heavy for them to bear. His heart would, perhaps, have been full of the little wants and trivial discomforts of his own circle, his mind busy with plans for the future of his sons, while a thousand dreary hopeless lives wore themselves out in the struggle for their scant bread, with never one pitiful thought from him.

Philip Breton was relieved now that he had made his will. He folded it carefully and put it in his inner breast pocket. Perhaps, he thought sadly enough, if he should die this moment it would be better for Bretonville, for his will might waver while he lived. He might not be able to sustain his high tone, but once dead, nothing could be changed. The words that an idle stroke of his pen could make null and void when once his hand became rigid in death, would leap forth from the written page into potent everlasting life. Suddenly he remembered another occasion when, as he had sat at this very table, he had been interrupted by the servant bringing him a letter—no, it was a note from Bertha. And he had been very happy, fancying the shadow had gone from his life. He just had opened this very table drawer when the maid had tapped at the door. He had been searching for something at the time. Oh! it was one of Bertha's pictures, and it must be here still. In a moment more he was unclasping a morocco case, then gazing with such tenderness as one has for the dead on the delicately tinted oval of Bertha's beautiful face in porcelain. The great blue eyes seemed to look surprise and reproach at him. It had been long ago, before so much as a dream of sin had tainted the holy innocence of her girlhood.

Philip closed his lips very tightly; he longed unutterably for her lost innocence; he hungered so desperately for the maidenly purity that looked out of these startled eyes. If she had died then, he might at least have cherished her memory. What had he done that he should be punished so terribly? Then the memories of the day when the picture was taken came rushing back upon him.

They two had been sitting in her garden on the afternoon of a summer day. It was two, three, almost four years ago, but he could see the blooming roses and hear the drowsy hum of the bees as if it had been yesterday. He had been reading a love poem to her; that was as near as he dared come to love making; sometimes letting his voice soften and tremble a little over the tenderer passages. He was but a timid lover, and Bertha so royally cold. Suddenly glancing at her, he saw she was overcome with the heat, and had fallen asleep leaning her shapely head back against the rough bark of the tree. Her fingers loosely clasped in her sloping lap suggested perfect repose; the girlish bosom rose and fell with her still breathing, and there was an exquisite pout on her lips, as if vaguely mutinous against the hardness of her pillow. His heart was beating violently as he laid aside his book and seated himself on the bench by her side. But he dared not profane the vestal purity of such sleep as hers; he devoured her face with his eyes, but did not steal one kiss from the red lips, though there was such a sweet, mute invitation on them. But he put his arm about her and drew her toward him as gently as if she were a sleeping infant, and made her head rest on his shoulder. Then he looked down the red tinged cheeks, like the woods in autumn's tenderest mood, swept by her long, golden eyelashes, and tried to fancy she was awake, though her eyes were closed, and that she was willing her head should rest on his breast and her hair like fine threads of twisted Roman gold kiss his burning face.

But she moved in her slumber, and then her star like eyes opened and looked mute astonishment into his eager face. For one startled moment she did not move, and in sudden boldness from the liberty he had already taken he poured his passionate declarations into her ears, covering her hair and her forehead and then her cool white hands with kisses.

"You frighten me, Philip." Her quick, startled tones as she rose to her feet yet rang in his ears. She looked at him as half of a mind to run away. "I don't understand you," she said, reproachfully. The porcelain picture is just as she was then.

"Why, Bertha!" He had risen, too; but she drew back from him. "I love you. I want you for my wife."

How coldly she had looked at his flushed, excited face. He thought it was the supreme moment in his life; but it seemed to be nothing to her.

"Is that all? Why, I thought you were mad."

Ah, and the same madness burned in his soul this moment. Time could not wear it out. Shame, outrage, desolation could not kill it. He rose to his feet and pushed the tinted porcelain away from him.

Mrs. Silas Ellingsworth was all smiles and grace as Philip entered her parlor, and she shook hands with him, lingered as cordially over the greeting as if she had quite forgotten her pretty fingers had ever been on his throat. She made him take a seat and began to make conversation with him, as if she supposed he had called to see her. But suddenly she affected to be struck with an idea.

"Oh, I know why you are not more talkative, you didn't come to see me at all." She stepped to the door. "Susan, call Miss Ellingsworth."

"Miss!" Then there was no longer any room for doubt. Philip shrank at the blow she gave him. He had thought all uncertainty was gone long ago, but he found that up to this very instant he had cherished a spark of hope that Bertha had a right to the name of the man she had fled with. And she was "Miss" still. His hostess way saying something, but he did not hear it, there was such a deathly faintness about his heart.

Then there came a step in the hall, and his familiar thrill of tenderness at her coming. She lingered an instant on the threshold, an old habit of hers that gave him time to step forward and meet her.

Mrs. Ellingsworth had risen, too, and was waiting to speak. It was only tenderness in Philip Breton's eyes as he took both Bertha's hands so gently, but she said:

"Am I very much changed, then?" and a pained look flitted across her face. Philip did not answer her for a moment, he was so distressed at her interpretation of the love that made his sight misty as he gazed at her.

"Well, I suppose I am in the way," remarked the mistress of the house, with inbred vulgarity. She was smiling sweetly, but women's smiles do not always signify amiability. "I suppose," she added, letting her skirts touch her two guests as she passed out, "you want to talk over old times with Miss Ellingsworth."

Now came the last terrible assurance; Philip winced at the heartless blow, but not so much as a flash passed over Bertha's cold face. She accepted the name without even a shade of silent denial on her calm features, though it was the badge of shame for her.

"Oh, no," but he dared not look her in the face for fear she should see his anxious pity for her. "You have been ill, perhaps, but I always thought you the loveliest woman in the world."

She smiled as she let him lead her to a seat. "You always said that." Then she glanced sadly into the mirror. "But it is more pleasant to hear now, for I know I am not pretty any longer."

Could she understand that the change that had come over her radiant beauty only changed his love to make it deeper? Could she not see the new intensity of yearning in his eyes as he raised them to her face again? He longed to draw her into his arms and kiss her tired face into eternal smiles. His love had been refined into a new divineness; a love capable of all sacrifices for her; that asked no price, but would pour itself in an eternal flood against her dull indifference, if it must be; a love more pain than joy, of unutterable yearnings for what he believed she could never have for him; that would seem to grow on her unresponsiveness; that welled up the mightier for her coldness, content if hereafter it might throw a little brightness on the path her snowy feet should tread; content if she would but let him warm her cold heart with his tenderness.

"Are you glad to be at home?" he asked, gently.

"Do you call this home, with my servant its mistress?" For a moment it was Bertha, as she used to be, her anger curling her red lips and flashing new fire into her tired eyes.

"Does she insult you?"

"It is insult enough that she is my father's wife. She can not go beyond that."

"Shall you stay here alway?" asked Philip stupidly enough.

"I suppose so; where else is there?"

A wild impulse touched him; he loved her and she needed love, had he not waited long enough? But a sudden fear came into his mind and chilled his hope like a frozen fountain. She might have a child—how strange he had never thought of it before. Ah, it would be a strong love which could endure that, a baby to hang on her bosom and take her kisses, a baby with Curran's face. No, he could never bear that, anything better than that. Her sin he could forgive. Though it must linger forever in his memory, he would bury it beneath more blessed experiences. His love should hallow her, he would kiss away Curran's caresses from her lips. But if there were a child——

Philip started violently and looked at the door; he fancied he heard a sound like the pattering of infant feet. In a moment Bertha would catch to her arms her child and Curran's, and half smother it with a mother's kisses.

"Isn't that a child's voice?" he cried, rising to his feet and his eyes rested on her in a new pitiful reproach. He thought she started strangely, as if a mother's instincts stirred in her bosom.

"Oh, no; it is only Jane—I mean Mrs. Ellingsworth. What an innocent little laugh she has."

ANOTHER FAMILY OUT OF TROUBLE

AND, AS A RESULT, HAPPY.

Such a remark as this will always draw the attention of every good thinking man or woman. We all desire to be out of trouble and happy, and when we read as above, our hearts join in congratulations. This is one of the many cases that our heading meets exactly:

"I, G. W. Mortley, 536½ Howard Street, have been a severe sufferer for years, and have had the best doctors in San Francisco attend me, without any results for the better. My trouble was severe attacks of pains in my back and chest; headache; loss of appetite; languid, tired feelings; skin rough and greasy, and, in fact, generally broken down in health. I purchased two bottles of your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, and after two weeks I find myself cured from all my ailments. My appetite is fine, my pains are gone, my skin is clear, and I can surely say I am well, and will ever thank your wonderful remedy for my health, and, in fact, my life.

Very truly yours, G. W. Mortley,
536½ Howard St., San Francisco, Cal."

He Got a Loan.

The other evening a citizen who stood at the corner of Woodward and Jefferson avenues was asked by a stranger for a nickel to pay car fare up Michigan avenue.

"You look able to walk," was the reply.

"So I am; but I'm in a great hurry."

"It strikes me as pretty cheeky for a tramp to beg money to ride on when his legs are all right."

"My dear man, this is an exceptional case. I was up that avenue today and met a citizen who pitied my forlorn condition. He didn't have any boodle with him just then, but promised to give me fifty cents if I would meet him at the corner of Fifteenth street at 9 o'clock. It is now 8:30. I can't make it on foot. If I don't get a nickel I am gone up for that half. Please look at the case with a business eye and favor me with the loan."

He was favored, and he got on the front end of the car so as to get there seventeen feet ahead of the rear platform.—Detroit Free Press.

The Transformation Marriage Effects.

"Marriage," said Jimson, "makes quite a transformation in a girl. When she is single she is one person; when she gets married she and her husband are one person; therefore she is then only half of one person, see?"

"Oh, you're away off," said Stimson. "When she is single she is of course one person, as you say, but when she's married she becomes more than one person."

"How do you make that out?"

"When she's single she's Miss, but when she's married she's Mrs."—Boston Courier.

He Saw a Resemblance.

Uncle Harry had come to visit his family after a long residence in the Northwest. Taking down Algernon's tennis racket, he said:

Fortune's Favorites.

Corsicana, Tex., August 27, 1889.—Corsicana boasts to-day of two of the happiest men in Texas, in the persons of Messrs. John W. O'Neal and O. P. Wimberly, the lucky men who drew $15,000 each in The Louisiana State Lottery drawing of the 13th instant. Each gentleman paid $1 for the one-twentieth of ticket No. 87,835, which proved to be the number which drew the capital prize of $300,000. There was great excitement here when the News heralded the fact that $30,000 had been drawn in this city. Your correspondent first sought Mr. O'Neal at his restaurant and asked to see the ticket. "Uncle John," as he is familiarly called, was slow to realize his luck, but after depositing his ticket with the First National bank for collection and getting a receipt for the same he said he began to "feel like a bloated bondholder."

Mr. O. P. Wimberly, who kept a small butcher-shop here, offered to dispose of his ticket for "two bits" when he heard that O'Neal had drawn the capital prize, but no one would buy it. Imagine his surprise when he found that he also held the lucky number. He also deposited his ticket with the First National Bank for collection.

The tickets were promptly forwarded to New Orleans, the $30,000 collected and placed to the credit of the happy men, less the usual rate of exchange.

Wimberly says he will take a pleasure trip soon and when he returns home will invest a portion of his money. Mr. O'Neal says he shall buy a small farm near Corsicana and get his nephew to work and manage it, and spend his remaining days in peace and quietude.—Galveston (Tex.) News, Aug. 30.

CATARRH,

HAY FEVER, CATARRHAL DEAFNESS

A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on application by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King St., Toronto, Canada.—Scientific American.

HAPPY RECOVERY.

There is nothing I now enjoy that I do not owe to having used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy. of Rondout, N. Y., at a time when I was suffering all that a human being could endure. My troubles began in my kidneys, from which I never expected to recover. My physicians said I had Bright's disease. I after I had a bad attack of Gravel. Six years ago last June—how well I remember that day—I saw Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy advertised in our paper. After using three bottles I was well. I have never had a return of the disease, and though I am over sixty years of age I am vigorous and strong, as I was in my prime. What physicians and the many remedies I had taken could not do Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy did; it stayed the disease and made me a well woman.—Mrs. Emiline P. Mizner, Burg Hill, O.

A DIG IN THE RIBS,

If on the right side and lower part of the diaphragm, though playfully meant and delivered, is calculated to evoke profanity from a chappy whose liver is out of order. When that region is sore and congested, pokes seem fiendish. Look at the man's countenance ere you probe him under the ribs. If his skin and eyeballs have a sallow tinge, you may infer also that his tongue is furred, his breath apt to be sour, that he has pains not only beneath his ribs, but also under the right shoulder-blade. Also, that his bowels are irregular and his digestion impaired. Instead of making a jocose demonstration on his ribs, recommend him to take, and steadily persist in taking, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the finest anti-bilious and alterative medicine extant. Incomparable is it, also, for dyspepsia, rheumatism, nervousness, kidney trouble, and fever and ague.

Sick Headache

Is a very distressing affection, generally arising from stomach troubles, biliousness and dyspepsia, and we frequently find persons of both sexes subject to periodic headaches for which they can ascribe no direct cause. But the headache is a sure indication that there is something wrong somewhere, and whatever the cause Hood's Sarsaparilla is a reliable remedy for headache, and for all troubles which seem to require a corrective and regulator. It cures dyspepsia, biliousness, malaria, tones the stomach, creates an appetite, and gives strength to the nerves.

"I have been troubled a great deal with headache, had no appetite, no strength, and felt as mean as any one could, and be about my work. Since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I have not had headache, my food has relished, and seemed to do me good, and I have been growing stronger every day." M. A. Steinman, Grand Rapids, Mich.

THE SWISS VINTAGE.

A Spectacle Devoid of All Poetic Gayety and Surroundings.

The winter and the vintage come on together at Villeneuve, and when the snows had well covered the mountains around, the grapes in the valley were declared ripe by an act of the Commune. There had been so much rain and so little sun that th ir ripeness was hardly attested otherwise. Fully two-thirds of the crop had blackened with blight; the imperfect clusters, where they did not hang sodden and mildewed on the vines, were small and sour. It was sorrowful to see them; and when, about the middle of October, the people assembled in the vineyards to gather them, the spectacle had none of the gayety which the poets had taught me to expect of it. These poor clusters did not reel to earth

Purple and gushing,

but limply waited the short-hooked knife with which the peasants cut them from their stems; and the peasants, instead of advancing with jocund steps and rustic song to the sound of the lute and tabor and other convenient instruments, met in obedience to public notice duly posted about the Commune, and set to work, men, women and children alike silent and serious. So many of the grapes are harvested and manufactured in common that it is necessary the vintage shou'd begin on a fixed day, and no one is allowed to anticipate or postpone. Some cut the grapes, and dropped them into the flattish wooden barrels, which others, after mashing the berries with a long wooden pestle, bore off and emptied frothing and gurgling into big casks mounted on carts. These were then driven into the village, where the mess was poured into the presses, and the wine crushed out to the last bitter dregs. The vineyards were a scene of activity, but not hilarity, though a little way off they looked rather lively with the vintagers at work in them. We climbed to one of them far up the mountain-side one day, where the family were gathering the grapes on a slope almost as steep as a house roof, father, mother, daughter, son-in-law, big boy and big girl all silently busy together. There were bees and wasps humming around the tubs of crushed grapes in the pale afternoon sun; the view of the lake and the mountains was inspiring; but there was nothing bacchanalian in the affair, unless the thick calves of the girl, as she bent over to cut the clusters, suggested a Mænad fury. These poor people were quite songless, though I am bound to say that in another vineyard I did hear some of the children singing. It had momentarily stopped raining; but it soon began again, and the vintage went sorrowfully on in the mud. All Villeneuve smelt of the harsh juice and pulp arriving from the fields in the wagons, carts, tubs and barrels which crowded the streets and sidewalks, and in divers cavernous basements the presses were at work, and there was a slop and drip of new wine everywhere. After dark the people came in from the fields and gossiped about their doors, and the red light of flitting lanterns blotched the steady rainpour. Outside of the village rose the black mountains, white at the top with their snows.

In the cafes and other public places there were placards advertising American wine-presses, but I saw none of them in use. At a farm-house near us we looked on at the use of one of the old-fashioned Swiss presses. Under it lay a mighty cake of grapes, stems and skin, crushed into a common mass, and bulges further beyond the press with each turn of the screw, while the juice ran in a little rivulet into a tub below. When the press was lifted, the grapes were seen only half crushed. Two peasants then mounted the cake, and trimmed it into shape with long-handled spades, piling the trimmings on top, and then bringing the press down again. They invited us with charming politeness to taste the juice, but their heavy boots bore evidence of too recent a visit to the cherished manure heap, and we thanked them with equal courtesy.

The grape cake, when it had yielded up its last drop, would be broken to pieces and scattered over the fields as a fertilizer. The juice would meanwhile have been placed to ferment in the tuns, twelve and thirteen feet deep, which lay in the adjoining cellar. * * * *

For weeks after the vintage people were drinking the new wine, which looked thick and whitish in the glasses, at all the cafes. It seemed to be thought a dainty beverage, but our scruples against it remained, and I can not say what its effect upon the drinkers might be. Perhaps it had properties as a "sweet, oblivious antidote" which rendered necessary the placard we saw in the cafe of the little Hotel Chillon:

Die Rose bluht,
Der Dorn der sticht;
Wer gleich bezahlt
Vergisst es nicht.

Or, in inadequate English:

The roses bloom,
The thorns they stick;
No one forgets
Who settles quick.

The relation of the ideas is not very apparent, but the lyric cry is still distinctly audible.—William Dean Howells, in Harper's Magazine.

GEMS ON MEMORANDUM.

A Habit That Has Long Been in Vogue Among Diamond Dealers.

An item appeared a few days ago announcing that Inspector Byrnes' men were looking for a young diamond broker who had obtained a large quantity of diamonds from a Maiden lane firm "on memorandum," and it was supposed had left the city with no intention of returning. To the misinformed eye of a reporter who read the item, the words "on memorandum" seemed to imply that in getting the diamonds the absconding broker had practiced some sort of fraud or deception upon the Maiden lane firm. He was somewhat surprised to learn, upon investigation, that the transaction was a perfectly regular one, and that it is the custom in the jewelers' trade for one merchant to allow diamonds or other jewels to go out to another merchant, or to a broker, for purposes of sale with no further security for their return than a "memorandum" between the parties. Sometimes this memorandum, even, is a verbal one, so that the jewels go out simply on the promise that they shall be returned.

"The custom is peculiar to our trade," said a well-known diamond merchant to a reporter the other day. "I don't believe that it prevails in other branches of business at all, or, at least, I never heard of it there. Of course, the basis of it all is simple honor and good faith. The custom is an old one, and it arose, undoubtedly, in the days when jewelers in a town were a little community by themselves and almost held their property in common. A sale by one man was regarded as a sale by all. Of course, we don't have that idea now, but you can can see how great a convenience this practice still is to the trade. A custom er comes to me and wants jewels of a certain size, quality and cut—perhaps some particular jewel that is known throughout the trade. I don't happen to have the jewels, but if I can send out and get them to show to the customer perhaps I can make a sale at once. My brother merchant must know that I am responsible and that my reputation is good for keeping my word. Yet I must say that merchants are, as a rule, careless about letting their goods go out. They seldom ask any questions, and if a man is known in the trade, and very slightly, it is the easiest thing in the world for him to borrow all the diamonds he wants. It is a singular thing, too, that so few diamonds are stolen in this way. I remember only two instances besides the one you speak of where a man who thus borrowed jewels ran off with them.

"Wholesale diamond merchants here thus place quantities of the gems in the hands of out-of-town dealers for sale. The dealer only pays for a diamond when he sells it. The wholesaler never thinks of demanding security. It's a mighty nice practice for the dealer, and the wholesale merchant has this advantage—that he can recall his jewels when he pleases. If the dealer fails the wholesaler can come right on and take away the jewels deposited. The question of the right of the wholesaler to do this has been decided in his favor by the courts. I was going to say that fully half of the so-called sales made by merchants here to out-of-town dealers are after this fashion.—N. Y. Sun.

NOVELTIES IN JEWELRY.

Some Charming Things Recently Exhibted in New York.

A novelty, useful as well as ornamental, in a pin for the hair, so arranged that any brooch with a common pin back can be fastened on and utilized for a head piece.

A jockey's cap of blue and white enamel, trimmed with gold and centered at the top with an opal, is a pretty ornament, so constructed as to be worn either as a brooch or a scarf pin.

A sweetmeats set recently seen consists of a spoon, fork and knife of silver heavily plated in gold and ornamented at the handle with small pieces of frosted silver, representing napkins.

A beautiful barrel link necklace recently placed on the market had pendent from the front five large emeralds and six rubies. A most pleasing effect was produced by setting the stones alternately.

In earings a pretty design is a triangular shaped piece of varicolored gold so worked as to represent a lady's lace handkerchief. In one corner is a smattering of very small garnets representing the initial.

A handsome scarf pin is a boot, the body of which is composed of diamonds. A heavy gold band forms a frame for the mass of stones, and projected from the heel is a small golden spur set with a garnet.

One of the handsomest match boxes as yet presented by the trade is the hoof of a small donkey, highly polished and enameled and shod with silver. On the top is a jockey's cap of silver lying between two riding whips of the same material.

A unique and useful ornament for a study table is the reader's candle. One design consists of a three foot silver rod, to which is hanging by one foot a monkey of bronze. In his right hand, which is extended, he holds a large cup-shaped leaf of gold, in which rests the candle, covered by a roseleaf shade.

A set of account books for ladies is the latest idea in expensive novelties. Four small books bound in russia leather are contained in a case of the same material, the sides of which are ornamented with peacock feathers painted and enameled in the leather. A small gold padlock holds the books secure in the case.—Jewelers' Weekly.

ABOUT WHALEBONE.

Its Source, Its Preparation and Its Use, All Concisely Told.

How many people who read the daily papers and see ten thousand pounds of whalebone quoted sold know what process is gone through with before they use the bone for the many purposes?

Very few.

And again, many people not living in a seaport town, suppose that the bone is taken from the whale's body, which is quite a natural supposition. But such is not the fact. Whalebone, or beleen, such as is used by manufacturers, is the horny, laminated plates or blades in the mouth of the balæna, or right whale. These plates, which usually number from 340 to 360 in the mouth of a full-grown whale, are from 6 inches to 14 feet in length, and serve the purpose of retaining the small fry which compose the food of this species of whale. The whalebone is not properly bone, but bears strong resemblance to the horns of cattle, the hoofs of the horse, or the nails and hair of the human species. It is almost identical in structure with the horn of the rhinoceros. Three kinds are distinguished in commerce, though there is but little difference in quality: The Greenland, the South Sea and the Northwest Coast bone. It is used for the ribs and stretchers of umbrellas and parasols, for stays, brushes, whip-handles, the manufacture of haircloth, for hats and bonnets, canes and a thousand and one other articles. The rather high price has led the inventive mind to try and discover a substitute for whalebone, but only in the case of steel, which is now largely used for umbrellas, has any one succeeded in finding a substitute, and it is greatly doubted if ever a substitute can be found which will equal it for certain uses to which it is put.

The process gone through before the manufacturer gets the bone is interesting. In the first place after the whale is captured, a number of men are lowered in the creature's mouth and the bone cut out and hoisted on the deck of the craft. After a good washing in water, some times the decks being flooded for this purpose, it is stowed below and landed at San Francisco upon the completion of the vessel's cruise. If it is Arctic or Japan bone and is owned by San Francisco merchants it is stowed in their warehouses and made ready for the market, and if it is owned by New Bedford merchants it is shipped East by rail.

A reporter visited the storeroom of one of our whaling merchants recently and found four men busily engaged in cleaning the bone and getting it ready for the market. All the men were scraping pieces of bone with an instrument which resembles the blade of a single meat chopper. When the bone is taken from the whale's mouth it is covered with a soft gummy coating, which is only partly removed by washing. It is this gum which is scraped off upon its arrival here, the process being called cleaning. Four men can clean from 500 to 1,000 pounds of the material a day.

After a certain number of slabs are cleaned, it is tied up in bundles of from 20 to 25 pieces, the idea being to get a uniform weight for each bundle. A bundle of Arctic bone is made to weigh about 80 pounds, a bundle of Japan or Okhotsk Sea 75 pounds and the South Sea is put up in 55 pound bundles.

Different shipowners may have different styles of putting up bone, but it will not vary much from that described above. When a bundle is scraped and tied up it is put away, unless it has an immediate sale. If it becomes damp from being kept any length of time it becomes mouldy and has to be scraped again.

The longest bone is in the center of the whale's head and tapers down to the nib end and to the throat, forming a kind of triangle. The bone at the throat is thinner than in any other part of the head. While the length of the longest pieces of bone is rarely over fourteen feet, whales have been captured which yielded bone nineteen feet in length, and many slabs have been kept by vessel owners as mementoes.

One piece of whalebone captured in 1838 by the Nantucket ship Lucy Ann is now in the possession of C. J. R. Carson, who has placed it with his collection. It is, notwithstanding its age, well preserved, and has the scenes of a whaling voyage scratched upon it in very fair shape.—New Bedford Mercury.

"How did you enjoy the ride?"

"Oh, it was glorious!"

"I saw that you had a companion."

"Yes; charming fellow; don't recall now of what his charm consists, but he is very, very agreeable, nevertheless."

"You mean that fellow who came over with you in the stage?" some one asked.

"Yes."

"His name is Jones. He's deaf and dumb."

BURDETTE'S PHILOSOPHY.

HEREDITARY HEREDITY.

An honest Indian, who had been among the white men long enough to learn how to shave his fellow men, within the pale of the law, opened a barber shop out in Cheyenne. Somebody, probably not a clergyman, hung a sign up over his door, the first night, which read, "Superfluous hair removed while you wait." And all next day the patient barber wondered why nobody came near his shop except a bald headed policeman who loitered behind a tree box over the way.

IMPORTANCE OF REST.

Suggestions Which May Prove Helpful to Many Weary Women.

But how obtain rest with a family of children? With means so limited, the strictest economy must be practiced. "Why, were the days twice as long," you plead, "I could fill every moment with things necessary to be done!"

Yes, seemingly true. But ever remember you are choosing between an overworked, ailing body, and a healthy one; between a happy, cheerful disposition, and a worn, fretful one.

When a member of the household is sick, demanding constant care, we realize, as at no other time, that we can slight our work, reducing it to a minimum, and still maintain a fair state of order and comfort. A person who has not learned to slight work (and be assured there is "knack" about it) has missed one of the "degrees" of our noble "order!"

We can obtain time to favor ourselves when necessary, not only by slighting our work, but also by change of occupation and surroundings. The woman who (from morn till night) drudges about her house, in her everyday work dress, does great injustice to herself and family. How refreshing and restful would she find a partial sponge bath, the combing of her hair, and the fresh afternoon dress with her clean white apron! My sister, incorporate this in the list of your daily Christian duties! If possible, lop down for a few moments each day on the bed or lounge; if you but "lose yourself" it will prove a rest.

Take your sewing or mending into the cool parlor of a hot afternoon (do not mind the litter), where you will see new things, or on the porch, or under the shade of the maples, but don't "hive" yourself in the very identical corner, in the same chair, to look out of the very same window pane that you have for the last twenty or thirty years! Let your work lie in your lap while you take from the stand, which I trust you always have handy with a few choice books and papers, and read a soulful, inspiring poem, a humorous article, or the ever-varying news of the day. Take the children for a drive or walk, run into the home of a congenial friend for a few moments, and take in an occasional picnic or excursion. If a mother, with children about you, devote a part of the evenings, at least, to social enjoyment with them; let your voice mingle with theirs in merriment and song; retouch the organ or piano for their pleasure, and be assurd the memory and influence of such an evening will be deeper and more hallowed to them than if spent in making them the most elaborate and beautiful garments that must "perish with the using," while you will certainly renew your youthful feelings by forgetting for the time, the cares and burdens of maturer years. We must make the most of life as it passes—take our toll of rest and pleasure, as we grind at our daily tasks, or we will never get it.

The miser who starves and pinches himself, cherishing the hope of enjoying his competence in some "sweet bye and bye," is no more deceived than the woman who "slaves herself to death" for a series of years, expecting to take all her rest and comfort when "the farm, or little cottage is paid for," for in both instances, not only the desire, but the power to rest and enjoy, is gradually but surely lost. Bodily rest does not always bring mental rest. Ladies with plenty of leisure are often eaten up with anxiety; they fear this and dread that, and quite lose their balance if they have no perplexing problem to deal with! Such cases it is difficult to prescribe for, the patient being so sure matters will go wrong unless she constantly thinks and worries about them.

A friend whose lot had been one of unusual sorrow and bitterness, but who was always serene and happy, once jovially explained her case to me by saying: "I have learned to shed my troubles as a duck's back does water." Another friend, a writer, said: "When any thing disagreeable happens, I at once endeavor to smother the recollection of it by giving my whole mind to the plot for a story or novelette, and I am generally victorious; so you see, I not only save myself unhappiness, but actually turn the ugly thing into account."

"Care admitted as a guest did not master" in these cases, for these women had the coveted power, so rare in this busy, bustling world, of keeping their minds in a restful state.

"Give us a rest!"—Estelle Mendell, in Good Housekeeping.

CHINESE GAMBLERS.

Some of the Outlandish Superstitions Entertained by Them.

Chinese gamblers are more superstitious than the mass of their countrymen. All colors, save white, are carefully avoided by the owners in the walls and decorations of their gambling-rooms. White, the color of mourning and of the robes worn by the spirits of the dead, always considered inauspicious, is associated with the idea of losing money, and is believed to bring bad fortune to their patrons, with corresponding gains to themselves. Even the inscriptions to the tutelary god are always written upon white paper, and white candles are burned before his shrine instead of the red ones ordinarily used. Gamblers on the way to play fan tan will turn back if any one jostles them or they happen to come in contact with any obstruction. If a player's hand encounters another's as he lays his stake on the table he will not put his money on the number toward which he was reaching. Gamblers refrain from reading books before playing, and books are not regarded with favor in gambling houses from the word "She"—book—sounding like "She"—to lose money. All inauspicious words are avoided. Thus the almanac, "Hung she," is always called "Gut sing," through unwillingness to utter the ominous "She." This book is of daily use among gamblers, for in its calendar of lucky and unlucky days there is special mention of the days favorable for playing, and, besides, it always contains a dream-book, and they attach much importance to the interpretation of dreams.

Many devices are resorted to in order to divine the winning numbers in the boc hop bu. Some players dot the tickets at random, with the eyes closed; others outline with the dots an auspicious character, or mark such characters as, when read in succession, will form a happy sentence. A young child or a stranger is often asked to mark tickets. At times the player will visit some shrine, or "Kwan te"—the god of war—the divinity generally worshiped by the Chinese in America, and burn candles and incense and mock money before his pictures, kneel and throw the divining sticks, a box of which containing eighty sticks, marked with the characters of the lottery-ticket, is usually kept at the shrine for the use of gamblers. As many sticks are allowed to fall as the gambler desires to play numbers. The gamblers do much to keep alive the traditions and religious ceremonies of their native country. The winner of a large sum of money frequently contributes liberally to the support of the local shrine, and subscription books for the erection and maintenance of the temples in San Francisco, and even in China, may be seen in the shops connected with the gambling houses in Eastern American cities. The shrine in Philadelphia, to which many of the resident Chinamen resort at the season of the New Year, was built by a man who won $500 in the boc hop bu, and hoped by it to propitiate the god to whom he attributed his good fortune.

Among the questions asked at the New Year's pilgrimage to the temple, is whether the worshiper will be fortunate at play during the year. The worship of "Kwan te" by the gamblers is regarded as presumptuous by the more intelligent, as by them it is not thought he looks with favor upon illegal practices. One of the lower gods is believed to be a more appropriate object for their adoration, and in the fan tan cellars a tablet is invariably erected to the lord of the land, the tutelary spirit, who is supposed to rule the household ghosts, and whose worship, no doubt, shares an antiquity as great as the institution of the game itself.—N. Y. Times.

THE ACTUATING MOTIVE.

Why People Make Desperate Efforts to Keep Up Appearances.

Some hypocrisy there may be in keeping up appearances. The last sacrifices may be made to keep up the parlor with a show of well-doing, while the kitchen may be a pig-pen. A tasteful, rather expensive, cloak or gown may hide unclean and tattered clothing beneath. An improvident family manages to maintain a carriage with some show before the community, while the debts of the family would more than eat up its possessions if some way were not devised to evade the sheriff. Grocers and other merchants are laid under contribution to help maintain families beyond their actual means. The man who piles up fire-wood will take pains to place the sticks with the sawed edges outward, that the the front surface of the pile may appear well.

This may all be hypocrisy, in great or small degree; but, after all, it means something deeper. People do not love to be hypocrites, unless we except the few Uriah Heeps. There is no amusement in deceiving every body but yourself for the sake of deceit alone. Beneath all this are more ultimate actuating motives. Respectability is aimed at, because it is a good thing; well-doing is assumed because it is desirable. The handsomest garment is placed in sight because beauty is one of the great additions to modern life. "Assume a virtue if you have it not," said Hamlet. So, in our age, when well-doing is not universal, when elegance and beauty and luxury are not common to all, their ownership is pretended; and they will contiene to be assumed until that day when we shall all give up the pursuit of ideals, or be honestly satisfied with our efforts to attain them.—Good Housekeeping.

RACCOON AND SKUNK.

A Close Observer of the Two Creatures Talks About Their Habits.

Though careless observers might not see any considerable resemblance in the raccoon to the bear, yet it may not be improperly called a little bear with a long tail. The raccoon is omnivorous. It eats flesh of any kind, preying upon small birds and animals, when it can catch them, and sometimes making destructive forays into the poultry-yard. It devours birds' eggs whenever within reach, procuring the eggs of wood-peckers by thrusting its paws into their holes. It also watches turtles when depositing their eggs in the sand, and, upon their departure, digs them up. This animal is fond of fish and displays remarkable dexterity in capturing them with its fore paws. It is also a most successful frog hunter, and may be frequently tracked along the little streams where it has been searching for frogs, crawfish, water snails and dead mussels. In summer, frogs often form a large portion of its food, when some species leave the water and therefore are easily caught. Insects are eaten to some extent, as are slugs and snails. It also feeds largely upon various vegetables in summer; and its particular fondness for green corn is well known to every farmer. When this grain is in the milk, a visit may be expected, if the home of the raccoons happens to be near the field; and, indeed, they will sometimes travel a mile or two to obtain a feast of their favorite food. They pull down the stalks, or break off the ears, and tearing open the husks, gnaw off the juicy kernels, generally destroying far more than they eat. They do not carry the corn away. In winter they will occasionally eat the ripened grain, and have been known to visit open corncribs for that purpose. They are also said to eat acorns and to gnaw through pumpkins to procure the seeds. Probably, like the bear, they feed more or less on berries. In confinement, they are exceedingly fond of sugar.

The raccoon exhibits a roving disposition, and the males, in summer, frequently change their places of abode. Its usual retreat is in a hollow tree, and it never digs for itself, though in the forest as well as on the prairie it will occupy the deserted burrows of other animals, and even rear its progeny in such habitations. From three to six young are produced. These grow rather slowly, but are active and make pleasant pets. They exhibit a remarkable degree of intelligence, and their monkey-like tricks are very amusing. Though the raccoon is chiefly nocturnal it is sometimes found feeding in cornfields by day. I once observed one with its head and shoulders thrust out of a hole in a large hickory tree, in which position, if undisturbed, it would remain for hours, enjoying the sunshine. This mammal uses its paws with great facility as hands, always holding objects in both at once, but not commonly using them while eating. Its hearing is remarkably acute, and it seems to depend more upon this sense as a protection from danger than other animals of this class.

The skunk, unlike the raccoon, is very slow of foot, but, nevertheless, succeeds in overtaking many small animals. It feeds upon the lesser mammals, young birds, eggs, reptiles and insects, sometimes even capturing rabbits by pursuing them into their holes. I have often followed the skunk in the woods, where it had taken the track of a rabbitt, like the mink, and once observed where one had dragged the body through the snow to its burrow. It is a large feeder, and, owing to the large number of insects and meadow mice it destroys, is probably of sufficient service to the farmer to atone for its occasional attacks on the poultry; though, when it has once found its way to the poultry yard or hen-roost, its destruction of fowls and eggs is very great. The skunk prefers a dry, hilly, and, if accessible, a rocky locality. It digs readily, and excavates burrows for its habitation. I have opened its burrows and found that it digs a hole five to ten feet long and a foot or two below the surface; at the end a large chamber is excavated, and in this a soft nest of grass is placed. — *Cor. Visiting-Card Scrap-Books.

Some of the ladies of Washington save the visiting-cards they receive and paste them in scrap-books for preservation as souvenirs. They are quite pleasant mementos of Washington life, particularly if the collection contains the names of the society belles and the statesmen one is continually reading about in the newspapers. A Senator's wife or any lady of social prominence usually gets a little bowlful of cards at every reception, but they are often duplicates, and the sum total for the season will not be more than three or four hundred, for that is about the number of habitual callers at the capital. I know of a lady now spending her thirteenth season in Washington who has preserved the card of every person that has called upon her during this entire time. They fill half a dozen large scrap-books and are several thousand in number.—Philadelphia Times.

OUR STATE UNIVERSITY.

A few years ago a certain member of the Legislature was appointed on a committee to visit the State University at Berkeley, examine and report upon the condition of the departments for the teaching of physical sciences, agriculture, mining and the mechanic arts. This member took especial pains to gain as much information about these departments of the University as possible; and afterward addressed the Assembly at some length upon the subject, and in unison with the other members of the Committee, urged that a liberal appropriation of money be made in favor of said departments. The money was granted without opposition.

Very recently the person alluded to was forced to spend a few weeks at San Francisco, and went to the University to see how the money he had urged the Legislature to give had been used. If all sums taken from the State Treasury had been as wisely and as honestly used as this, no word would ever have been heard of legislative corruption.

The mining departments at Freiberg, Germany; and at Columbia and other colleges in our own country are famed the world over for their excellence. At Berkeley there are better apparatus; better facilities for all kinds of experiments and for imparting instruction in this branch of study, than at any, or all of these noted schools. The excellence of the Berkeley school and the high order of instruction and thoroughness of training and studies are freely admitted in Europe and our own Eastern States. The Professor who presides over this department, Samuel B. Christy, is not only a skillful scientist, but is also a fine linguist; he has translated some valuable works from other languages into English, and has written papers on subjects investigated by himself that are highly valued in Europe and in our own country. The value to our own State of the instruction and training given in this department of the University are of incalculable value, and are only beginning to be felt.

Professor A. Wendell Jackson presides over the department where instruction is given in the nature and characters of all kinds of rocks and minerals. No class of studies could be of greater value to such a State as ours. Millions of dollars are being spent in buildings; and in this department all the known building stones of the State are tested to ascertain their strength; the effect upon them of such acids as are usually found in the atmosphere of large cities, and other facts that determine the value of building stones. The crystallization of all kinds of rocks is also most thoroughly studied; so that graduates from the school are able on seeing a piece of rock to at once determine its kind and approximate its value. Professor Jackson is a recognized authority in our own country and in Europe on the branches he teaches. The studies pursued in this department fit the students for entering upon the work of discovering and most effectually developing all the mineral resources of our own State, and other countries as well.

In scientific agriculture Professor Eugene Hilgard is regarded as one of the highest authorities and best teachers living. His labors and investigations have been worth millions of dollars to California. Right here, in Owens Valley, we have proof of the worth of his labor and ability. Before the work of building the Eastside canal was begun samples of the soil proposed to be irrigated were sent to him for examination. He made a careful analysis of the samples and informed the projectors of the canal what the soils were best suited to produce. But for this report by Professor Hilgard the Eastside canal would not have been built. The wine yield of the State is already worth millions of dollars, and is yearly increasing in value. The labors of Professor Hilgard have been, and are of the utmost value to this great interest. The students taught in this department of the University go forth from it thoroughly fitted to engage in those labors upon which, above all others, not only the comfort and happiness, but the very existence of mankind depends.

The department of Mechanical Engineering is presided over by Professor F. G. Hesse. This department is furnished with the necessary machinery for giving the most thorough instruction in the working of wood and iron; and students are prepared to go from the college and begin their career as machinists or engage in other mechanic arts. Mechanical drawing is also thoroughly taught, and also the qualities and strength of all materials used in the mechanic arts, so that a graduate is prepared not only to do actual work with his hands, but also to conduct foundries, machine shops or other works, if he has executive ability. Every practical man will appreciate the value of this department of the University.

Professor John Le Cont is regarded as one of the greatest living authorities on the physical sciences. For his investigations he has been honored by the great colleges of our own country and of Europe. Many of his lectures and reports are translated into different languages and are studied the world over. His department is furnished with the finest instruments needed in teaching the physical sciences. At present Professor Le Cont has leave of absence for one year and is traveling; in the mean time that department is very ably conducted by Professor Slate. Professor Le Cont is over seventy years old, and though as much devoted to study as he ever was, yet his strength is not so great.

The very important department of Geology is presided over by Professor Joseph Le Cont, who is considered one of the greatest authorities on that subject that lives. His lectures when reported are eagerly sought in all countries, and are translated into different languages. It is a high privilege that no one who can go to Berkeley should miss of being permitted to listen to a lecture by Joseph Le Cont.

In all of the departments named the studies are of a high order and demand very close attention and unfailing diligence on the part of the students. For this reason these departments are not so largely attended as the more popular studies of languages, philosophy and literature. It is certain, however, that men who know how valuable and necessary those studies are in order to promote the welfare of mankind and to carry on the work of civilization, will attach more value to them than to branches of study that are regarded merely as elegant or graceful; and will be far more willing to appropriate money for the teaching of the former than the latter. Any attempt to make the practical and really necessary departments of the University subordinate to the merely graceful; or to promote the latter at the expense of the former, would at once be resented by the people through their representatives in the Legislature. It was a great pleasure to the person who had urged that money be given to the University to see how well and wisely it had been used; the State has a right to be proud of its great school.

When a citizen of Inyo county goes to San Francisco or any other place west of the mountains, he cannot fail to be impressed with the indifference of the people there to this part of the State, and their utter ignorance of the extent of California east of the mountains and its resources. If Inyo county were a part of Nevada the great valley of Owens river would have state aid for its development and settlement, and all possible effort would be made to inform the world of its soil and climate and induce settlers to come here. Under such stimulus more improvement and increase of values would be effected in five years than under present conditions will be made in fifty. No citizens are more loyal to California than the people of Inyo county; but our loyalty need not and should not make us blind to facts. Separated as we are politically from the State of Nevada, all the important improvements yet made in our county we owe to Nevada men and Nevada money. The boundaries fixed by nature take precedence and in the end govern over all artificial boundaries. We are too far from San Francisco, and nature has placed the mighty and eternal barrier of the Sierra Nevada mountains to divide us forever, so that profitable intercourse between our country and that great City is forever impossible. The people of Inyo would be very reluctant to cease to be Californians, but the future may develop changes that may leave us the name we love, yet give us other political relations better suited to our geographical situation.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County, California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

U. G. Clark vs. Constance Veigne appeal from Justice Court. Motion to dismiss sustained and appeal dismissed.

The Georgia Minstrels are here.

A late quotation for bar silver is 95¼.

Miss Wimberly, of Lone Pine, has gone to Candelaria.

Last Tuesday Mr. L. P. Springstead left Bishop for Seattle; he does not intend to return.

Mr. W. B. Hutchings has sold his saloon in Bishop to Mr. Jeff. Jones; the price was $2,500.

Mr. P. W. Forbes came down from Bishop on Monday, and has been attending to law business.

H. H. Spears passed through Independence on Friday morning with an eight horse team, bound for Mojave.

A good deal of beef, butter, hay, grain and poultry is being sent north by rail from Bishop; the mining camps take it.

It is confidently asserted by those who are in a position to know, that Salt Lake and Los Angeles railroad will be pushed through at once.

Mr. Foster went north on Tuesday's train. He had been examining mines at Cerro Gordo, Darwin, Panamint and other places for some time past.

Mr. A. Dell and Mr. B. Peeler, of Bishop, passed through Independence on Thursday with a band of horses. The animals are all intended for carriage horses.

Mr. C. L. Rockwood arrived at Independence last Monday from San Francisco. He is a Civil Engineer in the United States service and is likely to be in the county a week or two longer.

Mr. P. H. Mack, County Clerk, started for San Francisco last Tuesday morning on official business for the county. Mr. Alexander Clark will attend to the business in the Clerk's office during his absence.

Brick of first-class quality can be had at any station of the C. & C. road in Owens Valley at $21 per thousand in car load lots; less than five thousand and more than one thousand $24 per thousand. Address, Knapp, Laws & Co., Hawthorne, Nev.

Right on the heels of the news that the wonderful filly Sunol had lowered the three-year-old record to 2:10¼, came the word that Senator Stanford had sold her to Robert Bonner of New York. The prices is not stated, but it is safe to say that it is a very large sum.

Mr. Claussen, of Bishop, will build a brick chimney in the Court House. Since the house was built there has been trouble with the flues; they would not draw and when fires were kindled the rooms were kept full of smoke. Now a radical cure is expected.

One of the best known firms in the Jewelry trade on the Pacific Coast is that of Frederick, Virginta City. Mr. H. Frederick, a representative of this house, is now making a tour of Owens valley with a stock of goods that everybody should see. It is a pleasure to look at the very beautiful jewelry and watches that Mr. Frederick will show, and no one need buy if they do don't want to do so.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

A Good Work

Mr. De La Matyr has put a neat and substantial fence about the M. E. Church and grounds. He did all the work, including digging post holes and setting posts, and carpenter work with his own hands. The Church and grounds really belong to the town, and it should be matter of common interest to see that the property is cared for thoroughly. Mr. De La Matyr is a worker without the Church as well as within it; he believes that the Church should set an example of neatness and thrift as well as of moral excellence.

Church Dedication.

On Sunday—to-morrow— the M. E. Church at Independence will be dedicated. Sunday school will be apened at 10 o'clock a. m., instead of 11 o'clock, the usual hour. Rev. E. Vandeventer, Superintendent of the Nevada Mission, will address the school. At 11 o'clock the dedicatory services will begin, conducted by Mr. Vandeventer, who will be assisted by Rev. E. McEvers and Rev. J. H. De La Matyr. These services will be very interesting and impressive; all who attend will be pleased that they did so, and those who may not will afterward regret it.

Cure for Bloat in Cattle.

Editor Independent:—The following, which I take from one of my bee-papers, may not be generally known, and will no doubt be of value to many cattle owners.

"Take a billet of wood, 1¼ to 2 inches in diameter (round is preferable), and 18 to 20 inches long. Tie a stout cord to each end; force it back into the animal's mouth, and tie the cords to the horns; if it should be without horns, put a strap around the neck to tie to. This prevents the animal from closing the gullet, and the gas will rush out of the mouth with a sound that can be heard for some distance. In severe cases it is well to give half a pint of melted lard after the bloat is gone."

Many instances are quoted wherein this simple remedy has been used with great success.—[Ed.

I presume there is no essential difference between alfafa bloat and clover bloat, and the remedy will probably prove as efficient here as in the East. If by publishing this I may save some suffering animals from a painful death, and their owners from anxiety and loss, I shall feel amply paid for my trouble.

WM. MUTH-RASMUSSEN.

Independence, Cal., Nov. 11th, 1889.

BIG PINE NOTES.

Eds. Independent:—We know not of news of wide-spread importance at present; but thought that a little "local talk" from here may interest some of your readers.

THE BORAX MINES.

The company now operating the extensive borax mines in Saline Valley have quite a large force of men employed. Two 10-horse teams—those of John Schober and J. H. Smith—are kept constantly engaged in hauling borax from the works to Alvord; and, returning, well loaded with supplies for the Borax fields. We are informed that the company will soon pipe water, quite a distance, to the reduction works.

ENJOYMENT, ETC.

The phrase "Big Pine against the world," is more than convincing, as this village has, at least, active business life, more parties, more sociables and more real unalloyed fun than it has been our fortune to find in a long time. However, we refrain from giving details in all of these matters as it would occupy too much of your space. It is understood that the coming event is to be a Grand Ball in the new school house (should it be completed for the same) on Thanksgiving night, the 28th inst. Should the new house not be ready, the ball will take place at the Crocker Hotel at said time. The proceeds are to be expended in the purchase of a bell for the new school building. The several committees have been appointed and arrangements are now under way for a "grand time." Contractor Wonacott, with a large force of men, has already commenced work on said building.

PERSONALS.

Miss Minnie Uhlemeyer, sister of our worthy J. P., W. H. Uhlemeyer, started for her former home, in St. Louis, M., on Saturday last.

A few days since, L. Payson and Antone Cunha left for their mines—each well laden with provisions and mining materials.

Mr. J. G. Mitchell and family, formerly of Esmeralda county, Nev., have come to live among us.

All join hands these days in hauling and storing our winter's wood. We are busy; so adieu.

The Tax Collector wishes to call attention to the fact, that unless Poll and Hospital taxes are paid on or before the last Monday in December, one dollar more will be added to each; making the amount for each individual eight dollars instead of six. Postal money orders will be received in payment for all taxes.

School Benefit.

On Thanksgiving night a ball will be given at Big Pine. The proceeds will be given to help buy a bell for the new school house. If the building is finished in time the Ball will be given there; if not it will be held at Crocker's Hotel. If not another attraction should be offered the opportunity to sit down to one of Mrs. Crocker's suppers would alone draw a big crowd. But there will be fine music; a large crowd; a numerous and kind committee to receive and welcome visitors, and, in a word, the affair is already an assured success, as everybody wants to help the school.

A child, with sweet winning ways, is a strange thing to hate, a lovely little rosebud to blossom no one knows how faultlessly by and by. But Philip thought he would hate her child—Bertha's child, perhaps with his darling's star like eyes; ah, was it not Curran's, too, the symbol of her shame? As he walked home in the twilight he saw in each toddling baby in the doorways and windows, an image of his own materialized fear and horror. Philip looked back from the hill on which stood his home to the village his father had built up. Those massive mills with their thousands of looms were his; those long rows of white houses, each one of which held a family rich in possibilities of virtue and hope, they all were his, and the new element of brightness and thrif, that had made the whole village a nursery of comfort and happiness was his work. Behind him was the great stone mansion with its arched gothic windows green with clustering woodbine, it was his too. How powerless he thought all that wealth and material power can do to solve one of the terrible problems a heart makes for itself.

Moodily he walked to his stables, in a kind of vague longing for companionship, and threw open the doors. Four horses stood in their stalls within, noble looking creatures all of them. They turned their stately heads toward the sound of their master's feet; they returned his love with love. One of them whinnied welcome and laid back his ears as his master came into the stall beside him.

"Poor fellow, good boy;" Philip patted his white neck affectionately. "You would do what you could for me, wouldn't you, Joe? I know you would, old fellow." He laid his CHAPTER XXII.

NO BARRIER.

Sensitiveness is a very unfortunate quality in life since no object is molded in accordance with the strict rules of art, since there is no character but has a repulsive spot in it, no history but with its dark page. The happy race is neither too enthusiastic over the virtues of his acquaintance, which may be accidental or merely a pretty optical delusion, or too stern and unrelenting toward sins, which he fancies might have been virtues under different conditions. But Philip Breton had fallen out with life. The great world seemed to jar him as it rolled. Each hour had revealed unguessed means of suffering, and even the beams of genial sunlight had daggers for him.

Yet it is hard for a man to understand that his fate may be pure, unalloyed pain. He is ever smiling through his tears and trying to awake from his despair, as if it were but a dream of disordered fancy. So as the next morning came, and Philip Breton threw open his door to go out into the sweet scented September air, he felt happier than for many weeks; the peace that came over him seemed to leave no place for cruel distrust and unrelenting pride. He even reproached himself for his ungenerousness of yesterday. The world of nature left no unsightly wounds and breaks in its whole dominion. Gaping graves are soon covered with green grass and wild flowers; life springs quickly out of death, and apparent ruin is soon forgotten in renewed magnificence. Why should he, then, let two lives be wrecked for one wrong act in the past—forever past?

He swung down his walk in a new buoyancy. He believed he had passed through the cloud and come out into the clear light of reason.

But at his gate a carriage rolled slowly by him. It contained a bridal couple, and he stopped to smile at them. The girl's face had no culture in it, but was sweet, and had the innocence of childhood. That ungainly fellow, who now wore his first broadcloth suit, at whom she looked so fondly, was the only lover she had ever known. She had no secrets from him, no past his jealous eyes might not scan without a pang. Her soul was open to him. No whisper to her shame could ever reach his insulted ears. Her life was commonplace, but no blot was on it, no guilty thought had ever left its trail across her heart. The rough lad, who was bold enough to put his arm about her waist in broad daylight could pour his foolish love making into her eager ears without stint. There was no theme he must avoid with her, no page in her life he must not cut.

He loved the soiled lily, loved it more than all the fresh roses. All other women might as well never have been born for him; this woman he would have died for. Could he not protect her from evil tongues? If she were trampled, could he not lift her into his bosom? If she were insulted, could he not put his man's heart and strength between her and shame? He would hurry to his darling, throw himself at her feet, her past should be buried, her life should begin with his happiness to-night.

"You want to marry Bertha? I supposed you were acquainted with her past."

It was in Mr. Ellingsworth's room, where he sat in dressing gown and slippers, well back in his easy chair. He was looking at Philip Breton very curiously. He had really fancied he understood human nature before.

"I suppose I am," answered Philip simply.

"Well, I know more of it than I wish I did. She ran away with a beggar, and she has come back. I dislike unpleasant memories, so I avoid unpleasant information. You know her—her—her relations with Curran? Yes, well," and the gentleman shrugged his slight shoulders, "no doubt you know what you are doing, you run your own risks."

"Risks?"

"Understand me, I asked but two questions—have you left Curran forever? do you want to come home? I had heard she had never been married. Jane has heard it. I feared it. Do you wonder I did not ask, not caring for a disagreeable certainty. Well, do your own questioning. I suppose the fact of her keeping her maiden name shows something."

What if he should find she was indeed married after all, when he had at last decided he could not live without her; when he had at last made up his mind that he must have her if he took a burden of life long shame into his soul with her? That would be a wretched freak for fortune to play with him; but how foolish he was, did not her name prove that she was unmarried?

"But I hate so to harrow up her memories," said Philip, in an unsteady voice; "to make her confess her shame before me. I should think that would be a father's duty."

"Can it be, my dear Philip," remarked Mr. Ellingsworth, with his own brilliant smile, "that you know me so little as to expect me to perform an unpleasant duty? There are people that love them—that never seem so much in their element as when engaged in some act of self sacrifice. You must really excuse me."

When Philip went down into the parlor Bertha was sitting there alone, and his fate seemed thrust upon him. Before he had time to dread breaking the subject to her he stood at the back of her chair, looking down on her thin, white fingers moving over her embroidery work. He laid his hand very gently on her shoulder. Ah, it was less round than it used to be. She was good enough to keep her eyes fixed on her work. There was no shade of heightened color on her cheeks, nor did she quicken her breathing.

"Bertha," he began, in a low, sweet voice, "I am going to ask you something." Still she did not look up.

"If, at some time before you died, a man whom you liked came and asked you to marry him," he spoke very slowly, "is there any reason why you must say no?"

Not one flush or nervous tremor. She threaded her needle again with the red worsted. "What do you mean by reason?"

"I wish my father had seen things a little differently, and could have laid the foundations of all the mills in justice and charity. He could not see that we are all men together, and the wants that he had the workmen suffered too. He did what he thought was right, as do so many thousand men to-day, whose every breath means a harder burden for the poor."

"What is the use of considering the poor? They have no gratitude. And then they are made differently from us; they have their place; let them be content with it. Your father was right."

How cold and hard her voice was, and he had seen her so enthusiastic over the wrongs of the poor.

"But they ought to have a chance to enjoy a little more of what they earn, there are so many of them." But she made no answer, and Philip's heart sank with the conviction that he must carry out his great work as he had begun it, alone. He had counted on her sympathy; he had felt sure of it, and he was so lonely among the grand ideas he had summoned into his soul, but perhaps it was not best for him; a man never knows.

It was quite dark when he bade Bertha good night at her gate. He had kept her hand for a moment after she would have gone, in the thrilling indulgence of the sense of possession. His heart was very full, his hope was almost blossoming into reality; at last when it had seemed blighted once into despair. Only two more days, and all the storms that might rage could never separate them, but must only make her dear white arms cling the closer to him. Why had she not said to-morrow? it was almost too much too hope that God would hold back all his thunderbolts, and all the myriad messengers of evil for two days. The wonderful fate that had brought her back as from death to him, that had saved her so strangely from another meeting with the man whose voice would melt her will, and madden her brain a second time, made him the more afraid now. The tide might turn, perhaps to-morrow, perhaps to-night, and carry his darling out to sea, away from harm once more and forever.

But how cold and firm her hand was. Ah, how glad he would have been for one little tremor in it.

"Bertha?" he said almost piteously, "have you nothing else for me to-night?"

"I think it is all you should ask if I don't take back my promise." Then she seemed to be musing for an instant. "I am sorry you like me so much. What is there about me?"—

"How are the mighty fallen." It was Mr. Ellingsworth's voice, as that gentleman sauntered toward the two young people.

"There is something in this newspaper I have marked for you. One of our old friends has found his level at last—must you go this minute? Well, good night."

It was a long time before Philip could get to sleep that night in his great quiet house. There were so many tender thoughts and memories, now coming out in clear relief in his brain, now grouped with others, and again lost in a vague sense of delight. He remembered Bertha's attitudes and her movements; he imagined how much more kindly she might have meant than she had said, and he blessed her that she had yielded to his prayers when he so nearly had lost her forever. But what could she have been afraid of, how could Jane Ellingsworth harm her? What was there in her history worse than he knew? Poor little girl, could there be anything more terrible than what he had forgiven? How far she was from knowing how wonderful a thing love can be! Well, he might as well look at Ellingsworth's newspaper now as any time, he was not able to sleep apparently. Who could it be that had found his level at last? Philip struck a match and lit the gas. Then he fumbled in his pockets and finding the newspaper at last, unfolded it, looking for the marked paragraph. It was not in the editorials, nor in the locals. Philip turned the inner pages out, nor in the political news. It couldn't be an advertisement; yes—it was this:

Divorces obtained without trouble or publicity for any cause desired. Address, in strictest confidence, John T. Giddings, No. 4 Errick square, Lockout.

"The idea," laughed Philip to himself, "of my getting up to read his card in another paper. I hope I shall never hear of him again now."

CHAPTER XXV.

WHAT ARE WE WAITING FOR?

The bay span were tossing their heads impatiently at the gate, and still the young bridegroom delayed in his house. It was the evening he was to be married, and when he entered the arched doorway again Bertha would be with him. So he must make one final tour of his home to see if there was any last finishing stroke of work necessary to make it worthy of his beautiful bride. He found all his servants, the new graceful maid to wait upon the door, the portly butler to wait upon the table, and all; and instructed them carefully in their duties. The intricate domestic mechanism must work with not one jar or rattle to disturb the new mistress. He went into the drawing room and looked about him. The grand piano that had been closed and locked so long was open, and the music placed on the rack as if it were but yesterday that Bertha had sat before it. He remembered how her round, white arm had outdazzled the ivory keyboard the last time he had seen her here. The chintz covers had been removed from the furniture, whose blue damask upholstery seemed fairly smiling with delight to have escaped from its mask. In the embrasure of the window looking out to the street, where the three laborers had stood the evening our story commences, lay a little volume of exquisite engravings, as if some admirer had just put it down. Philip glanced at the page where it was open. It was a Magdalene; and a shadow passed over his face at the suggestion. He turned a few leaves and spread the volume open again. This time it was Marguerita. Impatiently he closed the book, which seemed to have no beautiful picture but it would insult his bride.

He had not made the slightest change in the study—his father's room—where he had learned too to fight out his spiritual battles. It would be a profanation to alter one feature of the room; it should be always as it was the day Ezekiel Breton died. Philip opened the door and looked in for a moment, then with a full heart he made his way up the oaken stairs. The room he next entered was furnished in the shade of blue that Bertha loved best, the silk upholstered lounge that made one drowsy to look at it, the sleepy hollow easy chair, the dressing table and toilet set. Over the windows hung lambrequins of a darker tint, softened again, however, in the flowing curtains below. Even the drop lamp had a blue porcelain shade so that no such thing as white light should ever enter Bertha's boudoir. Philip imagined her sitting in the easy chair lifting her eyes wonderingly to him, her husband, who never grew tired of telling her she was beautiful; or he pictured her asleep on the lounge one white hand by her side, the other beneath her cheek. How much of his thoughts were vague dreaming? Could it be she was at last to be his; lighting the gloomy old house with the radiance of her presence? All his other life faded in his memory at the brightness of his joy in her. It seemed a small thing to him that he had lifted color rose from her neck among the folds of lace, and mounted to the roots of her golden hair. It was the first time he had ever moved her.

"And you love me as much now as that day I fell asleep on your shoulder—ages ago, it must have been?" Then her great blue eyes drooped under the intensity of love that looked from his face—a love beyond her power to understand.

He gathered her hands in his. "As much and more—a deeper, purer, gentler love that will protect you against its own very vehemence—that would rather make sacrifices for you than joys for itself."

"Take me, then," and she let him draw her head on his breast, where she felt the throbbing growing mightier and mightier, though he only pressed his lips upon her cool forehead. Then she drew back. She did not look in his face, which had a great light in it, perhaps she was ashamed that she had nothing to give him, ashamed that her heart was so cold under the fire that looked out of his eyes.

"But Philip, you must not hurry me too much. I am slow, and this is so sudden, I would as soon have thought of an earthquake." Then she glanced wonderingly at him as if to make sure. "Ah, Philip, you deserve a better love than mine." But he caught her hand to his lips, and held it there while he covered it with kisses.

"I would rather the flower you wear in your bosom than any woman in the world besides you. I learned to love with you, Bertha."

But she took her hand away uneasily. "But you won't hurry me, will you, Philip? How could she ask him to wait much longer? "For if you do"——

"Oh, no—I will give you a whole week." He laughed, and then grew suddenly very sober. "Haven't I given you long enough?"

"I must take a little journey first," and her eyes appeared to avoid his. A sudden tide of jealousy swept over him. Had she deserved his trust?

"I will go with you. It shall be our wedding journey."

She flushed nervously—"Oh, no, not yet."

Where could she be going? To one last interview with Curran, perhaps, and he felt that he could not bear one thought of him should ever cross her soul again. How short a time it took to spoil his happiness. The glow had left his heart, the light had gone out of his eyes, all in a moment. Is misery then the only thing that can last?

"Only this once," she said. "You shall go with me always then."

His mood melted and in a moment he was kneeling before her. "Oh, Bertha, be fair with me—for you hold me in the hollow of your hand. Do not fail me now when you have seemed so near me."

She put her hand on his bowed head, perhaps some sweet word trembled on her lips. He hungered for it, and when she did not speak, he looked up into the face of his bride. She had seemed so far from him, a world could not have parted them more, but he was at her feet, and she had promised to be his wife.

"My dear Philip, excuse me, but you are crushing my embroidery." So he was. He was kneeling on it in his fond idolatry, as if a piece of worsted work was of no account. He found his feet and cast a pathetic glance at the square of canvas before he stooped to pick it up. It was strange, indeed, that he should have been so carried away in his passionate ardor as not to notice what he was kneeling on.

"I hope I have not ruined your work," he said, simply. No, he had only rumpled it a little, and he would have been willing to purchase all the canvas and worsted in two cities, rather than have missed the tender word he thought was on her lips.

(To be Continued.)

In a few weeks' time the last of the boardings which for twenty years past have obscured the ducal palace at Venice from the eye of the curious will have been removed and the famous old building will stand forth in all the glory of renewed youth and beauty. The restoration has been probably the most important work of the kind in recent times. It was found necessary in some parts to reconstruct the foundations, and even to extend the building so as to restore equilibrium.

The Board of City Trustees of San Bernardino has issued a call for an election to decide whether or not to raise $169,000 by the issuance of bonds, with which to provide the city with a water system for better protection against fire.

WON BIG MONEY.

Three Lucky People Who Invested in The Louisiana State Lottery.

At the recent drawing of The Louisiana State Lottery, $60,000 of the first prize was won by three St. Louisans, and $5,000 of the third capital prize of $50,000, also came to two lucky St. Louisans.

August Kaltmeyer, who is the proprietor of a saloon at the Southwest corner of Sixth and Franklin avenue, held a one-twentieth part of the $50,000 prize. A Star-Sayings reporter called upon Mr. Kaltmeyer at his saloon this morning, and found him in excellent humor. Mr. Kaltmeyer said: "I never played the lottery in my life before, but just a few days prior to the last drawing a friend of mine, whose name I cannot mention, came to me, and he said: 'Henry, poor people are getting rich in this lottery game.' I said I knew that, and he said: 'Let us go in a half dollar each on a ticket this month.' The next day we purchased the ticket—the number of it was 75,353—and I was never so astonished in all my life as when I heard that it drew $2,500. I got the money a week ago, and gave my friend his half. I intend to keep the money in my business, but shall play the lottery right along, though. My friend, I guess he is having a good time for I haven't seen him since."

Mrs. Amelia Partenheimer, who resides at 912 Monroe street, was also a winner to the extent of $2,500, she having held another twentieth ticket of the $50,000 prize. Mrs. Partenheimer, in a conversation with a reporter to-day said: "It was a great surprise to me to win that much money, but I believe that you are bound to win at it some time, sooner or later. I have not played the lottery much; but I thought I would play it last month, at all hazards. My husband was very glad when he heard that I had made the winning. I guess I will use a good deal of the money on more lottery tickets."—St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Sayings, August 29.

THE ADVANCE OF SCIENCE.

As time rolls on from day to day MAN's mind is ever on the move, improvement after improvement comes to light and where once an article was extolled to the highest pitch as being the best in the world, now we hear no more of it, and that same article has positively faded out of sight and given place to one of far greater value, and much more effective in its uses.

This same theory applies to the great and modern remedies placed to-day before the public. Years ago, valuable preparations were very scarce, and invariably the doctor was called in to administer to the suffering.

Now for any and all diseases can be found medicines put up from true formulas and of positive merit. THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE is the LATEST AND FINEST MEDICINE of the age classed among true remedies and its price is within the reach of all. Hundreds of testimonials are coming in from all parts of the country unsought for and honest in their meaning, we name this WONDERFUL REMEDY THE GREAT SIERRA KIDNEY AND LIVER CURE for it is the GREATEST this century has known. SURE in its work, IMMEDIATE in its action. For sale by all druggists.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

All these cases have increased in weight from 16 to 28 lbs., and are not now needing any medicine."

Experience

Teaches that certain vegetables exert in digestion a powerful influence on the blood; deficient nutrition is stimulated, the burden current is unloaded, and poisons withheld from the parts which they pollute and defile. This simple, natural action, purifying the blood, is promptly accomplished by Hood's Sarsaparilla, a skilful combination of such vegetable extracts, whose active qualities and native excellences are concentrated by a process peculiar to itself, and found in no other preparation. Hood's Sarsaparilla does actually strain out impurities, removes obstructions, and opens the natural outlets of the system. No rack, no strain, no pain accompanies the administration of Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"For three years I suffered with dyspepsia, growing so bad that I was completely broken down in health. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, and soon gained strength and appetite, and was restored to my former health." J. E. RUSSELL, Clerk Commercial Hotel, Brookville, Penn.

A MOTHER'S LOVE SAVES HER TEN-YEAR OLD CHILD.

My little girl, ten years of age, had Bright's disease. Her ankles, feet and eyes were terribly swollen. Four of our best physicians attended her, but her life was despaired of. A mother's love surmounts all difficulties, and I determined to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, made at Rondout, N. Y. Bright's disease! How happy I am that I determined upon this course—for one by one the well-known symptoms of the disease left her. Words fail to express my gratitude, and I cannot too earnestly recommend the Faverite Remedy. Her recovery was entirely due to the Favorite Remedy, which was the only medicine taken after her case was abandoned by the physicians—Mrs. Laura A. Kempton, West Rutland, Vermont

A DIG IN THE RIBS,

If on the right side and lower part of the diaphragm, though playfully meant and delivered, is calculated to evoke profanity from a chappy whose liver is out of order. When that region is sore and congested, pokes seem fiendish. Look at a man's countenance ere you prod him under the ribs. If his skin and eyeballs have a sallow tinge, you may infer also that his tongue is furred, his breath apt to be sour, that he has pains not only beneath his ribs, but also under the right shoulder-blade. Also, that his bowels are irregular and his digestion impaired. Instead of making a jocose demonstration on his ribs, recommend him to take, and steadily persist in taking, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the finest anti-bilious and alterative medicine extant. Incomparable is it, also, for dyspepsia rheumatism, nervousness, kidney trouble, and fever and ague.

CATARRHAL DEAFNESS

A NEW TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result of this discovery is that a simple remedy has been discovered which permanently cures the most aggravated cases of these distressing diseases by a few simple applications made (two weeks apart) by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free by A. H. DIXON & SON, 337 and 339 West King Street, Toronto, Canada.

The above Picture Represents

CAPTAIN S. GREENWOOD,

Master of the Steamship Kanawha.

About a year ago he observed a strange change in his feelings. He felt tired instead of vigorous; nervous instead of strong. His appetite became poor and his sleep broken. He tried to overcome these feelings, but they would not go. He then noticed pains and irritation in the water channels, and that the fluids passed were often thick and with a scum on top or a brick-dust sediment at the bottom. All these were the sure symptoms of that fearful disease, Catarrh of the Bladder, which has always been considered incurable, and they continued until the Captain was in a terrible condition. But he is the picture of health and vigor to-day, and he owes it entirely to that wonderful medicine, Hunt's Remedy. Capt. Greenwood says: "I am so certain of the great value of Hunt's Remedy, that I always carry a supply on shipboard for the use of my men, and I prescribe it whenever they are ailing. After curing me as it did, and restoring my wife, (whom the best physicians of New York said was dying of tumor,) to perfect health, I swear by it."

A LATTER-DAY DELUSION.

How swiftly now the seasons glide,
When one looks back to hours of youth,
A day seems past, scarce more in sooth,
Since the child roamed wondering-eyed.

But days were then as now are years.
Life's path appeared an endless "climb;"
There was for all th ngs so much time;
Folly to let its waste wake fears!

With face turned futureward, before
Our feet the way untrod, intent
To seek, to find, to know, we went,
Nor reckoned of the moment's store.

Yet now we say we squandered you,
O, hours, that have become so brief!
The fault stands out in bold relief
Against the wide, time-distant blue.

And our regret rings, as the tone
Of cloistral bell, within our hearts;
While to our lips the moan upstarts:
"Ah, if we then had only known!"

But vain it is to deem that we
Would use the wisdom of the years,
E'en though we could, ere care and tears
Have wrought it to maturity.

If we, by miracle foresaw
The train of days with ill they hold,
Young hearts it could not change to old
Soon, soon we'd laugh away our awe!

"Time for all things," the sage hath cried;
So let not after-thoughts deceive;
Youth must be youth, its course achieve;
No age its own will be denied.

Then trustful be the glance we cast!
No greater waste than useless pain;
Richer we grow, through loss and gain—
Though the years speed so fast, so fast!

MISS GOLDEN'S LODGER.

Money Is Not the Only Thing on Earth Worth Having.

After Mr. Golden had failed, and he and Miss Golden took to letting out the rooms in their house to lodgers, and she found it necessary to work hard at embroidery besides, and to give up all those pretty luxuries she had been used to, there came one day to the door a sparely-built man, rather handsome, but not very young, and just a little shabby, who asked if they had a room to spare for him.

"It must be a very cheap one," said he, "for I can't afford a good one. I don't care how high up it is, and I don't want it to be furnished. I have very good furniture of my own—good enough for me; plenty good enough—and I don't wish to die in the poor-house. No; I don't wish to die in the poor-house."

Miss Golden opened her eyes as the big man of five-and-forty said this, but there was a little hall bedroom on the top floor which stood in place of the traditional garret, and thither she conducted the gentleman who dreaded the poor-house so much. The room suited him, the rent suited him, he gave a well-known banker's name as reference, and he declared himself to be Mr. Moss.

The banker to whom Mr. Golden went smiled a peculiar smile and said:

"Highly respectable, and I feel sure he'll pay his rent."

And the next day Mr. Moss came with his furniture. A boy brought an old-fashioned cot, and a straw bed, and a wooden stool, and a little three-legged table, and wanted fifty cents for his trouble, and took twenty-five in cash, and took the rest out in bad language on the door-step, after he had been shut out. Then Mr. Moss arranged his room himself, and drew one teaspoonful of tea in a little tin teapot, and had one roll and one radish for his supper. The roll he bought; the radish he took from a bunch on the grocer's counter.

"What are your radishes?" he said. Then he nipped one off, and walked away like an absent-minded gentleman.

"Poor soul," said Ellen Golden, "I do feel so sorry for him."

So she smiled and nodded to him when he went out next day, and was always very careful to be civil to him. She knew what it was to be poor herself. And what was a cup of coffee now and then, or just a wedge of pie, or a bowl of soup? It wasn't missed, and one could do it in a neighborly fashion, for a man must be very poor to live so.

And Miss Golden, who often laughed at the idea of owning such a name—she whose life was so little of a golden one—did a thousand such little kindnesses. They had enough to eat and drink, her father and herself.

Then, when the nights grew cold, their tenant, who could have no fire in his room, often warmed himself at that of his landlord. He was not without ideas, and he was by no means plain; but his brain was full of thoughts of one order—thoughts of money; how people made it and lost it; how they got high interest for it; how they speculated with it and lost it; how unexpected legacies were left to some people, and how others waited in vain for dead men's shoes; and sometimes when Ellen Golden, who had a touch of romance in her, hinted that, after all, money was not worth every thing else in life, he would stop short in his serious, solemn way, and say:

"My dear young lady, you don't think enough of money. It would be a terrible thing if you were so careless of it as to come to the almshouse in your old age. Many worthy people have come to the almshouse in their old age."

His grave, dark face, the little touch of foreign accent there was in his voice, his curiously earnest manner, all gave his words a curious weight and meaning.

Ellen could not laugh at them.

"But it is such a pity, papa," she used to say, "such a terrible pity that poor Mr. Moss should have let his misfortunes warp him so. If he would but talk of something else."

And Mr. Golden would say:

"Ah, you don't know how it hurts a man to have had all his schemes and ambitions come to an end in his mature years. Youth can rise again after a fall; middle-age can not. No doubt poor Mr. Moss has failed."

And Ellen Golden supposed that this must be so, and that night asked her tenant to tea, and made a wonderful cake with a view to his coming. He did not refuse to eat the cake, but he gave her a little sermon on extravagance, and begged her to reflect what eggs cost.

"It is certainly quite disinterested," said Ellen Golden, "but he makes me so uncomfortable. Being so poor himself I can't feel hurt at his reminding me that I am poor, too—but I wish he wouldn't."

In return for the kindness of the Goldens, poor Mr. Moss was always ready to do a thousand things. He was handy with hammer and nails, and had a wonderful faculty for mending shoes. Once or twice Ellen thought he must have been a shoemaker, he so ably cobbled her discarded walking-boots; and she had fancied him a carpenter when he put the kitchen closet door on its hinges; and a jeweler when he reset the amethyst in her dead mother's ring which she now wore in memory of her. Once she said:

"How did you learn to do so many things?"

And he answered:

"Nothing saves a man so much money as to be a Jack-of-all-trades."

Still he was not saving himself money when he dug her garden and put new bricks in her range. And he did it with the same alacrity with which he sponged and pressed his own clothes, and re-covered his own umbrella.

When he came home at night he always went to work; and they learned that he made his own bedstead, and his three-cornered table, and stuffed his own straw mattress.

"A penny saved is a penny got," said Mr. Moss. And Mr. Golden, who never yet had found himself quite able to pour himself a cup of coffee, or find his own slippers, and who, though he had been a prosperous commercial gentleman once, would have been as apt to sweep his own chimney as to mend any thing about the house, stared in amazement.

"He appears to be a gentleman by education," he said; "he is well read in the classics; he understands music as few save professional folk do; and stocks—my dear, I think he knows more about stocks than any one I ever met. What an invaluable man he would have been to me in my business. I would gladly have had him for my head clerk. He might have saved me from failure; yet see to what a pass he is reduced himself."

Mr. Moss certainly was a mystery; but, since he did not choose to explain himself, the Goldens were too polite to ask questions; and whether it was the fact that there was something to wonder at in him, or whether his dark skin and black eyes were the proper contrast to her complexion and blue orbs, Ellen Golden found herself thinking of him a great deal.

"If he only would forget money, or the sound of it, how nice he would be," said she.

And one day—but this she had never told to any one—he had said to her:

"If a man were rich enough he would be so much happier married—so much happier—but it is unwise to marry if one can not afford it. It is so expensive a thing. Don't you think so?"

And she had said:

"Oh, yes, it certainly is;" and had not known whether to laugh or cry.

Somehow, she thought to herself, knowing Mr. Moss is like meeting the enchanted Prince of the Arabian Nights—who seemed a flesh and blood Prince, but who proved to be one-half of stone. So there were soft, and gentle, and kindly things in Mr. Moss—almost loving things at times—but when he spoke of money the petrified half of him came to view.

"Yet it is trouble that has made him so," said she. "The enchantment—or perhaps I should say the disenchantment—of loss and disappointment. It hurt papa, but not in the same way."

It was a queer life that the girl led with these two men, one old, one middle aged, and yet it was not an unhappy one.

Mr. Moss had no other friends, save a portly, bald-headed gentleman who came now and then with important-looking papers and envelopes in his hands to spend half an hour in his room.

"His employer, doubtless," said Mr. Golden.

And once, in going away, this gentleman had said aloud:

"Excuse me, Mr. Moss, but you should have a room with a fire. It is dangerous to sit so much in the cold. I am nearly perished, I assure you."

And Mr. Moss had answered meekly:

"Do you know the rent they charge for rooms with grates, and do you know the price of coal per ton, Mr. Macklin?"

And Mr. Macklin had laughed a little, cruel laugh.

"He is paying Mr. Moss almost nothing for his toil, I suppose," said Mr. Golden.

"And, dear papa," said Ellen, "do you know I really think poor Mr. Moss must have some claim on his little earnings—some poor relative to support, for whom he deprives himself of comfort—and we must be very good to him, papa. But won't you—you are older than he—won't you advise him to leave that odious Mr. Macklin and go where they will give him better wages?"

And Mr. Golden did broach the subject, but poor Mr. Moss only shook his head.

That hateful Mr. Macklin—how Ellen detested him!

But no one is ever certain he is at his worst any more than he is at his best. Another misfortune came to Mr. Moss and this is how:

One day the tin leader that carried the water from the roof of the Golden house came loose. The rain rushed in at Mr. Moss' window and drenched his floor. The gentlemanly landlord came up in his dressing-gown, and promised to send at once for a person to attend to the leader. The tenant quite good-humoredly stopped him:

"Come, come," he said, "you know my old adage—a penny saved is a penny got. You haven't any too much money, and you'd go and waste it paying working-people. I'll take your hammer and nails and that bit of tin you were going to throw away yesterday, and mend your roof for you. I'll do it at once."

"But, my dear sir, I can't allow it," said Mr. Golden, politely.

"My dear sir, you won't use force to prevent me?" said Mr. Moss.

"Oh, dear, no," said Mr. Golden. "But the roof is quite a slope and very slippery. It is probably dangerous. At least wait."

"Meanwhile my furniture is being spoilt," said Mr. Moss, looking at the home-made adornments of his room, "and your ceiling, which you are shamefully extravagant enough to forget. Sir, I am not amazed that you failed in business."

Mr. Golden went down-stairs at once.

"Ellen, my love," he said, "I have been cruelly insulted by our tenant. I have done with him."

"Oh papa," said Ellen, "it can not be."

"He alluded with scorn to my misfortunes in business," said Mr. Golden. "I did not retort. Noblesse oblige, you know. No, no; he can't be a gentleman."

Just then there was an odd sound outside—a sound that made Ellen's blood curdle.

"What is it, papa?" she cried.

"Perhaps Mr. Moss has thrown his bed out of the window," said Mr. Golden.

Then they rushed out into the garden. There upon the great lilac bush, flattened to the ground by his weight, lay Mr. Moss. He had slipped from the roof. The house was only two stories and a-half high. But it was a fall that left little hope for life. He was senseless and covered with blood.

Poor Ellen screamed and came so near fainting as to lose all strength. Meanwhile the other lodgers had rushed down, and poor Mr. Moss was carried into the parlor and placed on a sofa and a doctor was called.

Looking at the pale face, both father and daughter forgot the man's faults—the former his late offense, the latter his odd counsels and reproofs.

When the doctor came they stood beside their friend in tears.

"It's a bad case," said that worthy, when he had made an examination; "but he may live. There'll be fever, probably delirium, though. You'd better send him to the hospital, if he's only a tenant, and you don't know his friends."

Then he went away, having bandaged a limb and a rib; and Ellen looked at her father. All he said was:

"No, my dear, we won't."

Then for many days they nursed the poor fellow, and he knew nothing of it; and the doctor was right about the delirium; and in it he raved of money, of stocks, of gold, of cent. per cent.

One day Mr. Macklin called. He presented his head at the door, and said, as Ellen opened it:

"I say, ma'am, what has happened to the old gentleman?"

"Mr. Moss is at death's door," said Ellen. "He has met with a terrible accident."

"Sorry to hear it," said Mr. Macklin; "and there'll be the deuce to pay at our place. He keeps things so in his own hands that if he can't be consulted it's hard to tell what to do. Is he unconscious?"

"Yes," said Ellen; "but, sir, can it be that Mr. Moss has occupied an important place in your establishment?"

"I should think he had," said Macklin.

"And you have been cruel enough to take advantage of him, and repay his services with a pittance that scarcely provides him with bread," said Ellen. "I speak plainly, I know; but I feel strongly. Perhaps you do not guess what privations he has suffered."

Mr. Macklin stared at her in silence for awhile and then whistled long and low.

"So you are in the dark?" said he. "You think I employ Mr. Moss—I? My dear madam, I am his confidential clerk. You see, Mr. Moss is a very eccentric man. He's about as rich a man as I know—positively rolling in gold—but he's a—not to put too fine a point on it—he's a miser."

He paused, looked at her face turning white before his eyes, and added:

"You needn't be afraid of him, though; he's honest. He'll reimburse you for any expense you are at; and I'll stop and send up a surgeon who knows who he is; or, better tell the one you have his name. Every one knows Isaac Moss, and his queer ways."

Then, after some more talk, and a look at the delirious man, Mr. Macklin went away, and Ellen, with totally changed feelings, resumed her post at the patient's side.

She looked at his face coldly. Her kindliness for him was all gone. The poor man who was so patient under his privations seemed to have died, and there on the pallet before her lay the thing she loathed so unutterably—a miser. To both father and daughter the friend they had known seemed dead. But they ministered to him still, until one day—after Isaac Moss had been better for a long time, and was growing quite well—after he had had a long interview with a gentleman whom Mr. Golden knew to be a lawyer, he called Ellen to his side, and begged her to listen to him quite alone.

"I can not say it to any one else," he said, "but I must to you. You found me out very soon after my accident, I know. You know I am what the people call a miser."

She answered:

"Yes."

"And the fact has cost me your friendship, which you gave to the poor fellow who seemed almost a beggar?"

Again she answered:

"I can not help it, Mr. Moss—it has changed me."

"Ellen Golden," he whispered, "I knew that at once—and I could scarcely bear it—but you do not know how it came about. My people were poor, and money was the one dream they had. I made it by much self-sacrifice in my youth, and I learned to care for it and feared to lose it as other men do their lives. It was only I who suffered. I cheated no one."

"But it is a miserable weakness," said Ellen.

"Yes," said the man, "I know it is now. And I know there is something I value more than gold. It is you, Ellen, and now you hate me. But I have taken my madness by the throat. Yesterday I was a rich man, to-day I am what I would have called poor, for I have legally made over almost all I possessed to you, in such a way that you can not refuse to receive it; and when I am well I will go away, if you bid me, for I attach no condition to my gift. Only, Ellen—you did not hate me when I was poor—if we might be friends again—more than friends—There, there—it was not to buy you."

"But you were really mad to do such a thing," cried Ellen," and I will not take the gift."

"Would you return a drunkard his bottle?" asked Moss; "a murderer his knife? No!—I—a miser—was not fit to be rich. I am not sure I am a miser now. Love has driven mammon from me—I humbly hope that—and lying here, thinking to die so soon, and thinking how happy I might have been but for my greed. But I will not plead with you, Ellen; if I must go, I must. I said before I never thought that gold would buy you!"

It did not. But they never parted again. In the sweet spring-time a new life dawned for him, for she became his wife; and it is said that he never even spoke of gold again.—M. Cady, in N. Y. Ledger.

ABOUT ORIENTAL RUGS.

How These Popular Articles of Utility and Elegance Are Made.

One sometimes confounds the rugs of Karabagh with those of Kazak, inasmuch as they resemble each other in appearance and designs, but when one considers that the former are always rectangular and the latter square their distinction can be readily determined, despite the similarity in general appearance.

The looms of the people of Afghanistan and Beloochistan vary much in dimension, but in those from the latter country the length is always proportionate to the width. One does not find rugs here greater than three or three and one-half meters by two or two and one-half meters. The rugs from Afghanistan are made on looms much of the same character as the Karabagh loom, and therefore the width may not surpass a certain limit.

In Oushak, Gordez and the other countries of Turkey, a fabric is made of almost any dimension, according to the means at their disposal and the progress which this industry has made in the Asiatic provinces of the Ottoman Empire. The operation of weaving as practised in Asia Minor does not differ essentially from the methods in use in the Caucasus, but the popularity of Smyrnas can best be attested by the fact that there is exported annually of these rugs about three hundred thousand square meters.

This process is carried on, of course, without the aid of the shuttle, the only utensils requisite being an iron comb, a large clumsy knife, a stick of wood, tokmak (a kind of mallet) and a pair of scissors. The fringe, which one often sees at the two extremities of a rug, are the two particles of thread which are bound around the bars of the loom, and which are cut on completion of the rug.

One can hardly form an idea of the enormous work and monotony in the weaving of a rug, which, as is explained above, is made by the union of millions of knots by the hand. So familiar do these women become with the operations of weaving, that it is with difficulty one can see their hands, so quickly do they manipulate the threads.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

EMPRESS FREDERICK.

Changes Wrought in Her Appearance Since Her Husband's Death.

The Empress Frederick has changed greatly during the year of mourning through which she has just passed. She has become much thinner and is rapidly growing gray, so that she looks much older than her actual age, which is only forty-nine. All her fresh English bloom has departed, and she clings to her home and surroundings in her husband's native land in a way that is truly pathetic, remembering how, as Crown Princess of Prussia, she was often aggressively and exasperatingly English. In consequence much of the not wholly unfounded prejudice against her among the German nation has already departed, and she bids fair to pass the remainder of her days surrounded by the sympathies and affection of the people over which her lamented and passionately loved consort reigned for so short a time. Yet, in bygone days, she was as aggressively English as her eldest son now is German, and with less excuse, since her lot was cast in Germany and with the Germans. She used to send to London not only for books and stationery and the like, but for the toilets and even for the shoes to be worn by her daughters and herself. There is current a story how, when she was, as Crown Princess, presiding over a meeting of the directresses of a Home for Friendless Governesses in Berlin, the question came up as to the quality and kind of food to be furnished to the inmates of the institution. "Let them have good English fare," quoth the Princess Victoria; "no greasy and unwholesome German cooking!" Also, during her husband's last illness, she insisted not only on his having an English physician, but she sent to England for all the appliances of his sick-room, such as the bed, the reclining chair, etc. But perhaps her most unpopular act was the dismantling of the rooms once occupied by the lovely Queen Louisa, the mother of the late Emperor William, whose memory is held in veneration amongst the German people as that of a martyr, and whose apartments had been kept sacred and in precisely the condition that they were at the time of the death of the fair occupant. These rooms the Crown Princess caused to be refitted by a fashionable London upholsterer, and the people of Berlin never forgave her.—Lucy H. Hooper.

WOMEN AS SUICIDES.

Encouraging Facts Brought to Light by Recent Investigations.

A fact interesting to women is developed in the comparison of old and recent statistics on suicide. In the old works on suicide the causes of self-destruction among women were given: First, as disappointment in love; next, religious excitement; and, lastly, disease. Late investigation shows a marked decrease from the two first-named causes. This is encouraging, as it shows a corresponding increase in woman's mental and moral strength. There was a time when love and the home ties of husband and children were a woman's only source of comfort and diversion. If love failed and husband and children proved unkind the woman had no resources. There was a time when women were expected to believe what men formulated as to faith without question. Their minds, like those of children, were unprepared to grapple with new ideas. All this is changed. Girls are educated with their brothers. Women are in sympathy with their husbands' profession or business, or they carve out independent lives for themselves. Women have grown less personal, and they recognize other claims than their own. Love may be lost, but humanity, friendship, work and books are left. Love may die, but the sun will shine and the earth hold much of happiness.

Women no longer pin their faith exclusively on interpretations of men. Women are working out problems for themselves. They no longer consider it a sin to read, and discuss, and think for themselves. Their minds have grown strong enough to grasp a new idea without growing hysterical and becoming insane or committing suicide. Only a weak woman kills herself for love; only a silly one in religious excitement.—Washington Post.

Mrs. Hayes' Harmless Stimulant.

Mrs. Hayes always declared that a perfectly adequate substitute for liquor when needed as a stimulant could be found in hot milk, and after any cold or wetting she gave this in place of the wine or whisky which others would have considered necessary. This is, by the way, a custom of Mrs. Cleveland's also, who discovered, after many long and wearisome receptions she was obliged to go through, standing for hours on her feet and shaking hands with hundreds of people, that nothing would restore her so quickly as a cup full of boiling milk brought to her by her maid, and which she drank in little sips as hot as it possibly could be taken. The Washington girls caught the idea from her, and finding how quickly it helped them after a hard day of calls and social duties, they began to substitute it for the various malt preparations they had been in the habit of taking, or the hot wine and water which their maids usually administered when they came in too tired out to dress for their next engagement.—Fremont News.

SHE MEANT BUSINESS.

A Woman Tries to Sue a Railway President Who Probably Dodged Her.

"Look at that, will you?" exclaimed a woman as she pointed to her trunk in the baggage room of the Third street depot the other day.

"Yes'um," was the humble remark of the agent.

"When I saw that trunk aboard at Rochester yesterday it was a brand new trunk and all right. Look at it now!"

"I'm a-looking, mum."

"The strap broken, one hinge busted, two of the rollers gone and the lid split!"

"I see, mum."

"Do you suppose I'll stand that?" she exclaimed, elevating her voice until the echoes peeled slivers off the rafters. "Do you think you can pass that trunk over to me without paying damages?"

"No, mum."

"You've got hold of the wrong woman if you think you can! I want damages—damages, sir! Do you hear?"

"I do, mum."

"I put my damages at $15. That is for the trunk alone. The damage to my feelings I put at $100. I ought to say $250, but I'll let it go at $100. Who shall I see?"

"The president, mum. Come in at 4 o'clock."

"Very well, I'll be here. If you see him tell him I'm coming. Tell him I don't want no ifs nor ands about it, but cash down."

"Yes, mum."

"And if he tries to dodge me I'll sue for a thousand dollars, and have my husband come on here and lick the whole caravan! Some folks can be walked on and buried in the mud, but I'm not one of the sort. Just leave that trunk where it is until I call, and you mention to the president that a woman who is no spring pullet will be here at 4 o'clock to get damages or pull hair."—Detroit Free Press.

A Novel Waiter.

"George," remarked Mrs. Jackhigh to her husband, "who is this Sam Taylor I heard you and Maj. Johnson talking about? Is he a good waiter?"

"A good waiter, my dear? What do you mean?"

And then George gazed out of the window with a far away look in his eyes.—Life.

MR. AND MRS. BOWSER.

He Tries to Show His Wife How to Clean a House—What the Result Was.

Last fall Mr. Bowser undertook to do our house cleaning in fifteen minutes, but got discouraged and went off for a fortnight while I finished up. As I wanted to overhaul things a little this month, and as I wanted him out of the way, I said to him the other evening:

"Being you have been home all summer, I should think you would want to take a little trip this fall."

"H'm!" he replied as he looked up from his paper.

"You don't look a bit well, Mr. Bowser. Your face is haggard, and I believe you have lost twenty pounds of flesh this summer."

This time he didn't say anything as he looked at me.

"If you wanted to go down to New Hampshire and see your relatives," I continued, "I could get you all ready in one day."

"Oh, you could!" he replied. "Mrs. Bowser, I see through your little game, and it won't work. You want to get me away so you can rip and tear and scrub and clean and wipe and dust and damage and destroy four-fifths of the contents of this house!"

"I want to clean just a little."

"Well, go ahead."

"But you—you"——

"Oh, yes, it's always me! One would think you were afraid to breathe unless I gave my consent in writing. Have I said a word against housecleaning? Don't I know that housecleaning must be done? I was wondering the other day when you were going to begin."

"But last year you raised such a fuss."

"Can't remember that I said one single word. If I did it was only in fun."

"And I may clean?"

"Not only that, but I'll help."

"But you needn't. You just be patient and put up with the muss for a few days and I'll get"——

"As I said, I will help, Mrs. Bowser. It will be a sort of vacation for me. Don't you worry about my finding any fault."

It was with fear and trembling that I saw him put on an old suit of clothes next morning and heard him say:

"I'll begin on the parlor first. It's now 9 o'clock. We ought to be through with the whole house in two hours."

"I—I'm afraid we are not so smart as that. We must go slow and give the house a thorough going over."

"Oh, we'll have everything shining like a new pin before we let up. You boss and I'll do the work. You know, of course, that there is everything in the planning. Some folks make a whole week's job of housecleaning simply because they don't know how to plan. Mother and I used to clean house in half an hour, and you know how particular she is."

After breakfast the cook came in and said she was ready, and she likewise announced that the two colored women were in waiting.

"Waiting for what?" asked Mr. Bowser.

"To help us clean," I replied.

"Send them right home! Five of us to clean house! Who ever heard of the like! Do you want the neighbors to think we have been shoveling dirt into the house all summer? I'll start those colored women for home, and I don't want any help from the cook. Let her attend to affairs in the kitchen."

He went out and "started" the two women I had had engaged for six weeks, and then returned with the announcement that he was ready to start in on the spare bedroom, having already taken down the curtains and removed the bedding.

"All right—I'll have it done in five minutes!" he replied, as he spit on his hands. "You clear out and give me room to work. I think I can give you and all other women a pointer on house cleaning."

I went down stairs, and it wasn't over seven minutes before he called to me:

"All right, Mrs. Bowser—your room is cleaned! Come up and show me what to do next."

"What have you done?" I asked, as I found him seated on the window sill with a complacent smile on his face.

"Cleaned the room. Every picture has been taken down and dusted, the bedstead wiped off, and I have swept the carpet. Your three or four women would have been two days accomplishing the same task I have completed in less than ten minutes. I tell you, Mrs. Bowser, it is all in the planning."

"But that bedstead must come down, Mr. Bowser."

"What for?"

"Because the carpet must come up. Everything must be moved out of the room and the floor cleaned."

"Well, I should like to know what for? What's the matter with this room just as it is?"

"Dust, Mr. Bowser. It blows and we can't help it. Moths get in now and then. If we don't do our work thoroughly we might as well let it go entirely. Take the bedstead down first."

"I'll take it down, but I protest. It's all bosh hunting out every speck of dust. No one else does it. Get out of the way!"

He made a grab for the springs and lifted them out, but in getting them clear of the rail he fell over backwards and the springs fell upon him. He made use of several vigorous exclamations, kicked out in an effort to demolish them, and as I assisted him to get up he roared:

"I told you that these things ought to be left alone! The fool who invented them never intended they should be moved!"

I calmed him down after a bit and then asked him to take down the bedstead. He grabbed the footboard and gave a pull. Then he grabbed the headboard and gave a wrench.

"Mr. Bowser, don't you know how to take a bedstead apart?" I asked.

"Don't I?" Well, if I don't no one else does! I was taking bedsteads apart ten years before you were born! You always have to loosen the joints a bit. Now then"——

"But you don't bear down on the rail. You must lift up at the ends."

"I think I know my business, Mrs. Bowser," he replied as he worked away.

"But you don't. You are locking the rails instead of loosening them. See here."

I pulled at the end of a rail and unlocked it. Mr. Bowser backed off, crossed his hands on the small of his back and said:

"Mrs. Bowser, that settles it. I clearly see your object. We will have no more house cleaning this fall. I see what it would lead to. When a wife gets the idea that she knows more than her husband it is time to hoist the danger signal. Just drop things right here. That is, unless you have planned to bring about this very thing to force a legal separation."

He dressed and went off down town.—Detroit Free Press.

A Little Off.

"Say! haven't you any sense?" he demanded of his friend as they crossed the street and left the third man to go on alone.

"What's up?"

"Why, you kept asking him if he'd been away this summer, and if he'd had a good time, and if he went fishing, and all that."

"Well, wasn't that common courtesy?"

"Not under the circumstances. Not when he'd been in the workhouse all summer!"—Detroit Free Press.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23.....1889

It is a very noteworthy fact, that just so soon as the silver interest got more power in Congress by the admission of new states, the price of silver began to rise. It is not asserted that the rise is due entirely to this increase of power; but the fact remains that the rise did not begin till the power was secured. This fact will give greater force to the assertion made by the friends of silver, that there never was a national cause for the decline of silver, but that it was brought about by the schemes of the great money lenders and bondholders and was continued solely in their interest.

The revolution in Brazil shows how little the great bulk of the people have to do with the government. A General of the Brazilian army was reprimanded for insubordination; with the troops under his command he took possession of the Capital of the Empire, Rio Janeiro, made the Emperor prisoner and proclaimed a republic. The great bulk of the Brazilian people know little and care less about forms of government; they eat their bananas and yams, smoke and drowse and let government take care of itself. If the deposed Emperor could muster force enough to recapture his capital and make prisoners of the republican president and his officers there would be no commotion outside of Rio Janeiro. It requires a very highly civilized people to maintain a republican form of government. Millions of the Brazilians are very little, if any, better educated or live more comfortably than the Indians of California, and care as little whether the government is a republic or an empire as our Indians care whether Democrats or Republicans are in power.

The proposition is made to hold a World's Fair for the Pacific Coast in 1892. This could and should be made a grand success. No other part of the United States shows so clearly the wonderful capacity of the American people to convert the desert wilderness into fruitfulness and beauty, and to make the rough materials supplied by nature into all that is necessary for the support and pleasure of mankind. All the rest of the world would be benefited by careful study of what has been accomplished on the Pacific Coast in the short space of about forty years. Whether a World's Fair be held at New York or Chicago, or any other eastern city in 1892, the distance and expense will be so great that hundreds of thousands of people on the Pacific Coast, who could and would attend a fair at Sacraments, will not be able to go East. No part of California would be more benefited by such a fair than the more remote counties. This would afford the best possible opportunity to make known the resources of those counties, and to attract settlers and capital for their development. A still greater advantage would be the mental stimulus such an exhibit would be to all who should attend, and the useful and practical information that could not fail to be imparted. Every one who can by word or deed help to a successful accomplishment of this good project should do so. The Pacific Coast Fair of 1892 can be made a grand success if the people only determine to have it so.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23.....1889

A late quotation for bar silver is 94¾.

Mr. Thomas C. Boland was up from Keeler last Tuesday.

John Glader has rented the Densmore farm at Camp Independence.

Mr. Claussen has begun work on the new flues for the Court House.

Mr. James A. McKenzie was in from Darwin some days this week.

Mr. J. E. Crocker, of Big Pine, has gone on a business trip to Bakersfield.

P. H. Mack, County Clerk, got back from San Francisco last Wednesday.

Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Moffett, of George's Creek, were in town a few days this week.

Mr. H. Frederick, of Virginia City, will be here next week with a fine stock of jewelry.

George M. Gill, District Attorney of Inyo county, has been admitted to practice in the State Supreme Court.

Mr. A. Walker is so far recovered from his dangerous illness that he left town today for his home at Olancha.

Two more men arrived at Citrus last Wednesday to work on Doctor Bishop's tract of land under the Eastside canal.

Mr. H. J. Robinson, of Georges Creek, returned home last Wednesday after an absence of a few weeks at San Francisco.

Hon. P. Reddy has been at Hawthorne all the week; he is leading counsel in the Pamlico—Garrison mining suit now on trial.

A retrial of the Pamlico—Garrison mining case was begun at Hawthorne last Monday. At the first trial the jury failed to agree.

Mr. and Mrs. William Walker came up from Olancha last Saturday and passed a few days in town. They were accompanied by their daughter, Mrs. Brown.

S. P. Smith, of Bishop, has gone to the Bakersfield country with thirty-seven head of work horses for sale. He passed through Independence on Wednesday.

The Independence Band have a nice hall to practice in, they are given the use of the hall and all the lights they want free of expense by O. I. Mairs. This is a touch of liberality that is worth imitation.

The mountains on both sides of Owens valley look very beautiful at present. Each peak is draped in a covering of purest white, like a bride arrayed in a veil of the finest lace. At sunrise and sunset the mountains are aglow with a soft, rosy light, like the blushes of a bride. In the valley the weather has all the softness and sweetness of spring.

The hotels at Los Angeles report larger business than for the corresponding period of last year. A very large number of Eastern people is confidently expected to come to the city this winter. The boom prices of land have been readjusted to actual values and a strong disposition is shown by Eastern people to invest money in real estate.

Change of Time.

A new time card went into effect last Monday on the C. & C. road. There is no change in the arrival and departure of trains south of Belleville. Trains leaving Reno for the south will be one and a half hours later than before the change. The south bound train will now arrive at Belleville at 10:25 at night. The north bound train will leave Belleville at 7:45 a. m.

Dedication Services.

The M. E. Church, at Independence, was dedicated last Sunday. The services were conducted by Rev. E. Vandeventer, assisted by Rev. E. McEvers, of Bishop, and the Pastor at Independence, Rev. J. H. De La Matyr. A large congregation attended the services. Mr. Vandeventer preached a fine sermon and was listened to with very marked attention. He preached again at night to a very full attendance, and on Monday evening preached again. All of these services were very interesting and evidently were much enjoyed by the congregations.

Profit From Fruit.

The sale of fruit this season from six acres of orchard belonging to Mr. J. W. Symmes, near Independence, amounted to fifteen hundred dollars. Last year but twelve hundred dollars worth of fruit was sold from the same tract. Mr. Symmes says that one hundred dollars per acre would fully cover all the expense of caring for the orchard and marketing the fruit, leaving a net income of one hundred and fifty dollars per acre. The demand for this fruit is far in excess of the supply; the apricots, peaches, pears and apples are of the finest quality.

Contemptible Wrangling

There are three newspapers published in Oakland, and the editors have for some time past been abusing each other till the stream of wretched vituperation and senseless rot became such a nuisance that the business men of the city drew up a petition, signed it and presented it to all three of the editors, asking them in the interests of morality and decency to stop filling their papers with personal abuse of each other. Nothing is more contemptible than the wretched personal squabbles indulged in by so many editors of newspapers; the public cares nothing about the mean jealousies that prompts to these miserable exhibitions of jealousy and envy, and no man who has proper self-respect will notice, much less participate in them.

Worth Thinking About.

Chicago is making strong efforts to secure the World's Fair of 1892. A circular recently issued gives some items of the business of the City. Here are a few of the items:

Total value meat production	$95,000,000
" " lumber "	50,000,000
" " dry goods, clothing	40,000,000
" " boots and shoes	29,000,000
" " books	9,000,000
" " agricul. implements	12,000,000
" " furniture	16,000,000

It is well worth careful consideration of the above items and then note the next.

Total value of product from breweries, cigars and malt $39,956,508.

Every one should take a few minutes to compare the above items and think carefully about what they mean.

OLD TIME DANCE MUSIC.

At any ball or party where dancing is going on it is worth while to observe the effect upon the dancers. Quadrilles danced to old time tunes produce vastly more jollity and real exuberance of spirit than round dances. Waltzers frequently appear to be in a somnambulistic state; they look as if dreaming, and their dreams very far from being of an elevating or spiritual character; not such dreams as mothers would want their daughters to have. The polka and other round dances make the participants look like the inmates of asylums for the insane; the wild whirling of these dances suggests that they could have originated only in the minds of madmen. But the moment any of the old tunes are struck up for a quadrille, every eye brightens with the light of healthy fun and every face is beaming with smiles of real pleasure. Such airs as Garryowen, Larry O'Gaff, Paudeen O'Rafferty, Tatter Jack Welsh, The Priest in His Boots, Katie in the Lane, The Blackberry Blossom, and a hundred more old Irish tunes. Such Scotch tunes as The Flowers of Edinburgh, Bonnie Annie, Miss McLeod, Tullochgorum, Caberfae, The North Back o' the Grampians, The East Neuk o' Fife, Craigalachie Brig, The Maid o' Aisla, The Marquis o' Huntly; all these and very many more have the most enlivening effect upon the spirits; such music "Kindles wit, it waukens lear, it pangs us fou o' knowledge." Nor is Eogland wanting in airs that promote cheerfulness and hearty fun. The Liverpool Hornpipe, Haste to the Wedding, When the Heart of a Man is Oppressed with Care, Fisher's Hornpipe, and a long list of similar tunes, any of these airs never fails to put people in a cheerful humor. When one of these fine old airs is struck up in a ball room, even the silly people who think round dances more stylish forget their affectation, their looks betoken real enjoyment, they become natural, and are vastly improved by the change. Nearly all of the above named airs are at least one hundred years old, some of them much older, yet they are all as great favorites to-day as when they were first published. The last great composer of reel tunes was Neal Gow, who died about one hundred and fifty years ago in Scotland, his native land. His "Second Wife," "Farewell to Whiskey," "Cameron Got His Wife Again," and a score or more of very fine airs are great favorites with the lovers of the old time music. People really love that old music and the old dances that accompany it, far better than the later styles of music and dancing. At any public place of amusement when

"Hornpipes, jigs, strathspeys and reels Put life and mettle in their heels."

the dancers never fail to be rewarded with hearty applause. It is capricious fashion—a bad caprice and a bad fashion—that prefers waltz, polka and other frenzied inventions to the far healthier and far merrier old time music and dances.

"Search the world all around
From the sky to the ground
No such sight can be found
As an Irish lass dancing."

The American lass would be just as fine a sight if she would learn and practice the Irish dances.

Training Young Citizens.

There is in one of the cities of our State a great mercantile establishment where not less than three hundred persons are employed. Many of these employes are very young boys and girls. At regular stated intervals, about once a month, every one of these persons, the youngest as well as the oldest, goes in turn to an interview with one of the heads of the concern who attends to this duty. Here the employe is asked to make any suggestions that he or she can offer as to any improvement that can be made that will enable the employe to perform his or her duty with greater ease or facility. All the questions and answers are noted by a shorthand reporter and are afterward written out at length. Then the whole matter is carefully studied by the member of the firm, and afterward as many of the suggestions as are found practicable and useful are adopted and put in operation. In this way the firm gets the benefit of the actual experience of every person employed, and an amount of information on the best ways of doing business that would be impossible in any other way. The result is that this little army gets through its work with such ease, facility and pleasure as are not less pleasing than remarkable to see. But ease and facility of doing business is not all, nor the highest object this firm has in view. The member of the firm who makes the inquiries said to a visitor a few days ago, that a republican form of government rests entirely upon the virtue and intelligence of the people. To secure the best form of government every person living under it must be taught habits of close observation, intelligent inquiry, and, above all, self respect. By the method pursued every one of the three hundred persons employed by this firm is led to observe closely; to inquire intelligently into everything pertaining to duty; and the form of consultation observed between this successful merchant and the youngest person in his employ creates a feeling of self respect and self reliance that go far toward making the very best citizens. In a country where men engaged in the terribly earnest and severe competition of business that now prevails among us have such aims as these in their relations with persons in their employ, no fear need be felt as to the safety of society and the stability of free institutions.

An Inexcusable Vice.

A few evenings ago a small party were engaged in an amusement entirely harmless. One of the party was a young man to whom nature has been very kind. Handsome features, a fine form, vigorous health; an amiable and kind disposition; an excellent temper, industrious, perfectly sober, never gambles; good business capacity, courteous to everybody; he is blessed with all these. Everybody who knows this young man likes him, and is friendly to him, and none more so than the bystander alluded to above. And yet this friend was shocked and pained while he stood there to hear his young friend constantly uttering the most terrible profanity. In the presence of a woman, old or young, it is safe to say the young man would never utter one word to shock or disgust her; but here he was pouring from his lips a steady stream of language that would horrify any decent woman, and evidently unconscious of doing it. Profane swearing is a most vulgar and inexcusable vice; that it can be easily overcome is proven by the fact that even those who are most addicted to it do not swear in the presence of women, unless it be their sisters or their wives; there are few so depraved as to utter profane language in the presence of mother. Drop the vile practice young men; if old men want to swallow that unbaited hook of the devil's, let them get it in their gullets.

Badly Hurt.

At the end of last week Walter James, Jr., got very badly hurt. He was riding after stock over a field belonging to Mr. E Robinson when the animal stumbled and made a complete somersault; Walter was dashed to the ground and the horse rolled over upon him. The young man was unconscious for a length of time, and though he has since walked about a little he appears to be very seriously injured.

A Good Ruling.

Secretary Noble has made a ruling that the higher valleys among the Sierra Mountains may be entered under the pre-emption or homestead laws; although the parties making the entries may not be able to live upon their locations during the winter. This will enable people to make entries for summer homes among the beautiful little valleys that are scattered all among the mountains. It will in time preserve the mountain forests from destruction by the sheep men; for when the valleys are occupied by settlers during the summer the sheepmen will not take their flocks there.

Mining Notes.

There is very little doing in the Darwin mining district. In the Lucky Jim mine Mr. J. A. McKenzie has a few men at work; in the Defiance there are a few more employed; and this is about all that is doing. Mr. J. C. Eddy is not doing anything in mines at present.

Over at Riley Mr. C. Anthony has got out a good sized pile of ore for a run at the Riley mill.

Late reports from Panamint are to the effect that very little is doing there.

At Cerro Gordo Mr. Farrington is getting tunnels and shafts repaired, and till this work is finished very little else will be attempted.

Enduring Affection.

About thirteen years ago a little girl, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Eibeshutz, died. The child was about one year old at the time of her death, and an Indian girl had been employed in taking care of her. A small photograph of the child had been given to her dusky nurse, who is now herself the mother of several children. A few days ago, Mr. Eibeshutz was passing the Indian camp where Maggie, the former nurse lives; he called to see her, and she spoke feelingly of her little charge who had died so long ago, and said she had the photograph that had been given her while the child was alive. In the great fire that destroyed Independence three and a half years ago all the family pictures belonging to Mr. Eibeshutz perished in the flames. He was very much affected but also gratified to discover that a picture of his lost child was in existence, but had to talk a good deal to Maggie before she would let it go out of her possession long enough to be copied.

County Printing

A statute enacted by the Legislature defines a "square" of county advertising as equal to 240 ems "nonpareil." Each line of a column in this paper is equal to 26 ems "nonpareil;" therefore ten lines are equal to a "square" and twenty ems over. It is the custom in the office of the INYO INDEPENDENT to reckon ten lines as a "square," giving the advertiser the benefit of the excess. "Nonpareil" is that kind of type in which all kinds of legal notices are published. The reports of the Treasurer and Auditor in this paper are set in "nonpareil." A constant harping is kept up against the Supervisors because they make a contract each year for the County advertising; and not leave it with the other county officers to get the advertising of their several offices done wherever they may think fit. Now the attention of taxpayers is earnestly invited to the following statement of facts: The cheapest rate per square for doing the advertising ever offered to the Supervisors being taken as a basis, then the advertising done for the county since the beginning of the present year, would if charged for on that basis, cost the tax-payers just two hundred and twenty-six dollars. If charged for at regular rates it would cost not less than five hundred dollars. There may be more county advertising before the end of the year. By contract the cost of the County advertising for the whole year is one hundred and twenty-five dollars. The Supervisors pursue the only course that can get the service done for the least money. Taxpayers will judge of the motives for abusing them for pursuing this course. The law provides that the Supervisors shall fix the price for county advertising; the lowest price is secured by the method adopted by the Board, and this is certainly in the interest of tax-payers. The law expressly mentions "the official newspaper of the county," though statements have been made to the contrary.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WOMAN'S SYMPATHY.

Bertha has returned, never to leave her lover again, in safety, and still faithful to him; his fears were unfounded, his suspicions rebuked. It was only last evening that he had looked into her beautiful eyes once more, and it was to-day she had told him he might come again. It was a great day for Philip for another reason. He was to break ground this morning for a new mill, whose walls and foundations would be laid in love and justice. In the mill yard a hundred laborers waited with their spades over their shoulders, and with them the young mill owner, grasping a spade like the rest. At the contractor's word the iron glistened in the sunlight, and in an instant more a hundred and one spades struck earth. Ten thousand eager workmen all over the land were waiting on the undertaking. Each night 10,000 anxious tongues will ask how many feet the new walls have risen that day; will reproach the masons if they are slow, will bless them if they work mightily.

The looms in the Breton mills are still to-day, the great water wheel is unharnessed from the myriad belts, while the men and women and children gathered around the great parallelogram marked out by the engineers for the foundation of the new mill. It was to be their mill, too, and the face of the poorest creature of them all reflected a little of the blessed hope which was making life over for them. Not a voice was heard. For the moment all eyes were fixed on the bending forms. Philip Breton's slight form was bent, too, as he drove his spade deep into the stubborn sod. Every laborer stayed his hand until the young master threw up the first earth. Then a cheer broke from each brawny throat, and every spade at once lifted its burden of green turf.

The hundred laborers bent again to their task, and the frightened daisies trembled on their green stems, but Philip, spade in hand, had mounted the steps of the nearest mill, and now looked down kindly on the operatives who gathered expectantly about him.

"I mean that not one injustice shall ever desecrate these new walls. I mean that the mill shall be a temple of co-operation. I believe the world is just entering on a new epoch, more glorious than any before, because blessings that have been confined to the few, comforts that have comforted only the few, leisure and amusement, even, that has cheered only the few, shall be universal; that each hand that tills the earth shall share in its bountiful harvests, which now pack the store houses of a few in useless profusion; that each hand that weaves our cloth shall share in its profits according to his worth. It isn't because the world is so poor that you have been poor so long; but because its wealth is wasted. Yet be patient. Violence only destroys, it does not build up, and every article of wealth destroyed leaves so much less of your heritage. We will not work any more today; it shall be a holiday to be kept sacred in our memories, as an inspiration to more faithful labor and more honest, contented lives.

But for a moment no one moved, till he leaned his spade against the wall, and started to come down. Then a murmur ran through the crowd till it swelled to a cheer, and as he made his way out, he had to clasp a thousand dingy hands, reached out to the young master in token of the love and trust of a thousand brightened lives.

His destiny that had frowned so long and so terribly, smiled at last. As if by a miracle his life, that had seemed so dreary and barren, was become a path of flowers. All dangers were averted, all evils turned into blessings, and it was so short a time ago that he saw no spark of joy in life. It had been like a day when the clouds had shut away the sun, and settled gloomily over the earth for a storm. A shadow creeps into every human face, darkness cowers in every home, the birds flutter in terror from tree to tree, or nestle fearfully in their retreats. The very brooks moan instead of babbling. Then suddenly the summer sun burns through the clouds, which scatter to their caves beneath the hills; the rippling rivers glisten and sparkle like rarest jewels, and the birds break forth in song as they mount in ecstasy toward the sunlight. Not a human thing but brightens into sudden gladness. So short a time ago he thought life only a dull, cheerless struggle, that he rose in the morning heavy and disheartened, that he lay down at night, careless if he slept forever. But suddenly the world looked like an enchanted palace to Philip Breton, and his life seemed as perfect as a day in paradise.

It was at 3 o'clock that he was to go to Bertha, and it was only 2 when he was ready and waiting in his study for this last slow hour between him and happiness to slip away. He looked up the street and down again, but the streets were quite deserted; he might have fancied the world all gone to sleep had he not heard the roar of the waters going over the dam. Then he glanced at the clock. If he had not heard its loud ticking he would have been willing to swear the hands must have stopped. He picked up a newspaper and tried to interest himself in it. What a child he was, to be sure, not to know how to wait. Did he imagine there would be nothing more for him to wait for after to-day? His eyes glanced impatiently down the pages. There seemed to be absolutely nothing in the paper at all; he must stop his subscription; he might as well write to the publishers now; it would take up a little of his surplus time. But what was this odd looking advertisement in such very black type:

Divorces obtained without trouble or publicity for any cause desired. Address, in strictest confidence, John T. Giddings, No 4 Errick square, Lockout.

"Well, well," soliloquized Philip, after reading the card a second time, "our corporation counsel is come down pretty low, getting bogus divorces for a livelihood."

Then he glanced at his watch; he was out of temper with the pretty little clock. Perhaps allowing fifteen minutes for the distance to Bertha's house he might not be very much too early.

Philip found Bertha standing. She generally preferred to sit. And she wore an anxious look he had never seen on her face before. He thought to make her laugh.

"I suppose Mrs. Ellingsworth will not miss her chance to spoil our tete-a-tete."

"She is not in town," and Bertha turned to the window again. "She went yesterday. Do you know whether she has any relatives in—in Vineboro?"

"Why that is where you"— Philip bit his lip; "no, I didn't know that she had."

He came up to where she stood, and, when she did not speak again, he tried to take her hand. But she drew away from his touch with a gesture of impatience.

"I am in no mood for foolishness." It seemed foolishness to her then! There was a pang of pain about his heart, and then a thought struck him.

"You are not afraid of her, are you?"

She drew herself up to her full height in her old superb arrogance, and her lips curled in scorn.

"I will be afraid of no one. If I owe no one a duty I need not be afraid." She seemed to be gathering force for an instant, while her cold eyes rested on the face of the man who loved her so nobly. "I must take back my promise; I cannot marry you."

"Do you owe me nothing now, then?" he pleaded in a startled voice.

"Perhaps so—yes, I think I ought not to make you miserable."

"Then do not leave me; do not kill me, Bertha, after letting me hope." He had seized her hand again, but she would not let him draw her to him.

"But I should make you miserable." She dropped her eyes before his. "You would not like—like"——

"I will take all the blame, then." He put his arm about her, and this time she did not repel him. "I call God to witness you will not be responsible; I will forgive you everything, my darling." She was in his arms, but still she held back her face from him.

"I will forgive you everything."

"And you won't blame me, whatever happens?"

"No, oh, never." The color came back into his face; his triumphant heart sent the hot blood through every vein and artery.

"And you will remember I warned you?"

"Yes," he whispered, "and will remind you of it when you have made me the happiest man in the world. But we won't wait till Jane comes back; we will be married to-morrow."

"Oh, no." Her smile was very beautiful and sweet, but as cold as the river of death.

"The day after, then. Say the day after to-morrow, before anything has time to happen."

He saw her lips were forming for a "no," but he kissed it away; and another and another, till she broke away from him with a laugh.

"Well, yes, then; but you will be sorry for it to the end of your life." He made her put on her hat after tea and they went across the fields to the village cemetery.

He had stirred her by his enthusiasm to an unwonted pitch, but now she had become colder than ever, and very silent. It seemed as if she were sorry for what she had promised, and Philip was afraid each moment that she would open her lips and take it all back. He talked very eagerly to her all the way to take up her mind, telling her all the plans he had made and how gloriously they seemed to be succeeding. She did not make much response to what he said, but he was only too glad that she did not repeat the words she had met him with in the afternoon. At last they stood by a massive pillar of granite; not broken to signify an incomplete life work, but perfect in symmetry and finished in outline. Bertha could make out in the deepening twilight the name of "Ezekiel Breton" cut deep into the everlasting stone.

"I mean," he said, in forced calm, "is there any barrier which the laws make to prevent you from marrying him?" Since he had begun to dream of marriage, he had thought only of the barrier of her shame; he had not thought that there might be a barrier more impregnable. But it came over him all the more terribly now. That would explain her lack of shame, her unbroken pride, that would be more consistent with his lifelong idea of her, if she had preserved her honor, and, alas, was already married and cut forever away from him. That would save her purity which he had thought sullied. No fingers of scorn could ever be pointed at her. No; but she would be lost to him forever. God forgive him, then, if he would rather have her dishonored, insulted, degraded, than lose her. Would she never answer? She laid down her needle and turned her face up toward him. He trembled like a child as he watched her lips part; in a moment his fate would be decided. It was terrible that his happiness could come only through her shame, and her honor meant a life of despair and loneliness for him, but so it seemed to him now.

"There is no barrier," she replied.

"Thank God," he whispered. The strain was removed. She had established her own disgrace with her own lips, without a drooping of her eyes, without a quiver of her lips. Ah, but he suffered in his very hope. It wounded him that he must rejoice in her shame, it was almost as if he had caused it. He bent low over her shoulder, in another moment he would have told her of the unchanging passion—of his love. All the bounds of his nature were broken down now. His whole soul seemed dissolving in ineffable tenderness for this cold woman, into whose calm, beautiful eyes he looked so hungrily.

"Like embroidery, don't you, Mr. Breton?"

Mrs. Ellingsworth flashed her small black eyes in delight. Philip started back in ill concealed dismay, but Bertha's face changed not one shade of expression as she rose magnificently to her feet and swept from the room.

The lady of the house looked unpleasantly after her.

"Isn't it funny, she don't seem to like me? Do you suppose it is that Curran scrape that has put her so much above me?"

Philip glanced savagely at her; he could almost have struck her, without thinking of her womanhood, there was such a snake like look in the glistening black eyes. One might as well reproach a wild creature of the forest for following out its instincts; but after a moment he said:

"Mrs. Ellingsworth forgets she is a lady!"

But she was beautiful, if not a lady, her hot blood lighting up her round olive cheeks as if it were liquid fire and her curled lips glowing like a perfect rose just bursting into bloom. No man could look at her now and not feel a mad soulless fascination for her, a fascination the greater because mixed with revulsion. She was a perfect type of the womanhood that can madden a man with passion, without tenderness, that can wreck his life, banish every noble hope or ideal from his soul and feed him nothing but dead sea fruit.

"It's strange what makes a lady," she answered him in growing excitement. "Your Bertha is one no matter what viileness she sinks to, but I can't whisper one rude word."

She came close to him and put her burning fingers on his hand. "Your horse loves you better than that woman. She will torture you to death, let her alone." Then she sprang away from him, and walked backward and forward clasping and unclasping her clinging fingers in her old habit. "Oh, I hate her, I hate her; but what good is it? I would dash myself to pieces to break her, but I could not. She steals my lover and then leaves him. She comes back disgraced in the eyes of her own father; but she does not feel it. And now comes her lover with his riches, and offers everything to her. She deserves nothing, but gets everything." She would have raved on, but Philip Breton walked slowly out of the room. Nothing could ever move him now; he preferred the woman she maligned to all the other hopes or possessions of the world.

CHAPTER XXIII.

NO APPRECIATION OF EMBROIDERY.

It was the next afternoon, as Philip Breton was unhitching Joe from the post, that he had occasion to doff his hat to Mrs. Ellingsworth, driving by with her husband. They made a very pretty picture of marital bliss; perhaps they were all the happier because neither of them had souls. Philip had been intending to go to his factory, there was some business he ought to attend to, but the sudden assurance that Bertha was alone made his heart give a great bound. What better time than now to tell her of his unaltered love, to win her promise to let him make her happy? So his business was postponed, and he rang the bell at Mr. Ellingsworth's instead.

"Not in?" he repeated after the servant in dismay. Would his luck never change? Had she been frightened at his manner the night before, and gone away to avoid his unpleasant suit?

"But she isn't far away," and the girl smiled at the disappointment that had come over his face. "I guess, now, you will find her in the garden; or I will call her if you say."

"No, don't call her," and Philip hurried out to the garden. What more fitting place for what he had to say if he could find his voice for the great lump in his throat. He must be very eloquent to persuade her, to answer all her objections, to assure her that it was not pity that moved him, for she would resent that, but love—a love that craved her above all the world.

She looked up from her embroidery at the sound of his footsteps and smiled. Her beauty might all go, as its first bloom and freshness had gone, and her cheeks fade like the autumn leaves whose glowing tints they had once worn; her golden hair might whiten with age, he knew it would make no difference in his love. She wore the same dress she had worn in that other garden scene. She had grown thin and gone back to the dresses of her girlhood. It was a light blue silk, open low in the neck, filled in with nestling folds of lace. The sunbeams made their way through the low hanging trees, and with them came the breath of the roses, and the humming of the bees, just as on that other day.

Philip seated himself on the bench beside her, and tried to make his voice calm as he said:

"Do you remember when you last wore this dress?"

Would she be frightened at the intensity of gentleness in his voice?

But she smiled as frankly at him as if he were her brother. "Oh, yes."

He put his hand on her arm, cool as if love and passion were forever outside her experience. "Bertha, I love you more now than then. I will not frighten you with my vehemence; I have learned to conquer myself. I will cherish you as a child, but, oh, Bertha, I want to be near you."

The woman did not draw away from him. She was looking with a changed expression at his eager face—the face of the lover whom no coldness could chill; who returned again after her desertion of him; whom no shame could alter. He had stirred something like admiration in her at last. A tinge of delicate life into a new plane of existence—that he had given hope to 1,000 desperate hearts—compared with the hope of making this one woman happy and of living in her smiles.

But he suddenly started from his fond reverie, and passed into another room, all as white as some cave in a mountain of snow. The mantel was of marble, the curtains cloud like masses of snowy lace; and even the upholstery of the chairs, and the carpet was white damask. His heart beat fast as he stood for a moment in the chamber, then he went softly out and locked the door behind him, so that no foot should cross its sacred threshold till its mistress came.

It was to be a very quiet wedding—no guests, no cards, no banquet. The shortest and simplest form that could make a man and woman one was enough. But the hour was past, and yet there was no wedding; the bride, all dressed, waited to be called from her room; the young bridegroom paced to and fro across the parlor floor. There was no minister.

The clock struck the half hour. It was half past eight. Mr. Ellingsworth sat in the parlor reading the evening paper in unbroken tranquility. Philip was wondering where Jane could be; whether she was indeed preparing a terrible blow for the white bosom of his bride. What could she do?

"Ah! I think I hear the carriage," remarked Mr. Ellingsworth, laying aside his paper with a little yawn.

"From which direction," asked Philip, listening eagerly, while the feverish blood rushed into his face.

Mr. Ellingsworth went to the window. "Why, from both directions. It sounds to me like two carriages. I will go out and see."

Philip hurried to the window and raised it, but it was pitch dark; he could see nothing. Who could be in that second carriage? He wanted to be called, but no one came for him. He heard the doors open and shut, and indistinguishable voices, but no one called him. Then he made his way out into the hall in vague terror. He thought of his bride waiting up stairs, and set his teeth for the worst. No earthly power, no vileness of calumny, no shameful disclosures should move him. His bride waited for him, ready to be his when he called for her. Ah! he would not shame her, though all hell hissed at her. But how fanciful he was. He could hear the mild mannered minister talking in his polite tones. He caught his complacent laugh. Thank God for it. Nothing could have happened. He walked along the hall. The voices came from the dining room. There was the minister's laugh again. He pushed open the door and went in.

The minister rose, with the especial deference for wealth that marks many of the priests of God, and gave the young man's hand an affectionate squeeze. "No doubt Mr. Breton is ready. It is the bridegrooms who should always be impatient. I believe I am right, am I not, Mrs. Ellingsworth?"

Mrs. Ellingsworth—Philip started violently and the color left his face. She had returned in time then.

"Not always," she smiled strangely and reached out her hand to Philip. It was but a woman's hand, small and velvety, but he touched it as if there were a dagger in its white palm. He knew by the look of evil triumph in her face that she had not been away for nothing. Could it be there was anything worse than he had forgiven already—some page of Bertha's life so black no depth of love could cover it? A deadly faintness was upon him.

"I have brought two visitors," she went on; showing the tips of her white teeth in a beautiful smile.

To be sure, there sat a portly woman with the slightly elevated chin of a certain variety of the sex when on its dignity. But Jane said "two"—where was the other? Ah, the other was in the woman's lap. It was a baby. Mr. Ellingsworth had a very peculiar expression on his face to-night, as if his wife were disappointing him. It was rather a dangerous look if Jane had understood it. She was offending his elegant tastes extremely by bringing to his house a vulgar, fussy old woman and her baby whom she, no doubt, had picked up on the railroad cars. Philip stood nervously fumbling his watch chain, and waiting for a blow to fall on him, he did not know whence.

It was a little baby's hand that caught at Philip's arm, and he turned to look into its great star like blue eyes. He had seen that same marvelous tint in cheeks before, and a cold horror of recognition darted through his soul. He tried to lift his spellbound eyes, and they rested instead on the face of Jane Ellingsworth, which was lit up with a fiendish exultation as she held the child up to him.

There is no proprietary medicine in the world that has grown in popularity and favor in so short a period of time as the remedy known as the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure. The Sierra Chemical Co., manufacturers of these justly renowned goods is composed of bright active men of thorough and long experience in their line of business. They have shown wonderful enterprise in bringing before the public a purely vegetable compound, the chief ingredients of which are composed of herbs gathered on the sides and in the canons of the noted Sierra Range of mountains. This Company have received the highest award given to any medicine at the Mechanics' Exhibition, 1889, and awarded by a committee made up of Professors Rising and Wenzell, the best known analytical chemists on this coast. This is enough to prove its merit as a true remedy, delightful to the taste, and as a positive cure for all Kidney, Liver and Bladder troubles it has no equal on earth. All druggists.

Steam is generated in the boilers of the pumping engines at Moody's gulch, four or five miles from Los Gatos, by the use of natural gas procured from the oil wells. The supply is not great, but it is steady and maintains enough heat to keep the steam at sixty-five pounds pressure. Occasionally wood is used in conjunction with gas, but very rarely.

Received $15,000 from the Louisiana State Lottery.

Christopher Gould, the assistant dispatcher of the Philadelphia and Reading railroad, who resides at 609 North street, Harrisburg, last Wednesday received $15,000, from the Louisiana State Lottery, at New Orleans. He held one-twentieth of ticket No. 8,174, which drew the first capital prize of $300,000, in the drawing of the 10th inst. On Monday of last week, Mr. Gould delivered his ticket to Albert Leeds, of Steelton, agent of the United States Express Company, who forwarded said ticket. On Wednesday Leeds received the full amount of the drawing, in ready cash money, namely $15,000. He at once sent for Mr. Gould, to whom it was delivered, that same day.

In a personal interview with the gentleman, he informed us that the first ticket he ever purchased was about four months ago, and that $8 was all that he had invested in it. Mr. Gould has held his present position of assistant train dispatcher, for the past ten years, before which time he was a conductor on the Steelton branch. He is well and favorably known in this place and is highly esteemed for his genialty. His many friends will be glad to hear of the good fortune, with which he met.

We are happy to say that this sudden wealth has not fallen into the hands of a Coal Oil Johnny man, who squanders it in a reckless manner. But on the other hand it has come into the hands of a discretionate and worthy man who will make proper use of it. To be sure he may possibly feel somewhat elated, as he has good reason to be, but when he was handed over this fortune, he was as cool and reticent as a judge when he passed sentence. This sum certainly comes in very nice, as he had little more than his wages to fall back on.

In connection with this, we might here also state that Mr. Leeds, as agent for the express company, has been doing a large and successful business, in sending tickets to the Louisiana State Lottery and always received the money safely and promptly.—Steelton (Pa.) Advocate, Sept. 27.

A PERFECT BANK.

What makes a representative bank? One whose resources are far ahead of its liabilities; which will not lend money except upon sterling securities; which can lend money at the shortest notice; which will discount good business notes, and which issues letters of credit to any part of the civilized world. A bank which has the entire confidence of the general public, and has the best citizens of the place as its directors and officers. Such a one is the Pacific Bank, of San Francisco.

A DIG IN THE RIBS.

If on the right side and lower part of the diaphragm though playfully meant and delivered, is calculated to evoke profanity from a chappy whose liver is out of order. When that region is sore and congested, pokes seem fiendish. Look at a man's countenance ere you prod him under the ribs. If his skin and eyeballs have a sallow tinge, you may infer also that his tongue is furred, his breath apt to be sour, that he has pains not only beneath his ribs, but also under the right shoulder-blade. Also, that his bowels are irregular and his digestion impaired. Instead of making a jocose demonstration on his ribs, recommend him to take, and steadily persist in taking, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the finest anti-bilious and alterative medicine extant. Incomparable is it, also, for dyspepsia, rheumatism, nervousness, kidney trouble, and fever and ague.

Malarial Fever

"I was cured of one of the worst cases of malaria fever by Hood's Sarsaparilla, and what this medicine did for me it will do for others. I was taken with the disease in 1886. I consulted the best doctors, but without any apparent benefit, and had to resign my situation as agent and operator for the Missouri Pacific Railroad. I had lost 66 pounds and spent over $300. At last I accidentally met a traveller for C. I. Hood & Co., who advised me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. I bought six bottles for $5 and after using two I thought I was no better. But I determined to use up what Sarsaparilla I had; before the third bottle was gone I began to feel better, and continued to mend till I took 12 bottles, when I more than gained my usual health and weight. I soon obtained another situation, and consider myself a well man." J. M. Miller, Agent Wabash & Pacific Railway, Lodge, Ill.

A SOFT SNAP.

Where It Is Better to Be a Pauper Than a Millionaire.

Enfield, Conn., is the most conservative and most charitable town in the State. So when the State Board of Charities said she treated the poor the best of any in the State, it is not to be wondered at. Nineteen paupers live like princes now in that Poor-house and drive out behind a pair of fine steeds when they get a chance. Their quarters are on one of the pleasantest spots in the town. A house with every convenience gives them three square meals a day and furnished room and warm bed to every several one at night, while eighty acres of good land afford exercise for those who are able to take it. The men and women eat at separate tables food made from the best provisions in market, and each drinks a big bowl of coffee or tea at every meal. Most are too old to work, so they gather in different rooms, well heated and furnished, and gabble the hours away. Nearly all use tobacco in some form and the town indulges this petty weakness by allowing each twenty cents' worth a month. They are all ducked in a bathtub once a week, too, and made to keep themselves tidy. No wonder their eyes grace toward this haven, and that when one gets about so old, weary and neglected he seeks refuge there, where three sumptuous repasts each day are served, followed by a dreamy smoke and gurglings of reminiscences of eighty years or more of active life. Many who have money prefer this place to any other, and so give at to the town to support them.—N. Y. Post.

PORTIERES.

Room Draperies Which Every Year Gain in Popularity.

Each year portieres gain in popularity. They are not only graceful and pretty additions to the drapery of a room or hall, but they are so very useful that people who are loth to follow the (to them) "new-fangled ideas," stand ready to speak a word in their favor. There is an almost endless variety of material to use for this purpose, but those who must contrive and economize are glad of hints about these things. A comparatively cheap horse-blanket, if a good color is selected, makes a very nice drapery and is far handsomer than the Canton flannel so much used, that really does not look very well, and invariably collects all dust of a room. A dark gray or brown blanket will last much longer, a frieze can be added of large blocks of dark, rich, contrasting colors of cloth, plush or velveteen. These tacked on with ornamental stitches over the bright stripes of the blanket, give a really excellent effect, and your drapery has a nice look that a lighter material can not have. The expensive Mexican blankets are handsome enough without adding any borders, the bright colors making them very effective in an otherwise darkly finished room. Coarse bagging tacked over bright red wall paper and Japanese matting is a unique idea for wall decoration.—Demorest's Monthly.

PRIVATE WIRES.

What It Costs to Establish Neighborhood Telegraph Lines.

In the State of Indiana there is a telegraph line in operation which places three or four farm-houses in communication with each other. The benefits thereby derived are of great value, and the young folks take great pleasure in this mode of communication. The Free Press some time ago mentioned a line which is in operation in the southern part of this State. It is several miles in length and places eighteen or twenty residences in communication with each other. The line runs to a village and is connected with a doctor's office there, thus giving each "office," or house, provided with an instrument direct connections with the doctor, a great advantage in case of sickness or an emergency. In case of fire or burglary, any family can summon and obtain assistance at once from their neighbors.

Farmers have no idea of the feasibility of a scheme of this kind, and the cost is very slight, compared with the benefits they may gain thereby.

We will suppose that there are four or five farmers, who wish to build a telegraph line and connect with the Post-office or telegraph office. Suppose the line is to be about one mile in length. Let us figure up the cost.

No. 12 galvanized iron wire is very well adapted for a line of this length, and one mile of it would cost about $15. The glass insulators, and brackets to fasten on poles and attach the wires to, will cost but a few dollars. The poles are a small item to farmers, as there need be carried only high enough to keep it out of easy reach of mischevous boys, except in passing over gates, roadways or anywhere that people are liable to drive under it. In such places it must be high enough to clear a man standing upon a load of hay. Your boys will be glad to have the privilege of cutting the poles, and to assist in building the line, because they are to have lots of fun in chatting over the wire, playing checkers by telegraph, etc., during the long winter evenings.

The "gravity battery," as it is called, is the best and cheapest kind to use for this purpose. You will need five "cells" or jars of this battery for the line and an additional "cell" for every instrument attached to the line, half of the battery to be attached to each end of the line, and none anywhere else. Thus if your line is connected with five buildings, you will want ten jars, which will cost you about seventy-five cents each.

The best instruments to use are those in which the "sounder" and "key" are on one base. In case you have children who are apt to meddle with it, you can make a cover to lock over it, after the fashion of a sewing-machine. The instruments will cost you about five dollars each. It will not pay to get the cheapest, neither will it be necessary to have the high-priced ones.

You will also need a "cut-out" and "lightning-arrester" combined, so that you can switch off the instrument during heavy thunder-storms, and effectually protect your property. There are several kinds of cheap ones which will answer very well, and cost about one dollar each.

During my five years' experience as telegraph operator on different lines, I know of only one instance wherein an office was damaged by lightning, and that was probably due to the operator's neglect in not "cutting" or switching out his instrument before going home in the evening.

To sum it up the expenses would be about as follows:

One mile of wire	$15 00
Insulators, about	3 00
Battery, 10 cells @ 75 cents	7 50
Instruments, 5 @ 5	25 00
Cut-outs, or switches, 5 @ $1	5 00
Total	$55 50

This sum divided by five leaves each farmer's expenses $11.10, a small sum to compare with the good you will get out of it.

After putting up the line and getting it in running order, the next thing to be done is to learn the Morse alphabet. The firms that manufacture instruments send cards with this alphabet printed on them, and a book of instructions with the instruments, so that a person of ordinary intelligence can put up a line and master the alphabet by following the directions given therein.

It takes from three to twelve months, according to the aptness of the learner, to become sufficiently proficient to get along on a railroad wire, but on a wire of this kind a few weeks' practice will enable you to converse slowly with your neighbors, and you will improve in proportion to the length of time you practice. Agree with your friends upon the hours to practice and let one in each house "send" in their turn about fifteen minutes at a time, and all the rest copy what he or she sends. It will be a pleasant pastime for the family and serve to keep your boys more at home.

If you can get an operator to instruct you a few times you will get a better idea of it to begin with, although it will not make much, if any, difference in the end.

In a great many localities the barb wire fence may be used, but it is not so reliable, as it is not very well insulated and will work badly in very damp or wet weather. In dry weather, and provided the posts are dry, it will do almost as well as an insulated wire. Be sure that the joints are scraped until bright before connecting the ends together. If the wire is well painted it will work tolerably well, even in wet weather.—Cor. Detroit Free Press.

—One secret of the decline of the Southern cotton-mills, which the New Orleans Picayune admits and deplores, is that there was too great a "boom" in these enterprises. Those that were earliest in the field made heavy dividends, which induced others to crowd in until the production of the coarser grades of goods, to which these mills are chiefly devoted, was pushed beyond the demands of the market.

—An inmate of a Vermont jail swallowed forty-eight pennies the other day hoping they would produce death. But the odd suicidal attempt did not succeed.

LIFE OF A TEACHER.

Not Always Pleasant and Never Too Liberally Rewarded.

Until within a few years a woman, thrown upon her own resources, turned to teaching as her only means of making a livelihood. Now, happily, other avenues are open to her, for say what you will, the life of a teacher is a hard one and the pay poor.

One hears, of course, of the fashionable city school, where the principal calls it a bad year if she clears only thirty thousand dollars. She owns one or two very handsome houses, furnished with the "spoils of travel." She dresses in purple and fine linen and fares sumptuously every day, but what of the fifteen or twenty teachers whom she employs?

They live; that is all.

"I have taught for nearly fifteen years," a lady said to me the other day, "and probably I shall spend the remainder of my days in the schoolroom, for there is no such thing as gaining any thing beyond a mere living by that means, and if it happens that one decides to keep on living, that naturally means that one must keep on teaching."

The head teacher of English receives a salary of $1,200 possibly. The salaries of other teachers average from $400 to $800 a year. The French, German and music teachers are always pretty well paid.

There is a quick-witted damsel in this city who, every Monday during the winter, takes a lesson in elocution from Prof. ——, at $3 an hour, and every Wednesday teaches elocution to a class of twenty women, who each pay her $1. So that by simply transmitting the professor's instruction she clears $17 a week. Last year she taught Delsarte and lunch conversation, and coached for private theatricals. Her "chum" gives lessons in writing, grammar, etc., to actresses, nouveaux riches and others whose early education has been neglected. Between them they made $3,000 last year.

The position of resident governess is considered an extremely disagreeable and trying one. Of course, there are exceptions, but they are uncommonly rare. And then the accomplishments one is expected to possess! She—the prospective governess—must have a thorough knowledge of all the sciences, mathematics, higher English, with the ability to converse fluently in all the modern languages. She must also read Greek and Latin and be a finished musician, qualified to develop a love of the true and the beautiful in any direction toward which the tender plant—her pupil—may incline. She must also show a material regard and interest in the little darling at all times. If she can meet these requirements she will be offered a home and a salary of $20 a month!—N. Y. Star.

LIFE IN VENEZUELA.

There is a prevailing prejudice among the laboring classes against innovation, particularly labor-saving machinery and appliances. No native peon can be persuaded to use a wheelbarrow. He prefers to carry his load upon his head, and if it is too heavy for him he seeks the assistance of a friend and loads it upon a sort of bier with double handles and broad straps to go over the shoulders to be lifted and carried by a man at either end. Heavy furniture and trunks are carried miles in this way.

The native farmers plow with a crooked stick with one handle, just as the Egyptians did in the days of Moses, and nothing can induce them to adopt the modern two-handled steel affair. They simply can't do it, and they won't. General Guzman-Blanco, who was always favorable to the introduction of labor-saving machinery and methods, at one time attempted to enforce the use of improved agricultural implements, but he was compeled to give it up as a bad job. The productiveness of the republic might be enormously increased, as Guzman realized, by enabling one man to do the work of two, or six, or ten, for the great drawback is the scarcity of labor; but the peons are stubborn, more stubborn than stupid, and will insist upon doing every thing their fathers did, and their great grandfathers, for that matter. It is the same spirit, the same resistance to innovations, that causes them to ship their coffee and sugar upon the backs of donkeys instead of the railroad; that requires the payment for produce in coin instead of checks, and causes that coin to be hidden away under an old stump or a crack in the roof instead of being deposited in a bank to draw interest and increase the circulating medium.

The working-men, the mechanics, know nothing of labor-saving machinery. All the timber and woodwork for house-building is dressed by hand. There is not such a thing as a planing-mill or a sash factory in the whole country, and all the furniture and cabinet work is made the same way. You will always find locks placed upon the door-casings and the socket for the bolt screwed upon the door, and the locks are invariably upside down. When you call attention to it you are told that it is the custom of the country. When a house is being erected, whether it is one story or two, the solid walls are first raised to their full height, and then holes are chiseled out to admit the ends of the rafters and timbers for the floors. It never occurs to the builder that an easier way would be to set the timbers in the walls as he lays the bricks.—W. E. Curtis, in Chicago News.

FRESH FASHIONS.

Articles of Attire Attractive to the Average American Adorable Adult.

Bonnets grow in stature but not in loveliness. The towering height of the crowns of some of them may now be almost measured by feet rather than by inches, and many small women who daringly adopt them have the appearance of being roofed and thatched rather than bonneted.

Black lace of many kinds, including Escurial and Guipure, is very much used for dressy hat material over colored satin foundations, and these are often trimmed with large clusters of velvet flowers matched to the shade of the foundations. Upon lace bonnets are frequently placed two rows of roses, set closely together and one above the other, these going round the edge and next the wave of hair, the flowers partly veiled by falling lace, to correspond with the crown trimming. The severe and unadorned edges of the winter bonnets and hats of the Henri II. and Henri III. type, which made them so extremely trying and generally unbecoming, has now given place to those soft, irregular fronts, delicately draped with lace, or velvet-edged, which transform a plain face into an interesting one, and add still further grace to a countenance already attractive.

Most of the new sunshades are of very great size—immense is the word. Some are shaped in pagoda fashion, others are perfectly flat, like the Chinese parasol. Some are unlined, with gilt ribs conspicuous; others have colored linings, in monochrome or shot silk. And again, there are parasols with several tiny flounces put on inside, the outside of the sunshade being unadorned.

In bonnet garnitures and also in new dress fabrics are seen many materials colored the peculiar shade described as Chartreuse, that greenish yellow which distinguishes the famous cordial of that ilk, made after a secret and sacred recipe by the nuns in certain monasteries of France. It would be difficult to find anything more startling and unbecoming than this color. Only by artificial light and worn by the fairest and freshest of faces, is Chartreuse in any strict sense possible.

Some new out-of-door mantles are curious looking enough. The jacket part reaches but little below the waist, and is finished by a rich fancy edge of jet embroidery, below which is added a very table skirt of black lace, which is often nearly as long as the skirt of the gown worn beneath. The upper portion is made of velvet-brocaded grenadine, chenille-dotted gauze, Escurial grenadine, satin brocade, black Spanish lace-headed nets and many other costly materials of black, suitable for summer wear.

As was customary last year, summer muslins, lawns, and other semi-diaphanous gowns are being trimmed with velvet collar and cuffs with a liberal sprinkling of velvet bows scattered over the bodice and skirts. These are very effective and greatly add to the appearance of a light-colored toilet; but it is always necessary to have these fastened in a manner that admits of detaching them when the inevitable day of their being consigned to the wash-tub arrives. The very smallest of safety pins are of commendable value for this purpose, and by fastening them inside the bodice or drapery they are rendered invisible.

The handles of many new parasols are quite too absurd: lobsters' claws of the brilliant "boiled" color, snail shells, ocean shells, Japanese idols, smiling dogs and grinning monkeys' faces, and quaintly carved effigies of every description being utilized. Some of the parasols are finished with a looped arrangement at the top, which admits of their being slung around the waist. This is a sensible and convenient appendage, as a sun-shade when furled is most generally in the way, particularly when shopping or looking up small change in a crowded 'bus or street car. They are also less liable to loss, as it is the most common matter to leave a parasol on the seat or counter when making a tour of the shops or when leaving a cab or stage.

There are some very pretty soft materials shown designed especially for lawn-tennis costumes, among which are flannels striped in pale, delicate colors, on dove, silver, pale yellow, or crimson grounds. These are tastefully and most becomingly trimmed with the new worsted lace. One dress in Gretchen style was made of superfine white flannel, striped with pale blue and trimmed with white lace, dotted with blue of the same tint. Another gown of cream-white basket flannel was handsomely finished with elaborate pleatings of cream-white Yak lace. Turkish toques, made of surah, and matched to the shade of the lace trimming or the color of the stripe, are en suite, and another color-note is the hose which also correspond. The tennis flannels are as light as cambric, and as cool and comfortable as veiling.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Small Economies.

There was a time when farmers were forced to study the small economies of the farm and household, and to provide for domestic use all those small things which were needed, as wool for yarn and yarn for hose, broomcorn for their own brooms, maple syrup and fat beef, bacon, wheat for flour and bread, not forgetting at times some flax, which, home prepared and spun and woven, made the everlasting grain bags and the sheets and towels. Then a visit to the store was a rare event, and the long, yearly bills which now amaze the careless farmer when the New Year comes around were happily unknown. And then came a time of wealth and waste; when farm produce brought enormous prices, and money which easily came as easily went, and the household industries were cast aside. Then, too, followed in due time the Sheriff, and the homestead, dear to the family, went into the hands of strangers. But the new habits were hard to break, until a reign of low prices has come which enforces the most rigid economy and seems to bring us face to face with these conditions which prevailed thirty years ago when there was fully as much domestic comfort and more real happiness than there is now, when the farmer buys more than he sells.—N. Y. Times.

MUTTON AND MERINOS.

The Two Factors Which Render Sheep-Raising Profitable.

Sheep husbandry would not be profitable if we saved the fleece only. Mutton and wool are the combined object we seek. But as we once before stated the larger the surface the larger the quantity of wool; and thus far certainly the argument is on the side of size. What argument can be urged against it? That it requires more food to keep a large than a small sheep? Without saying and proving more than this, it is no argument at all. Does it cost more to keep a large sheep than the profits which its returns compensate for, is the question. As to the difference between the amount of food consumed by two sheep of different sizes the opinion must be largely speculative. Indeed, we can not see how a definite rule could be fixed, for all sheep of one size do not make the same economical use of food. One may assimilate perfectly, and another may not. It is true that the digestion and powers of assimilation of the sheep are very strong, and may be said to be almost universally nearly perfect. Still there is a difference, and may be more difference than we are able to see. But we do not believe that a large Merino eats more than it pays for; in fact, we do not believe that the difference is worth considering. At the Michigan Sheep Breeders' Association last year—we noticed it at the time—it was stated that a French flockmaster had demonstrated that a heavy sheep shearing seventeen pounds of wool ate twice as much as a light sheep shearing sixteen pounds of wool. As between two individual sheep this might be true, but as we understand the statement, it was that the Frenchman found this to be true throughout a flock; and if that is the statement, though it may prove nothing to say we do not believe it, still we say it. The principle in regard to large cattle is equally applicable to sheep, viz., that it does not make any difference how large an animal is, if it is symmetrically developed, compact in form. A speaker at the convention referred to recognized this principle, though he did not comprehend it. He advocated a sheep of medium size and compact form, evidently believing that we could not secure compactness if we went beyond the size stated. But we all know that this is not true, for we see large compact animals every day. An angular sheep is not more desirable than an angular steer. Such an animal will eat, and eat, but will take on fat very slowly, if it does at all. The system will utilize that part of the food consumed which makes bone and muscle, or enough of it to keep the bones and muscles in full strength, and will excrete the fat-producing elements. It is a waste of resources to feed such an animal fat producing foods. If they are useful for other purposes than meat production, they should be fed the non-fat-forming foods as long as they can be made to serve the purposes for which they are kept, and then be got rid of in the easiest way. If there is no other purpose in keeping them than meat production, everyone must judge for himself what he will do with them. As to the sheep, the bone and muscle of the angular animal will secure the nourishment, to the detriment of the fleece to some extent. But if we had a sheep that was symmetrically developed it would not be objectionable if it was as large as an elephant. In this country, where we have so much feed that we desire to convert into greater than its original value, what we particularly want is an animal that will consume all that it will give an account of.

It is fortunate for all but few thoughtful breeders will agree with the gentleman to whose remarks we have referred. Unless there is some special reason of a selfish character for a different advocacy, all breeders will advocate large sheep. As one gentleman said at Lansing, the champion shearer of the world was a large sheep. When a man has a family of high pedigreed Merinos that are small, he will advocate small sheep, of course; and he is pretty nearly the only man who does. This was shown by the results of the attempt at this convention to determine the idea of the members of the association in regard to the size of a stock ram. Those who believed that one hundred and thirty pounds, independent of fleece, was the proper size, were asked to stand up, but none responded. The same request with reference to a hundred and forty pounds met with no response. A hundred and fifty pounds drew four to their feet, and six thought that a hundred and sixty pounds would be satisfactory. But already the reader, who knows that many high-priced merinos will not come up to these higher weights, have begun to wonder how the owners of such could consent to be put on record as favoring large sheep. This was the thought that came to us as soon as we began to read the report. Well, they would not be put on record. The four who voted for 150 pounds, of course, had rams of that weight, and those who stood up for 160 had rams of that size. But when those who believed 170 pounds were indicative of the proper size, the convention remonstrated against being put on record upon such a matter, and we think very properly, for the merit of an animal, as already stated, depends upon other things than size. At the suggestion of 170 pounds, some one stated the requirements in the animal in a nutshell, as we have stated it above: a sheep could not be too large, or, as the speaker put it, "scarcely too large," if balanced up with other good qualities.—Western Rural.

—The annual report of the Ohio Agricultural Experiment Station urges the preservation and maintenance of forests, and says this concerning wood lands: "The first step should be to remove all worthless varieties, and to encourage the valuable sorts to take their place. Stock should not be allowed to run in wood lots for purpose of forage; there should be a careful guard against fire; seeds should be planted in vacant places of such varieties as are most desirable; shoots of inferior varieties should be kept down and valuable sorts should be trimmed up, so that they may grow tall, forming trunk rather than branches."—Cleveland Leader.

SHAH AND PHONOGRAPH.

His Majesty's First Experience With Edison's Talking Machine.

During the Shah's visit to Earl Brownlow he was shown the mysteries of Edison's phonograph by Colonel Gouraud. Colonel Gouraud made a little speech to the Shah, saying that if his Imperial Majesty would prolong his travels to America he would be afforded as splendid and hearty a welcome there as had been extended to him in this, the great mother country. All this was translated to the Shah by Prince Malcom Khan, and indented upon the phonograph. Then the speech was wound of as pronounced in Persian by the Prince, whereat the Shah smote his palms together and cried: "Oh, oh," and "Wonderful!" Anxious for more, his Imperial Majesty bade the poet of the suite recite some verses from the great Persian poet Hafiz into the receiver. Out came in due course from the phonograph the verses of Hafiz, with the exact intonation of the speaker, which caused the Shah anew to clap his hands and express the utmost surprise. One thing led to another. He spoke into the instrument himself, Prince Albert Victor did the same, and Lady Browning followed. Then the Duke of Abercorn said something, there was laughing, crying and whistling, and, finally, the band played a tune at it, all of which in due succession were afterward reeled off, to the astonishment of the Shah and his suite. A pause ensued, and his Imperial Majesty laid his hand upon the machine, and Prince Malcom Khan, speaking for his sovereign, said: "The Shah would like to have that instrument, or one like it." "It is his," said Colonel Gouraud. "But," said the Prince, "he knows it is a new one, and the only one you have of its kind in Europe." "All the same it is his Imperial Majesty's, as though there were many more," said the astute and courtly American. "Then the Shah will take it at once to Teheran, and he would like to get some one to go with him to work it," further interpreted the Prince.—London Telegraph.

ONE WESTERN GIRL.

She Has Something to Show for Her Six Years' Labors.

Miss Lizzie Duffield, who has spent the last six years in South Dakota, was among the first young ladies to brave the hardships of claim life and take up land in Dakota, and she is now the fortunate owner of 320 acres of excellent farm land, half of which is a short distance from Harold, Hyde County. The other quarter section is near the thriving town of Fulkton, and all of which will certainly be valuable property in time. All the adventures of life far out upon the prairie, with the nearest neighbor a mile and a half distant, the perils in storm and flood, and the danger of living alone for weeks at a time, have been undergone. She was one of those brave and resolute Dakota school teachers who, with a few pupils under her care, encountered the awful storm of January, 1888. During the long night which followed the dreadful blizzard, with scant fuel, she kept herself and the children from freezing only by the utmost exertion, until all were rescued from their fearful situation at 5 o'clock the next morning. Miss Duffield has gained an enviable reputation as a teacher.—Chicago Journal.

The Vale of Chamouni.

Chamouni, or Chamonix, is a beautiful valley lying between the Grain and Pennine Alps, in France. It is about thirteen miles long by two broad, and is 3,400 feet above the sea level. It is bounded on the south by the Mont Blanc chain of Alps, from which enormous glaciers or rivers of ice slide down, even in summer, almost to the bottom of the valley. One of these large glaciers expands, some distance above the valley, into a great mountain lake of ice, known as the Mer de Glace, in the midst of which there is a solitary island, known as Le Jardin, which in summer is covered with herbage or flowers. Winter in Chamouni Valley lasts from October to May and is very severe, but the brief summer is quite warm. The soil of the valley, though naturally barren, when carefully cultivated yields good grain and fruit. Flowers also abound, and the rearing of bees is one of the industries of the valley. There are several villages in the valley and an estimated population of about 2,000. The inhabitants are engaged in fancy carving, in spinning and weaving, in the raising of bees for the honey, and the herding of cattle. As a summer resort the valley was but little known until 1741. It is now visited by thousand of tourists every season. The views of the mountains from the valley are peculiarly fine.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

—The Paris landlords and restaurant-keepers are gathering in a rich harvest. A guest at a restaurant called for the proprietor and said: "Your prices are very peculiar. A week ago I dined here and paid fifteen francs. Here is the bill. To-day I have had precisely the same dishes, and you charge me nineteen francs. Here is the second bill." The proprietor examined the bills and said: "I am very much obliged to you for calling my attention to this matter. The first bill was evidently a mistake, so you will please hand over four francs more."—Texas Siftings.

—Two ladies were sitting by an open window while the choir was practicing in a neighboring church. "How loudly they sing to-night!" said one. "Yes," returned the other, thinking of the crickets in the grass, "and it is said they do it with their hind-legs."—Youth's Companion.

FACTS ABOUT REPTILES.

Some of the Popular Errors as to Serpents and Their Ways.

King Solomon acknowledged that there were "three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not," and one of these was "the way of a serpent upon a rock," and for years the mode of progression of a snake remained to men of science as much a mystery as it was to Solomon. It is thought the absence of limbs is a great disadvantage to snakes, but the fact is their ribs take the place of limbs, so that, instead of having two pairs they sometimes have over two hundred. Aristotle thought they had as many ribs as there are days in the month, but in fact the number varies and reaches four hundred in pythons. Mr. Furguson once followed a large snake and found a smart walk sufficient to keep up with it. Nor do snakes exercise any fascination over their victims. Pepys alleged that they ejected poison on larks in full flight so that they fell into their mouths; but in fact chickens, rats, guinea pigs, rabits, hens show no fear of snakes when given to the latter in a cage. A hen has been known to roost on a python, and one has been known to peck at a snake's tongue in motion, evidently taking it for an insect or worm. When it has killed its prey either by constriction or poison, the snake is supposed to salivate or lubricate the meal by means of its tongue. This is not the case, as the tongue is too small to lubricate the tiniest bird. The snake moves its head about the prey, feeling with its tongue for the right part to begin upon, and when that is in its mouth, but not till then, the salivary glands begin to aid deglutition. The functions of a snake's tongue have also been the subjects of popular error. Job speaks of the viper's tongue slaying one, and Shakespeare is full of similar remarks. The tongue is really a very delicate organ of touch, for the eyes are so placed that the snake can not see in front or below, and by means of its tongue it literally feels it way. The stories of two-headed snakes owe their origin to the existence of a species—bungarus fasciatus—which possesses an abrupt rounded tail that is sometimes mistaken for a second head. The popular notion that every snake is poisonous is, of course, absurd, but the proportion of poisonous to harmless snakes is much less than is generally supposed. In India only one genus in ten is poisonous, and the same proportion is probably accurate as to individuals also. In all Southern India there are only twelve kinds of poisonous snakes, the largest being the hamadryad, which reaches fifteen feet in length. A bite from one of these would probably produce death in three minutes; it has the reputation of being fierce and ready to attack on the slightest molestation. The cobra is timid; the charmers who play a pipe in front of it do not attract it by the music, for it is nearly deaf, but by the movement from side to side, which is followed by the snake. The bites of some species of poisonous snakes are not fatal at all, and merely produce a little pain and swelling of the injured member.—N. Y. Times.

THE PRAIRIE SHRIMP.

A Southern Writer Tells Western Farmers How to Utilize Grasshoppers.

The grasshopper plague in Minnesota has assumed so serious a character that the farmers around St. Paul have decided to pay $1 a bushel for the insects, in order to stimulate the efforts for their destruction. In Venezuela, recently, a prize of $4,000 was offered to any body who would invent a means of profitably converting locusts into grease or any other useful article. We can not claim originality for the idea, but why not adopt the Indian system? The aboriginal farmers of the plains, we have been told heretofore, do not regard the grasshopper as an unqualified evil. When their wheat crops grow undisturbed by these insects the Indians eat the wheat after it has been prepared in the usual way. When the grasshoppers come and eat the wheat, however, the Indians eat the grasshoppers. In this way they are always sure of a good crop of one kind or the other, and are happy in any event.

There is authority for the statement that fried grasshoppers are not unpalatable, the testimony of white men who have dined on them being that they have a "rich, nutty taste," not unlike peanuts, or something of that sort, and that the most squeamish person would enjoy them if served up in batter or under some other name. We do not care to press the subject too far, but why not give the frisky visitors a chance to redeem their reputation by transferring them from the field to the kitchen—from the furrow to the frying pan? The Indian holds the oyster and shrimp in scorn, and his, we know, is a blind and unreasonable prejudice. Why not learn from him at the same time that we teach him to esteem our delicacies? Let our friends in Minnesota, then, name the grasshopper the "prairie shrimp," for instance, and gather him in and make the most of him.—Charleston News.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.....1889

George H. Pendleton died at Brussels last Sunday evening. He was aged 64 years. He was nominated for Vice-President in 1864 on the ticket with George B. McClellan; the ticket was run on the issue that the was a failure; the war wasn't but the ticket was. Mr. Pendleton was an honorable man and had the respect of his political opponents.

The revolution in Brazil appears to be entirely successful. The change has been effected as easily as a change of administration by an election in the United States. This is proof of the mild and wise rule of Dom Pedro. There had been no tyranny, and consequently there was no vengeance to be wrecked on anybody.

There is not an evil of bad government in the world but exists simply because of the supiness of the people who are wronged. Successful tyranny and all the wrong inflicted upon great numbers of people succeed by the impudence of the wrong-doers and the indolence of the wronged. A few daring schemers demonetized silver in the United States, though it is undeniable that a very large majority of the people have at all times been opposed to such a wrong. Through all the years since this nefarious deed was accomplished there has been complaint of the outrage, but the few who gained at the expense of the many went on to gather their ill-gotten gains in complete security. Now when it is evident that the injured people are about to put forth their strength to right the wrong, silver at once begins to have its true value, and all the fine reasons offered by the bankers for demonetizing silver are proven to be nothing but a tissue of falsehoods. No people need suffer a single day from bad legislation or bad government if they have the intelligence and the will to assert and maintain their own rights.

The following memorial will be presented to Congress. It is worth careful reading; it shows how labor is paid in other countries.

We, your memorialists, citizens of the United States, engaged in the industry of horticulture and citrus fruit growing in the State of California, in view of the probable readjustment of the present tariff at the ensuing session of Congress, do most earnestly and respectfully call your attention to the following facts and figures:

The citrus fruit industry, although yet in its infancy, gives employment and remuneration to many thousands of American citizens as proprietors of orchards and employees, and nearly 3000 carloads or 900,000 boxes were the past season transported by rail to various portions of the United States. One dollar and twenty-five to one dollar and fifty cents per box for ordinary good seedling oranges delivered on board the cars at the various citrus producing centers is perhaps a fair average price, and as low a rate as will fairly compensate the producer, and enable him to pay such wages as a free-born American laborer is justly entitled to demand. It is therefore with the greatest apprehension that we look upon the increasing production, and shipments of oranges and lemons by foreign countries to our markets—notably Mexico, where, owing to the fact that lands are worth but a nominal price and are held by a few great proprietors, that under their peculiar system of peonage, labor is readily procurable for the pitiful sum of 10 or 12 cents per diem, and that citrus fruits grow almost spontaneously, they can and will in the very near future, enter into such a deadly and ruinous competition with us that we shall necessarily be compelled to abandon our orchards and eke out a miserable existence some other way.

In Sonora and adjacent Mexican States, with their system of landholding and unpaid labor, they can and will deliver oranges and lemons on board the cars at the rate of ten cents per box, whenever competition shall have become sufficiently sharp and keen to demand it. The present tariff is but 25 cents per box, and $1.60 per 1000 loose. By shipping choice large oranges loose, 1000 would fill from 10 to 12 boxes, consequently they would pay duty of only 13 1-3 to 16 cents per box, and that for the most choice fruit. This would make them cost free on board the cars from 23 1-3 to 26 cents per box, and with such rates, unless the tariff is revised in our favor, we shall soon inevitably have to compete.

Although labor in the countries bordering on the Meditterranean is but poorly paid, land is so high that their competition cannot prove so destructive to our interests, yet with the low rate of freight by steamers and sailing vessels, it is sufficiently threatening to demand, in the interest of a large portion of intelligent and patriotic American citizens, a material advance in the rate of duty upon all citrus fruits.

We therefore most earnestly ask that, instead of the present inadequate protection given us, a duty of not less than 50 cents per box, or $5 per thousand loose, shall hereafter be imposed upon all oranges and lemons imported into the United States from any foreign country. All of which is respectfully submitted for your earliest and most earnest consideration.

The story that comes from London of the nameless and shameless depravity recently brought to light there, ought to set people to thinking about the best education for the young. All the men implicated in this horrible exposure were educated in the best schools in England; they are all rich, or the sons of rich men, and had studied at Eaton or Harrow, Cambridge or Oxford. If scientific and classical studies are all that human beings need to make them virtuous and noble, then these men ought to have been models of all that is manly and good. The exposure of their acts shows that they are as depraved and degraded in character as the most ignorant and brutal of uneducated men. The education that raises human beings above vice and trains them to self-control cannot be secured by the most careful training, the most diligent study of science and literature. More than this, the most extensive knowledge of those things will only make a person of vicious tendencies and ill-regulated mind all more proficient in evil. The parent or guardian of any young person falls far short of what duty requires if nothing more is done than securing for the child or ward a good secular education. The lives of men and women are controlled in far greater measure by the heart than by the head; it is impulse rather than reason that determines the greater part of human action. Hence the failure of secular education to make true and noble men and women; and hence is moral training a necessary part of education. Moral training is but another name for faith in God and respect for his law and for the rights of our fellow creatures; no education is worthy of the name if these are neglected. But the most fruitful source of human depravity is idleness; all of these men who were detected in their shameful depravity were brought up and lived in idleness. Had they been trained to the practice of some useful calling they had not now been covered with shame. This is the unvarying experience of all countries and of all ages; an idle class is always prolific of depravity and every form of wickedness. It was not in vengeance but in love and infinite wisdom that the decree went forth "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Society for its own preservation may yet be forced to provide that no class shall be permitted to live in idleness, except such as are idiotic or insane, or those who are physically unable to engage in any useful occupation.

The new States may teach the older ones how to reform the jury system so that it may secure justice in the trial of criminals, instead of affording them a chance to escape the punishment they deserve, as it is but too often the case under the present jury system. Washington and the two Dakotas, if we are not mistaken, have put into their constitutions a clause that three-fourths of a jury shall be sufficient to render a verdict. The science of "jury fixing" is so perfect that any criminal who can buy one juror may escape conviction. There have been recent cases in this State, where after repeated trials of a criminal and clear proof of his guilt, the District Attorney has moved for a dismissal of the case because the jury failed to agree at every trial. Failures of justice will be frequent so long as one man may prevent a verdict.

Since the building of the first transcontinental railroad nothing of so great importance to the Pacific Coast has been undertaken as the Nicaragua Canal. The completion of this work will vastly increase the commerce of our own State, and with this increase will come vast increase of population and wealth. There will be three or more harbors on our southern coast including San Diego, San Pedro and Redondo, where fleets of vessels will come and go, carrying a commerce worth millions of dollars. All this will greatly hasten the development of all the vast resources of California. The work of building the Canal is already being pushed with a vigor and skill that will teach the world what Americans can do.

The New York Court of Appeals has decided that it is in accordance with the Constitution to pass a law limiting the price that may be charged for handling grain at a grain elevator. The elevator was built by private capital, and the ground on which it stands is private property, but the Court holds that it is lawful to prevent capitalists from making unreasonable profits for any service done to the public. This is sound doctrine and if the application shall be extended it will solve many difficulties.

The Los Angeles Express says: "Consolidated Utah roads are building from Milford, in Southern Utah, almost in a bee-line for Los Angeles. Mr. Bogue, Chief Engineer of the Union Pacific, says his company is backing them. Mr. Bogue came to Barstow from Milford by wagon, looking at the country, and then came on here and looked at harbors on the coast. A railroad is coming through to this city from Salt Lake, and coming soon."

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.....1889

Bar silver is quoted at 96¼.

Mr. E. F. Hall has left Keeler and gone to Virginia City to live.

Mr. S. P. McKnight, County Surveyor, was in town several days this week.

There are 58,999 post offices in the United States and Territories.

Mr. A. O. Collins was down from Warm Springs at the beginning of the week.

John Anton and Peter Meyer was up from Keeler and spent Thanksgiving in in town.

Mr. C. H. Parsons, of Round Valley, and Miss Jessie Parsons are visiting at Independence.

Mr. Scovil will preach at the school house at Camp Independence next Sunday at 2:30 o'clock p. m.

Congress meets on Monday. What chiefly concerns the Pacific Coast is the action that may be taken on silver.

Mr. C. W. Rathbourn took charge of the Lone Pine school last Tuesday as teacher. He had taught one term at Big Pine.

Mr. Charles Stewart, of Big Pine, gives notice of two he asses now in his possession as estrays. See the notice in another column.

Seventy bars of lead—silver bullion were shipped from Cerro Gordo this week. Most of the metal was got from the old furnace, which has been taken down.

Charley Levy came down from Bishop at the beginning of the week and stayed in town a few days. He will send twenty head of horses to Fresno in a few days.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr has arranged to have religious services at the school house at Georges Creek. Next Sunday the first service will be held at 2:30 p. m. Everybody is invited to attend.

Galen M. Fisher, who was Superintendent of mines near Owens Lake about 1869–70, died last Saturday at Oakland. He was aged 63 years. He left a great deal of valuable property.

Very valuable discoveries of gold are reported in White Pine County, Nevada. It is said that A. R. Watson, the discoverer of one of the ledges, has been offered and refused $300,000 for his mine.

Mr. J. D. Harger, a member of the Board of Supervisors, over his own signature and in his own way, defends the action of the Board in the matter of County Printing. His communication appears in another column.

A land contest case has been on trial at the Land Office several days this week. George A. Mead contests the desert entry of Davison M. Geiger. The land in question is near Bishop. Mr. P. W. Forbes is attorney for Mead and Mr. A. R. Conklin for Geiger.

Last Sunday evening Abraham Jones, an old politician of Virginia City, put a bullet through his own head. He was aged about 60 years and did not like to be dependent upon his children for support. A man had better be dead than dependent.

Mr. J. H. Roberts of San Francisco was in Owens Valley most of last week. He has gone on a long trip through Saline Valley and thence to Panamint and on to Death Valley. When leaving Independence last Saturday he expected to return at the end of about three weeks.

Robert Bonner arrived in San Francisco last Sunday to see his world beating mare Sunol. Buying a pig in a sack is the old way of describing a foolish bargain, but Bonner gave a fortune for an animal he had never seen. He says he will let Sunol stay in this State a year and then he will take her to New York.

It is stated that the Gold Hill mines are to be pumped out to the 2700 level. Parties allege that when the mines were allowed to fill up with water to the level of the Sutro tunnel, high grade ore had already been discovered. The reopening of the lower levels will greatly increase business on the Comstock.

Mr. Horace Bellows came up from Hawai at the beginning of the week with one hundred head of fat Angora goats for Bishop. Mr. Bellows has a standing order from a San Francisco butcher for five hundred head of these animals each week; but the difficulty of transportation hinders filling the order. The meat is in great demand in San Francisco.

It is asserted, with appearance of good authority, that the projected railroad from Salt Lake to Los Angeles will be pushed through to the latter city inside of two years. Railroad people say contracts have already been let and work being built building the road to Pioche, Nevada. The air is full of other rumors about railroads, but we have had an abundance of these the past year or two, and the last may not be any better founded than all the rest.

Last week the Grand Jury of Los Angeles indicted H. H. Boyce, the editor of the Tribune, on a charge of blackmail. It is alleged that the accused told a certain citizen of Los Angeles certain stories very damaging to his character would be published unless he paid $250. Part of the money was paid and then the victim went to the authorities and gave the information that led to the indictment. Mr. Boyce may be able to clear himself of the charge.

The importance of fruit raising is being better understood and orchards are increasing all over Owens Valley. About Bishop not less than twenty thousand apple trees will be set out the coming spring. Young trees can be deliverd at Bishop at a cost not to exceed three dollars per hundred, when large orders are given. This can be accomplished by several buyers sending for their trees in one order.

It is reported that a strong flow of natural gas has been struck close to Los Angeles City. Should this prove true there will at once be such a "boom" there as would far exceed that of a year or two ago. With an abundance of cheap fuel, whether it be gas or coal, Los Angeles is certain to become a great manufacturing city in a very few years, and this would make it a market for all the farm and orchard products of California east of the mountains, and also for all the beef and mutton produced there and in Western Nevada.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AND CHRONIC KICKERS.

BISHOP, Nov. 25, 1889.

EDITOR INYO INDEPENDENT,

Dear Sir:—For the last five years there has been an annual kick about the County Printing. It has been the custom of the Board to lump off a certain class of County Printing by contract, such as the delinquent tax list, the Auditor's and Treasurer's reports, the Supervisors proceedings and election notices. For all of this class of work was let last year for the small sum of $125—which is a nominal sum. Some three years ago the Board let this class of printing by the square and I think it cost the county about $600. Both papers would publish the same matter and present bills for the same.

The Board did not think the county was able to support two papers and as it was imperative on the Board to nominate or designate a county official paper, the high distinction was given to the INYO INDEPENDENT. Then the Editors of the Register set up a long loud wail that was heard all over the Academy block. But the Editors of the Register say the Board has done an illegal act by letting the County Printing by contract.

Now let us investigate. The law reads: "The Board of Supervisors shall annually fix the price of County Printing." Now that is precisely what the Board intends to do. They have already advertised for bids. We want all three county papers to compete for the County Printing, and award the contract to the lowest bidder, and then have him give bonds to perform his part of the contract, and then, and not until then, will the County Printing be fixed. So far as the job work is concerned the rates are fixed the same as last year. No one paper gets more than another for that class of work.

But, to proceed, the Register lays great stress upon the law. He says he likes to see it carried out to the very letter, and so do I. He well recollects when the Board met as a Board of Equalization he advocated the reduction of mortgages to correspond with his assessment roll; without an application from the mortgagee. They seemed to be well satisfied with their security. The writer objected to such a course of procedure. Then as an Assessor he showed his instructions, to wit: When the security is not worth the face of the mortgage then it his duty to reduce the mortgage. But, said we, read further. The law instructs you to assess property at its cash value, the same as a creditor would take from a solvent debtor. He then emphatically said "d——n the instructions," and this is the man who wants to see the law carried out to the very letter.

The Assessor has nothing to complain of. This county has been a father to him; the emoluments of office for his four years term in the aggregate has amounted to $8600; but, still he is not satisfied, he wants more county crumbs, and by-the-way, the Editor of the Index is hungry and howling for county crumbs also.

Yes, the Assessor is always hungry. At our August meeting he presented a bill for the modest sum of $50, for making up a statistical report to the State. He very well knew he had no legal claims on the county for said statistical report. Well, to make the story short, the Board rejected his bill. Then he set up another howl and maligned the Board through the columns of his estimable Family Journal—as he calls it—for taking mileage and per diem that the law allows them.

I fully appreciate his Family Journal; there are so many good things in his local columns, here is one of them. 'Taffy Tolu, Yum Yum and Sweet Fern chewing gum at the drug store." Here is another, "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup;" but as I have gone out of the baby business that no gum does not interest me much.

To resume, the kickers, the Editors of the Index and Register, personally appeared before the Board of Supervisors about two years ago to expound the law to the Board in regard to the County Printing. The Board could not see it the way they did, and then they threatened to d——m or mandamus the Board, I've forgotten which.

Now, my friends, let me give you a little wholesome advice, that is, never to kick against the pricks.

I remain your obedient servant,
J. D. HARGER.

A Strange Fact.

It may seem incredible, but it is a fact that eggs are now selling in Owens Valley that were shipped here from Iowa. It may be that our farmers cannot make it pay to feed wheat and corn to chickens and sell eggs at twenty-five to thirty-five or forty cents per dozen, but if such is the fact then the county is not worth staying in. Butter is shipped here from San Francisco and sold at sixty cents per roll. Our own farmers complain of hard times and scarcity of money. While the money taken out of our mines is sent to Iowa for eggs and to other distant places for butter and other supplies, it will continue scarce. It would surely be worth the attention of some intelligent farmer to carefully weigh the grain and other feed given to chickens and ascertain the exact cost of producing eggs. Any country will be poor that will send away money to pay for articles that could and should be produced at home. It is safe to say that the farmer who first sold the eggs in Iowa did not get to exceed one half the price charged for them by the dealers here; the cost of shipping the eggs such a great distance must be a large part of the price here. With such great odds in favor of our farmers they ought to be able to supply the home market; if they cannot the country is worthless.

Estray Notice.

I have taken up for trespass, two horses, not castrated. One is mouse-colored with black markings on the legs, the other is much lighter in color, with white legs and belly; neither of them are branded. The owner is requested to prove property, pay charges for keeping and advertising, and take them away, otherwise they will be sold at public auction thirty days from date. CHARLES STEWARD.

Big Pine, Nov. 27, 1889.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with the medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Georges Creek at 2:30 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

W. T. C. Elliott.

W. T. C. Elliott has filed an affidavit in support of his application for a change of venue. The affidavit alleges that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had by reason of the great popular prejudice against the defendant. Also that a mob of about one hundred persons bought a rope and threatened to hang him the day John B. White was killed, and they would have hung him there and then had not Sheriff Gregg persuaded them that he was certain to be hanged anyway by due process of law. That at the close of the trial it was currently asserted that if the jury acquitted him he would never get out of the county alive. Charges are made that the jurors who tried him were prejudiced against him. If this charge be true what dunces his attorneys must be to let their client be tried by such jurors. The affidavit goes on to allege that all the jurors of the county have formed opinions on the guilt of the accused, some that he is unqualifiedly guilty, and some that he is surely innocent. That the prejudice against the defendant has intensified since the Supreme Court ordered that a new trial be given him, and that vituperation and abuse have since been heaped upon defendant in every way calculated to excite the prejudices of the people against him. Many other charges of a similar nature are made against the people of the county, among the rest that a mob of one hundred men or more had entered into a conspiracy to mob and take the life of defendant before he should be moved from Inyo to another county. The defendant cannot safely appear in person in Inyo county or be present in Court when this motion is made, because the excitement against him is so great as to endanger his safety and his life. Wherefore he prays that a change of venue be granted to Kern county. The whole affidavit is filled with statements and assertions that are not justified by the facts. It will be considered in Court to day—Saturday.

The Mining Bureau.

The State Mining Bureau at San Francisco has one of the finest collections of minerals in the world, and is visited daily by large numbers of people. The exhibit from each county of our own State is shown separately and is labeled with the name of the county. The exhibit from Inyo is very small and altogether unworthy of our mineral resources. If miners will send ore specimens to the office of the INYO INDEPENDENT, said specimens will be forwarded to the Bureau free of expense. There they will be labeled with the name of the donor and the mine, and will be put into handsome glass cases for exhibition. The Bureau is doing a good deal to help bring the mining resources of Inyo into notice, and the Chief of the Bureau, Mr. William J. Irelan, takes pleasure in showing our mineral exhibits to visitors and giving all the information he can. Recently an employe of the Bureau asked the Board of Supervisors to appoint him a guide to accompany him to the various mines of the county, said guide to be paid not more than three dollars per day. Mr. Irelan does not approve of this action. The Bureau gets a large appropriation from the State treasury and it is not desirable to add anything to the general taxation. Everybody in Inyo is more than willing to aid the officers of the Bureau in their work in the county, so there is no need of increased expense.

The Masonic Hall, at Independence, has been extensively repaired. A new roof put on, a new outside stair, porch and balcony. A. R. Conklin, Esq., will have his law office on the ground floor as soon as the rooms are altered and finished to suit.

Next Saturday, December 7th, will be the regular monthly meeting of the Masonic Lodge at Independence. Officers will be elected to serve for the ensuing year.

INDIANS FOUND THE CURE.

It is well known in the materia medica that the greatest remedies are compounded from the juices extracted from natural herbs. The humble child of the forest, whose untutored mind knew nothing of our advanced medical science, has nevertheless been instrumental in teaching the great doctors of this age the elementary principles of their profession. Nature and nature's God has always cared for her suffering children and provided a balm to heal all the curses that afflict mankind. The knowledge of the means come in a natural way. When the Sierra Chemical Company of this city first placed on the market their celebrated Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, they knew it to be a wonderful discovery which came directly from the Piute Indians. It was submitted to the test of practical physicians and reduced to a formula by chemical analysis. The good results of the medicine are shown by the testimonials that are constantly being received at their office, 2424 Mission street, San Francisco, and are being published daily.

FORTUNE SMILED GAILY.

How a Family, On a Small Investment Got Suddenly Rich.

A short time ago a number of ladies, of one family, at Hollister, in this State formed a club, the purpose of which was to woo Dame Fortune to smile upon them. With this view they jointly purchased a one-twentieth part of ticket No. 87,835, in the Louisiana State Lottery, and with fluttering expectation awaited the drawing. On the 15th of August last they were almost thrown into joyful hysterics over the news that No. 87,835 had drawn the capital prize. The ticket was placed in the hands of Wells, Fargo & Company, at Hollister, to whose agent, J. G. Shaw, the Anglo-California Bank of this city paid $15,000, which Mr. Shaw paid to the following ladies forming the club: Mrs. Emma Shaw, Mrs. William Shaw, Mrs. Geo. E. Shaw, Mrs. Rody Shaw, Mrs. B. F. Gould, Mrs. Etta Sowels, Mrs. S. E. Moore, Mrs. Wm. Wallace, Mrs. James A. Kearney, Miss Laura Roach, Miss Nellie Powers, Miss Susie Moore, Mrs. A. D. Shaw, Mrs. J. H. Shaw, Mrs. Robert Shaw, Mrs. E. G. Camplin, Mrs. L. T. Baldwin, Mrs. J. M. Black, Mrs. N. C. Briggs, Mrs. M. Speigle, Miss Hattie Backus, Miss Ella Davis, Miss Maggie Meade and Miss May Mahoney.

Dame Fortune did not stop with these ladies, but smiled also upon San Francisco, where a gentleman, who refuses to allow his name to be made public, held another twentieth part of No. 87,835, and who, on the presentation of the same to the Anglo-California Bank, had his worldly stores increased to the extent of $15,000 in gold.—San Francisco, (Cal.) Examiner, Sept. 20.

"In 1887 my son, 7 years old, had a white swelling come on his right leg below the knee, which became very much swollen and painful, and contracted the muscles so that his leg was drawn up at right angles. Physicians failed to help him materially, and I considered him

A Confirmed Cripple.

I was about to take him to Cincinnati for an operation, expecting his leg would have to be taken off, and began giving him Hood's Sarsaparilla in order to get up his strength. The medicine woke up his appetite and soon pieces of bone were discharged from the sore. We continued with Hood's Sarsaparilla as it seemed to be doing him so much good, and the discharge from the sore decreased, the swelling went down, the leg straightened out, and in a few months he had perfect use of his leg. He now runs everywhere and apparently is as well as ever." JOHN L. MCMURRAY, Notary Public, Ravenswood, W. Va.

"What—not kiss the baby?" she laughed gayly. "Such a pretty baby, too; why it really has complexion and eyes like Bertha's." She did not cease to look at his shrinking face. "But its mouth and chin"— Something made him look at the baby's features as she mentioned them, and then he shuddered; it was too terrible, "are more like somebody else I know." Her small, flashing black eyes seemed burning their way to his very brain. "Who is it?" She bent toward him so that her hot lips seemed almost to kiss his ear. "Curran," she whispered. Could he not tear himself away from her poisonous breath? "Not so strange, though?" She let the baby put its chubby hands into his hair, though she saw every touch was a thrust through the quivering fibers of his heart. She fancied he did not understand, he was so still and silent. "Not strange that a child should look like its—father."

Had the young bridegroom forgotten all about his wedding and the beautiful woman up stairs wondering why she was not called? It seemed so, for he sat down, and they foisted the pretty baby on him, and his face wore a ghastly smile as he looked at it. Once, at an expression in the little face, he caught it to his lips, but as suddenly he thrust the child into the nurse's lap and rose to his feet.

"What are we waiting for?" His face was like marble for firmness, and it seemed as dead.

Jane drew him quickly into the hall. "You are not going to marry the mother of that"——

"Hush," and her woman's soul quailed at the look he bent on her. "If you dare to whisper a word to Bertha, or show her that child"——

"I thought you would thank me," whispered the false lips. She saw it was all in vain—her journey to Vineboro. She had followed Bertha's tracks like a bloodhound, and had found her fatherless child in a stranger's home, learning to forget its high bred mother. Now surely she must suffer repulse and disdain as the poor factory girl had suffered it—in her very wedding dress. For the sight of this baby face would chill the most ardent love that ever burned in a bridegroom's heart. But no. This man's love was deeper than the sentiment and vanity that commonly makes the chief part of what is absurdly called passion. His faith was so sublime, shame was ashamed before it.

His face had lighted up at her words. "Oh I will thank you a thou—a thousand times if you will send that woman and the child away."

He had taken her hands. "Jane, for God's sake do it."

He would have given her a fortune, but she had sold herself once, and her price was enough. He could only pray to her in all the phrases of entreaty the agonies of life have taught mankind.

"They shall leave the house at once," she said at last, as she turned to go back into the room. He thought his prayers had moved her. But she knew her plot had failed; she had wrung his heart, but his will was unmoved. She made a virtue of her necessity. Philip would be grateful to her forever, but there would be something else, perhaps. Such hate as hers could not be turned aside by so feeble a thing as pity.

"How pale you are, Philip. Are you afraid?" and Bertha smiled royally on him as she took his arm, and they passed up the hall.

"I am the happiest man in the world," and he tried to smile as his hand closed over her fingers like an iron vise, it was so cold and strong.

But how sad he was, as if an exquisite piece of sculpture that he loved had fallen from a great height and been shivered into a thousand fragments. The hope and joy of his life seemed slipping away from him. That little child's face hung between him and the bride who was promising to be faithful—if she only had been faithful to him; its baby hands seemed to shield her bosom from him, its quavering cries to reproach him for daring to kiss its mother. So small and sweet a baby, but its face seemed threatening him, its infant form linked indissolubly a past he had hoped he might forget with a present and future he had foolishly thought had a great store of happiness for him.

The minister had taken his seat. Was he really married to the golden haired woman whose hand he held to tightly? Was this the moment he had dreamed of as marking his entrance into a new ideal life? Had he said everything correctly? He could not remember, but he did not want any mistake made about this at least. Oh yes, it was now he was to kiss his wife. He held her to his heart an instant. This was his wife, but joy was dead behind his dry, feverish lips, and his smile, meant to cheer her, was as if some terrible pain was gnawing every moment at his heart. But Bertha appeared to notice nothing wrong.

The train which bore away the bridal pair had not traveled a great many miles when something caused Philip to look in the seat behind them. There sat the portly woman, with her chin at last depressed in slumber, and the baby with Bertha's eyes and Curran's mouth. One of Bertha's coils of hair had become loosened, and a braid of golden hair hung over the back of the seat as she let her head rest on her husband's shoulder. Bertha's eyes were closed drowsily, the nurse in the seat behind nodded in her dreams, but the child reached out its baby hands to play with its mother's golden tresses. The young husband watched the child's lips forming again and again one word, "mamma," the wife fell asleep and dreamed she was the happiest woman in the world, while beneath her head every throb of the man's heart was an ache.

CHAPTER XXVI.

ONE SHORT HOUR.

It was a week later that the Breton barouche came over the brow of the hill toward Mr. Ellingsworth's house. The bay span never stepped so proudly, and certainly the gold plated trimmings on their harness never glittered so brightly before. As the carriage had passed through the lower village the factory girls had all rushed to the windows to see the master and his bride, and for the moment the laborers on the foundations of the new mill stopped their work in one accord, and were all eyes till the bridal couple were out of sight. Philip's face was fairly radiant with hope and love, and he could not teach his eyes to look anywhere but at Bertha. She glanced idly on either side, at the white gloved coachman on his high seat or at the prancing horses, anywhere but into the earnest, tender face, which might have been a constant reproach to her calm indifference.

Clearly enough, the clouds that had settled so gloomily about his wedding night had lifted; his love and the sweet reality of his present life and his new sense of duty toward the woman who now called him husband, all helped him to put away her past, even to its most terrible incident, and his healthful mental nature was rapidly building up a new life which should have no taint in it. Philip Breton made a noble lover. Perhaps it was because he was not a great man. He was not so wise but that he believed in the reality of the sunbeams poets make their love songs of. He had many holy aspirations; he caught now and then glimpses of ideal beauty and truth. In some vague way he fancied all these were realized in Bertha. In her he loved all the harmonies. In her he worshiped purity and charity and all the graces.

As for Bertha, she continually found new surprises in his gentleness and in his devotion—surprises partly because she forgot them each time. She really wished he were not so devoted. She wished he did not make her feel as if she were forever posing in tableaux. She thought him inclined to be foolish, because he did not seem keen eyed enough to see her most obvious faults—not magnanimous enough herself to understand that he looked at her through a halo of glory his love had put about her. In spite of herself he could see something beautiful and good in everything she could do or say.

"We are just passing my home," she said, a little petulantly; "can't you see anything but me?"

"This is not your home now, my dear." He corrected her very gently. As he glanced into the windows of the parlor where they had been married, Jane Ellingsworth's dark face looked out at them, cruel and malevolent. Philip started forward in his seat. Why, no, he must have been wrong, the face in the window was wreathed in the most charming smiles. She even kissed her fingers to the bridal pair, and let a sheet of paper she had been holding flutter to the floor in her childlike enthusiasm. Bertha nodded coldly; Philip lifted his silk hat, and the carriage passed out of sight.

Philip was too wise to weary his wife just now by showing her all the changes in his home, which would delight her so much later. He knew by her drooping step, as she walked along the hall, that she was tired and would appreciate rest above all things. So he took her first to her own little sitting room, which he called her boudoir. He had rather expected a little lighting up of her eyes, perhaps some pretty exclamation of pleasure. Possibly he had made an absurd artistic blunder. Could it be he had got the wrong shade of blue after all? She only threw off her bonnet and sat down in the least inviting of the chairs without seeming to care to look about her at all.

"You must be tired, Bertha," said Philip at last, trying to hide the disappointment that made his heart swell so painfully. "Won't you sit in the easy chair? I am sure you will like it, though perhaps you would rather lie down."

"Oh, no, I am not tired," she said, carelessly, without turning her eyes to look at him where he stood, restlessly playing with the window curtains. He pulled roughly at them, he longed that moment to ruin the beauty that had failed to please her. He could not see where the fault was; the carpet was as thick and soft as a bed of violets, the light seemed delicate almost as some perfume, but Bertha did not seem to care for anything he had devised for her. She was going to speak; if she would only criticise, he would change everything again to win a smile of approval from her. She might at least understand how much he had tried to please her.

"Where does that door open?"

"I will show you if you are not tired," yet he dreaded to take her in that room, and see her as cold and indifferent as she was now. He felt it would break his heart.

She rose to her feet and looked in curiosity at him as he took a key from his breast pocket and turned it in the lock. "Is it your treasure chamber?"

"Yes," he whispered, and threw open the door, and stood back for her to enter. The room seemed as pure and white as if a thousand angels brooded over it with their snowy wings. Peace and holy rapture seemed breathing from the very walls, and the young bride felt a new timidity steal over her heart. She was awed indescribably in the temple of love he had made for her. Poor soul! would there be but one true worshiper? "Come," she said, and she smiled more sweetly than he had ever seen her. She held her hand out toward him, as he lingered on the threshold.

He came and took her hand and then put his arm about her as she stood in exquisite pensiveness, struggling to take in the meaning of the place. She had cast her eyes down on the carpet, which seemed like the driven snow, sparkling with hail drops. The solemn beauty of her chamber subdued her like a child.

"You would not dare to kiss me here, Philip," she said at last in a voice so gentle and thrilling, it seemed to his throbbing heart as if a new soul had been born within her. "It is so pure and"——

But he drew her unresisting form into his arms, and kissed her full cool lips again and again, and she did not stir on his shoulder, but her great blue eyes look a startled reproach at his ardor.

"There is no place too pure for the kisses I have for you."

There never will be an hour in Philip Breton's after life, when he shall not look back to this moment as worth all his agony, as the acme of his being, when the cup of his happiness was full. And who should overturn it? Why should he not hold it to his ever thirsty lips forever, the well spring of his love bubbling and sparkling forever within? Might not the world stand still awhile? Must it jostle him from his unwearying rapture, and push him on and on into the barren desert of failure which awaits all mankind at last?

The dinner bell tinkled invitingly, and the master and mistress of the house came down together. At the door of the dining room stood the man servant, salver in hand, and the silk skirts of the lady of the house swept against him as she passed in. Philip frowned fiercely at him, for the usually most well behaved and respectful waiter seemed to forget all his duties in staring with brazen impudence in the beautiful face of his master's wife. Philip grew pale with anger, but Bertha only gave a glance of lofty contempt at the fellow's smooth face and white apron.

"Your servants are not well behaved, my dear Philip."

In a moment more they were alone, and Philip forgot his wrath in the new picture of his wife across his table. His old lonely days were ended. No more solitary feastings. Bertha was always to brighten his house and his table for him. The satyr of bronze on the mantel that had scowled on his desolation, seemed actually smiling now. The portraits around the green tinted walls had seemed to his imagination, as he had sat down so many times to his richly furnished table, like guests at a funeral, or again, as if morosely curious how a man could violate all the principles of hospitality by dining alone. Now, he fancied, they had taken on a more genial, companionable expression. To be sure the sun poured in through the open blinds in unusual brightness, but it was the light in Bertha's blue eyes that changed everything for him. It was the beginning of his own home. This woman, who seemed too lovely to be other than a caller for an hour, had come to stay, to sit with him as she did now, whenever he breakfasted or dined or supped—always. The world might heap wrongs and outrage on him, his factories might burn and his wealth dissolve—she whose presence in itself was a perfect existence to him, had come to him to stay forever.

Bertha's face was bent over the table studying the odd device on her napkin ring. The sunlight flickered in her golden hair as tenderly as if it were giving her kisses of welcome. So she would sit before him always. But the sudden creaking of a man's boot made him look up. The waiter had come in almost noiselessly and stood at the sideboard carving a bird for their second course. Philip was glad he had not said one of the hundred caressing words that had come to his lips. But how slow he was at his carving; was the canvas back so tough, then?

Ugh! There was a glass on the sideboard, and Philip happened to glance into it. The man held the knife and fork in his hands, yet he was not carving at all, but was still staring at Bertha's bent beautiful face in the mirror, with his evil, swinelike eyes. He seemed to be studying her features, as if to recall some association. Oh, he had succeeded. A hideous grin distorted his mouth and whole face. Then Philip rose and pushed back his chair. His servant recognized his master's wife. Apparently she had played some very inharmonious part in some previous scene he had witnessed. And he was but one of the world she had disgraced herself before. What could his evil eyes have seen? Which miserable page in this lovely woman's history that her husband was trying to blot out of memory? If he could forgive her, might not the rest? Must she be subject to insult in her own home? Was he not powerful enough to protect her against the shame of such looks as this fellow gave her?

He stepped to the sideboard and touched his servant on the shoulder and beckoned him to the door. The malicious grin had hardly time to vanish from the frightened face.

"Go!" the words came hissing from his master's lips, "and if I ever see your face again, or if you ever breathe a word against the woman I have made my wife"— The man slunk up stairs like a whipped dog.

"Why, I didn't notice you had been out," said Bertha in mild surprise as Philip re-entered the dining room. "Were you ill? How pale you are."

But she did not rise in her solicitude and come to him. Instead he came to her, and bending very gently over her tried to kiss away the lines of care on her white forehead which he had never caused. He did his best to smile gayly, and succeeded well enough to deceive her.

"I will be your servant to-day," he said, "with no profane eyes to look on."

Then he shook off his unhappiness by sheer force of will, and began to talk lover's nonsense to the cold mistress of his home in more perfect abandon than ever, even in the exuberance of his youth. He must be happy while he could, he dared not stop talking, lest he should think too much. But she only looked at him in far off surprise, with now and then a curious, not quite pleased smile, at his absurdities. At last, all too soon, she arose.

"I must go and dress and try and look a little prettier, for today at least." She touched his shoulder kindly as she passed out into the hall, leaving him sitting still at table.

It was only then that he discovered a letter that had been concealed by a plate. What did he care for business today? Still it might serve to pass a little of the time till his wife should return. How the thought of her warmed his heart. In a few moments the door behind him would open, and he would turn to see her graceful form on the threshold. She would be dressed in some new color, or perhaps in the black that gave her the air of a dethroned queen. By this time she must have thought of some kind thing to say to him, but first it would be:

"Go!"

"Sitting at table yet?" Then he would rise and draw her jeweled hand through his arm and show her through her whole home. She would be so delighted with the library; he was sure everything there would please her exquisite taste. He had never enjoyed the room, though it was so perfect; there had been something dreary to him in its classic simplicity. But now everything would be changed. Then he would lead her to the drawing room, and would make her sit down again before the long silent piano, which had given out not one tone of music since her white fingers had last caressed its glistening keys. And she would play and sing for him while he dreamed of the new rare life of beauty and peace that was to be his henceforth.

He glanced at the face of the envelope; but it was not for a moment more that the mist of joy cleared from before his eyes enough to read the words stamped on its upper corner.

"John T. Giddings, attorney at law," and beneath in smaller type, "Divorces procured without trouble or publicity for any cause desired." What was he or his business to Philip Breton? He tore open the envelope patiently; probably a begging letter. He unfolded the sheet he found within. At the top in big letters the attorney's name and address; and below the advertisement about divorces again. Philip frowned and began to read what the man had written to him.

"DEAR SIR: I understand you will have just returned from your wedding journey when this reaches you. I am sorry to interrupt your bliss but it will be very important for you to call upon me immediately upon your receipt of this communication. You may wonder how my advertisement about divorces which your observant eyes will have detected at the top of this page can concern you. If you call on me at once I will be able to explain that and several other points of interest to you. Very truly yours,

JOHN T. GIDDINGS.

Philip spread the letter open on the tablecloth before him, and read it again and more carefully. He seemed very slow to take its meaning. Then he folded it very accurately and put it in his pocketbook. He rose to his feet and rang the bell for the maid. How cool he was. He showed no sign of having received a terrible blow, unless it was by passing his hand wearily across his forehead once or twice.

The clearest feeling he was conscious of was a nervous anxiety lest Bertha should come in upon him just now; and when the door opened he started violently. But it was only the maid, who had answered his summons.

"Tell your mistress," his voice was very low, but it sounded firm enough, "tell your mistress I am called away to Lockout. I shall be back by tea time—at 6, I suppose. Can you find my hat for me Jane—I mean Annie. Thank you." He pulled it well over his eyes, and walked along the hall and opened the door. He did not like to glance up the open staircase for fear he might see Bertha. He dreaded to look in her face just now. The maid stood waiting.

"Tell your mistress that I am called—oh, I told you, did I?"

Emperor William of Germany thinks of nothing but war. He conforms his habits to those of Frederick the Great, and his court at Berlin has become a camp.

Secretary Tracy is of the opinion that the "Maine," now building at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, will be completed so as to cost inside the amount appropriated by Congress for her construction ($2,500,000), and as to time, as quickly as is ordinarily done in private yards.

New Orleans has taken on a virtuous fit in the matter of gambling, and is moving to suppress everything in that line from craps among the roustabouts, to poker, loo and baccarat in the swell clubs. This is probably in the interest of the Louisiana lottery, which permits no competition.

Of my friends; couldn't you,
If you knew that from Heaven
They smiled back at you?

IT WAS JUST IN TIME.

G. C. Bartholomew, Kalkaska, Mich., says: "I located in this place five years ago, having formerly resided in Troy, N. Y. I have been a great sufferer from what the physicians of Troy called Bright's disease. I used Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y. All the terrible symptoms of the disease are gone. I have no traces of any disorder of the kidneys, liver or bladder. Who would begrudge the cost of this medicine (one dollar a bottle) for such a blessing or refuse this simple though sincere token of gratitude for being perfectly cured? I owe everything to Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, and hope this will induce others to use the medicine who suffer from any kidney, liver or blood disorder."

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

Remembrance is the only paradise out of which we cannot be driven.

to experiment with uncertain remedies, when afflicted with any of the ailments for which Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is recommended, as it is so positively certain in its curative effects as to warrant its manufacturers in guaranteeing it to benefit or cure, or money paid for it is returned. It is warranted to cure all blood, skin and scalp diseases, salt rheum, tetter, and all scrofulous sores and swellings, as well as consumption (which is scrofula of the lungs) if taken in time and given a fair trial.

A DIG IN THE RIBS,

If on the right side and lower part of the diaphragm, though playfully meant and delivered, is calculated to evoke profanity from a chappy whose liver is out of order. When that region is sore and congested, jokes seem fiendish. Look at the man's countenance ere you probe him under the ribs. If his skin and eyeballs have a sallow tinge, you may infer also that his tongue is furred, his breath apt to be sour, that he has pains not only beneath his ribs, but also under the right shoulder-blade. Also, that his bowels are irregular and his digestion impaired. Instead of making a jocose demonstration on his ribs, recommend him to take, and steadily persist in taking, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the finest anti-bilious and alterative medicine extant. Incomparable is it, also, for dyspepsia, rheumatism, nervousness, kidney trouble, and fever and ague.

Anger banishes reflection, but its consequences recall it.

But to act that each to-morrow

CATARRH HAY FEVER CATARRHAL DEAFNESS

A NEW TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result of this discovery is that a simple remedy has been discovered which permanently cures the most aggravated cases of these distressing diseases by a few simple applications made (two weeks apart) by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free by A. H. DIXON & SON, 337 and 339 West King Street, Toronto, Canada.

A PROFITABLE CROP.

How Beet Culture Can Be Made a Source of Considerable Income.

Although considered a hard crop to raise, I do not find beets so when properly managed, as nearly all the work can be done with horses, except perhaps once hoeing. We find here that they succeed best on a rich, loamy soil and we like to have it manured in the winter if possible, as the spring rains dissolve it and leave it in good condition for spring plowing, which should be done as early as possible. We drag it down and then let it lie until after corn planting, which gives the weeds and grass a chance to start. Then we take a spring-tooth harraw or a cultivator and thoroughly work it up. Three horses and a good tool in this way will kill more weeds than six will after the beets are planted, and it will give the beets the start of the weeds. We run a smoothing harrow over the lot in the opposite direction from that which we wish to sow it.

I use a grain drill to sow mine, although any good drill could be used. Horse power is much cheaper here than manual labor. We sow in rows twenty-eight inches apart, by using the middle and next to outside hoes on an eleven hoe drill, which brings it right to run the wheel in the wheel-mark coming back, setting the hoes so as to sow them about one inch and a half deep. By raising up the wheel and turning it one can adjust the speed of the feed-cups so as to drop one seed about every two or three inches. In this way it takes five or six pounds of seed per acre, which is about two pounds more than is used in drilling by hand, but we find it cheaper to cut out two plants than to transplant one. Next we roll the ground, which packs the earth around the seed and causes it to germinate quicker. When the plants are up so as to see the rows plainly, cultivate. We use the narrowest teeth, and with a good steady horse one can do good work even when the plants are quite small. After they are up two or three inches high we take sharp hoes and chop out the extra plants so as to have them eight to ten inches apart in the row, which can be done rapidly and well after a little experience. We keep the ground well stirred, as they need a warm mellow soil to do their best. We aim to cultivate them as often as once a week through the season and seldom are obliged to hoe them more than once; sometimes not at all.

We leave them in the ground as long as we can, in the fall, without danger of freezing, then take a one-horse plow and throw a furrow away from both sides of each row, running as close to the row as convenient without touching the beets. Then we pull them out and throw them into a wagon which can be driven alongside so as to be kept close at hand, drawing them directly to the pit or cellar. We top them off with a large knife as they are unloaded. They can be handled very fast in this way. We plant some of the Globe kinds, as they are much easier to harvest and nearly as productive as the large, long kinds. A barn cellar, or a pit, is the best place to store, being careful not to cover too warm and giving ventilation by placing bunches of straw in the top of the heap, projecting through the earth until cold weather. If warm, they sweat and rot. When cold weather comes we put a coat of horse manure on, which is a good covering for them. I lost one pit of about three hundred bushels last winter from covering too deep in the fall before winter set in.—Cor. Ohio Farmer.

ALL ABOUT FILES.

How to Select and Use Them—Valuable Practical Suggestions.

To choose a flat file, turn its edge upward and look along it, selecting one which has an even sweep from end to end, and having no flat places or hollows. To choose a half-round file, turn the edge upward, look along it and select that which has an even sweep and no flat or hollow places on the half-round side, even though it be hollow in the length of the flat side.

In draw-filing, take short, quick strokes, which will prevent the file from pinning and scratching. Long strokes, no matter how long the work may be, are useless, save to make scratches. Remember it is less the number of strokes given the file than the weight placed upon it that is effective; therefore, when using a rough file stand sufficiently away from the work to bring the weight of the body upon the forward stroke. New files should be used at first upon broad surfaces since narrow edges are apt to break the teeth if they have the fibrous edges unworn.

For brass work use the file on a broad surface until its teeth are dulled, then make two or three strokes of the file under a heavy pressure upon the edge of a piece of sheet-iron, which will break off the dulled edges of the teeth and leave a new fibrous edge for brass work.

Use bastard-cut files to take off a quantity of metal of ordinary hardness; second-cut in fitting, and also to file unusually hard metal; smoothing to finish in final adjustment or preparatory to applying emery cloth; dead smooth, to finish very fine work; float file on lathe work.

To prevent files from pinning, and hence from scratching, properly clean them, and then chalk them well.—American Artisan.

—The Lowell Courier is opposed to extending the summer school vacation any further. It says: "It is only within a few years that vacations have become so prominent in our educational system. There used to be a 'summer term' of school, and the vacations were all very brief. Nobody was injured by too much study, or ever thought of being. We are getting to make our schools a matter of coddling. The boys and girls who are injured by too much study are as scarce as white blackbirds."

—Joseph C. Hendrix, reviewing the history and work at the public schools of Brooklyn, in the Brooklyn Magazine, says that one of the first free schools in this country was established in Brooklyn, in 1661, by the old Hollanders. This Dutch model he finds has prevailed over the Puritan form. The first levy for school purposes in the town amounted to only twenty dollars as against one and a half millions annually levied now, to provide for a system requiring in its operation 1,446 teachers instructing 70,000 pupils in sixty-two buildings.

—Prof. Huxley affirms that if a man can not get literary culture of the highest kind out of his Bible, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, Hobbes and Bishop Berkeley he cannot get it out of anything, and he urges their study upon children. He believes the English-speaking people to be the only people who seem to think that composition comes by nature. The awakening of leading educators to the necessity of promoting the study of English in the schools has certainly been complete. Every one is in favor of it, and many colleges have already advanced it to the position it deserves.—Current.

BISMARCK SPEAKING.

Characteristic Utterances of the Iron Chancellor in the German Parliament.

During ordinary session the German Parliament presents a scene similar to a sitting of Congress. The wonted number of seats are vacant; some drowsy representatives drop forward on their desks in sweet communion with the god of dreams, the busy mass throng the aisles, buttonholing one another and demonstrating the "fallacy of the last speaker's argument;" the country member writes letters, the entire assembly is manifestly inattentive, producing as much confusion as physical faculties will furnish or the speaker's gavel permit. But there are days when this changes and stillness falls upon the tumultuous house. Such quiet fell upon the Saturday preceding the close of the present session. As I entered "Tribune B" the unwonted calm in the body of the house and the interest shown by the spectators indicated that something unusual was about to occur. People peered over the railings, rushed here and there in the boxes, stretched their necks to ostrich-like proportions in vain endeavor to see the speaker. Their actions indicated that the chancellor was present—which a nod from the porter soon certified. To hear Bismarck is a treat which does not often fall to one's lot in these days, as he appears only at rare intervals. I succeeded in wedging myself into the first row and held it the entire afternoon, not dismayed by the fact that my neighbors were socialists, nihilists and peace-breakers of the worst type. The Sunday labor question was "on the boards," and Bismarck was strongly attacked by the "opposition." The chancellor is in some respects disappointing. He is not the colossus in appearance that his photographs indicate; his head is comparatively small, and has not the bull-dog likeness attributed to it; but the iron will, the stubborn, aggressive nature shows in every line of his face. He stammers a little; the door of his verbal treasury does not always open at his bidding. He fairly gasps for a word at times, clears his throat, throws back his head, waves his arms; but when the word is found it demolishes some puny opponent. The Prince's speeches are not unadorned. They abound in classical quotations and citations from historical and philosophical works. Wit and pathos flow from his tongue with the same unchanged mien. No smile crosses his face, no line of sadness becomes apparent on his brow. His voice is not that of an old man. All the sonorous vigor of youth seems to animate it, and though indistinct it penetrates to every corner of the great room. While sitting under attack this particular afternoon he became restless, pinched the table, crossed his legs, folded his arms, and finally, picking up a huge penholder, swiftly wrote his reply.

Looking toward the President he said: "The gentleman has imputed to me the crime of repetition. I had forgotten that I had used those words before, but if I have it is only a proof of the unity of my course and policy. Perhaps, when the gentleman has reached threescore and ten, as I have, he, too, may be guilty of a like misdemeanor. Old people, as is well known, fall into the habit of repeating the same story." He spoke nervously, and the "bravos" seemed to excite him. The paper he held trembled; sometimes his right hand was thrown behind him; sometimes he twirled a golden button of his curiassier uniform or widened its yellow stock; yet withal his gestures were Websterian in their almost studied simplicity. Retaking his seat, the house again became noisy, the aisles were emptied, Bedlam reigned supreme. Again attacked, the chancellor arose the second time. Men appeared from every corridor, the sleepy ones awoke and rose from the velvety depths of the corner sofas and elbowed their way through the fast concentrating crowd; the confusion was hushed, even the nihilists in the galleries ceased their munching and pricked up their ears. Proudly and clearly, with raised head and ringing tones, Bismarck cried: "The gentleman wishes the laborer to follow him rather than the chancellor. It is natural that he should attack me—natural that he should say the time has come when I could fulfill my promises did I desire to do so; that he should say I stand with the people of Manchester on the side of the employer and not the employed; that all I have formerly uttered favoring the oppressed was hypocrisy and simulation, intended only to subserve some political purpose. I do not demand that the gentleman be just to me; but I shall say to others and to my country that he does me bitter injustice. I stand neither on the side of the employer nor of the employed. I stand on the side of this nation and her commercial prosperity, and will perform what, in my judgment (independent of desire for popularity with either party), I can defend and back with the signature of my hand!" It was a dramatic scene; for once the cold eyes flashed fire and defiance. A storm of applause greeted the outburst. "Bravo!" "Bravo!" echoed from the ranks of every division. Confident of his vindication, Bismarck closed his letter-chest, picked up his cap, and left the house as silently as he came.—Berlin Cor. N. Y. Tribune.

—The shamrock, which is the emblem of Ireland, is not known by its flower, but by its leaves; it is a little trefoil, as is clover, but is very rare in England and not common in Ireland. Bentham in his "British Flora," says that Oxalis acetocella, or wood sorrel, is the original shamrock; it has a pale pink, almost white, flower, which is said to be very plentiful in woods in April. He also states that purple Dutch clover (Trifoleum repens), which all know so well, is now accepted as the shamrock. The tradition runs that St. Patrick, when preaching in Erin, gathered a shamrock and used it to illustrate the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. From this circumstance the treefoil has become accepted as the national emblem of the Emerald Isle.

OHIO MOUND RELICS.

A Gigantic Man Buried Alongside a Colossal Panther.

Soon after the 1st of March I left for Southern Ohio to collect relics to be placed on loan exhibition in the Smithsonian Institute at Washington. During the last two months eleven large mounds have been opened and their contents taken to the museum and placed on exhibition.

These mounds vary in height from eight to thirty feet, are generally conical in shape, and contain all the way from 300 to 10,000 square yards of dirt. They were built by the aborigines of this country hundreds of years ago to serve as burial places for the distinguished dead. They are generally placed near some stream in a valley and not unfrequently on high points of land, which command a good view of the country, but the larger ones are in the valleys. These mounds are usually composed of clay, sometimes of sand, and often have layers of charcoal or burnt clay in them. These layers are often as brightly colored as if they had been painted.

The first mound opened was on rather high ground, the third river terrace. This mound was 13 feet high, 60 feet wide and 110 feet long. It took six men eight days to dig through. When about twenty feet from the eastern edge we came upon a thick layer of burned bone. This layer was six inches thick and the width of the trench. The ashes of which it was composed were either resultant from animal or human bones, we could not tell which, but at any rate, whether animal or human, it must have taken thirty or forty skeletons (if cremated) to have made that many ashes.

About five feet above this layer, or nine feet from the summit of the mound, was a skeleton of a very large individual which had buried by the side of it the bones of a panther. Whether the person had killed the panther and it was buried with him as an honor or whether the panther had killed the individual I can not say. This, much, however, can be said, that in forty-three mounds opened no find of this nature has been made. It is therefore quite interesting and important. The skull of this panther was very large, teeth very long and sharp. It would take a mound-builder of a great deal of nerve to attack a beast of this size if he had nothing but a stone hatchet and bow and arrows to defend himself with. So if he did kill the panther he is certainly entitled to a great deal of credit. Just below this skeleton and lying on the layer of buried bones was a medium-sized personage who had buried around his neck, between his upper and lower jaw, one hundred and forty-seven bone and shell beads. The shell beads were made from the thick part of couch and Pyrula shells. These shells must have been carried from the Atlantic ocean, as they are ocean shells and not found inland, or the tribe to which the man belonged may have traded with tribes near the ocean and thereby got the beads.—Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

A BENEVOLENT DOG.

He Gives Away His Own Breakfast to a Poor, Homeless Cur.

A dog in the neighborhood of Manchester has been distinguishing himself in a marked degree. This is not a homeless cur, but a dog in easy circumstances, and owned by a kind and indulgent master. Too indulgent, the reader may be disposed to think, when he is told that every morning at lunch time the creature was presented with a penny, which it carried in its mouth to the shop of a baker, and there purchased a biscuit. It happened, however, that the baker, meeting the owner of the dog, mentioned to him that he had not been for his biscuit lately. This was unaccountable, and the more so because the animal's master had remarked that during the past week or so it had exhibited unusual impatience for lunch time, endeavoring by caressing and tail-wagging to obtain the luncheon money before it was due. When it at last received it it had never failed to run off in a hurry, and after awhile returned without the coin, seemingly satisfied with its investment.

The next morning after the baker had made his communication to the gentleman, the latter, after giving his dog the penny, was curious to watch it. And lo and behold! it never went near the biscuit shop! Without an instant's delay it hastened to a tripe seller's, and there bought and paid for a neat and tempting skewering of "paunch." But it was not for its own eating. With cheerful alacrity it took the meat in its mouth and made for an empty house, and to the cellar thereof, and, being closely followed, the benevolent creature was discovered in the act of delivering its precious pennyworth to a poor, miserable tyke, a stranger to the neighborhood, and apparently of the "tramp" species. Evidently it had been taken ill on the road, and probably would have died in the cellar into which it had crawled for shelter had it not been for the kind commiseration of the other dog, who probably quite by accident had found it there.—London Globe.

BOWSER AND THE WHITEWASH.

He Tackles It in Spite of His Wife's Advice—The Result.

There were several little things I wanted done about the house this fall, and so the other week I engaged a colored man to come and work for a couple of days. It so happened that he came one morning before Mr. Bowser had left the house.

Mr. Bowser sent him away, and after the man had gone came into the house and asked:

"Did you hire a colored man?"

"Why, yes."

"What for?"

"I was going to have him whitewash the vegetable cellar, take down and clean the laundry stovepipe and do some other odd jobs."

"H'm! Mrs. Bowser, if there are any little jobs about the house I've got plenty of time to do them. In fact, I need just such exercise. Such work is a diversion for me, and the doctor recommends it."

"I wish you wouldn't do it. You'll get lime in your eyes and you'll blame me for it, and"——

"There you go! Blame you! What would I blame you about? If I get lime in my eyes it's my own fault. Mrs. Bowser, you are getting to be a good deal of a crank lately."

"Well, if you are determined on it, don't say that I asked you or encouraged you."

I was quite sure how it would end, but I said nothing more, and in the course of half an hour he got into his old clothes and went down cellar. I followed him down to give him a few last words of advice, but he didn't need them.

"You go right up stairs and sit down and enjoy yourself," he said. "Here's the brush and here's a pail of lime, and if I don't whitewash more cellar in ten minutes than Moses could in all day I'll never try it again. Besides, Mrs. Bowser, whitewashing is not the slouch work you imagine it to be. It has got to be done by a person of taste and intelligence or it won't stand. I want a little blueing to give it a tinge."

"You understand," I said, as I got what he wanted, "that I did not ask you to do this work."

"Ask me! What on earth ails you, Mrs. Bowser? You are making fuss enough over ten minutes' work to warrant a year's job."

"It must be well done."

"Certainly."

"Two coats all around."

"Just so."

"Even if it takes you all day."

"Even if it takes me over half an hour, which it won't. I'll show you a job here that will make a black man turn green with envy. Just run up stairs and make yourself comfortable."

I retreated up the stairs to the kitchen door and waited for results, which I knew were sure to come. Mr. Bowser dipped and dished and sozzled and stirred until he had the liquid to his liking, and as he began on the stone wall I heard him chuckling:

"I said fifteen minutes, but I'll go slow and take twenty. The idea of a colored man sloshing around here all day to do this work. Let's see. I believe I'll take the overhead first."

I held my breath in suspense for a long minute. Then a yell arose from that cellar which jumped the cook out of her old slippers and made her cry out:

"For heaven's sake, Mrs. Bowser, have we been struck by another cyclone?"

There was a second and a third yell, and as I hurried down stairs Mr. Bowser stood in the middle of the cellar, hands outstretched and jumping up and down as if he had fire under his feet.

"For heaven's sake, what is it, Mr. Bowser?" I asked.

"Whitewash—lime—fire!"

"Where?"

"In my eyes! I'm blind! I've burned them out!"

I got hold of him and led him out to the laundry tubs and set the water to running. He had indeed got a dose in his eyes, but it was more painful than dangerous. He could hardly see daylight after we had washed out all the lime, and as I led him upstairs he said:

"I shall never see again—never see you or the baby again in my life!"

I washed his eyes with milk and got him to lie down on the lounge, and in a couple of hours he was pretty near all right. His eyes were sore, but no great damage had been done. He was very gentle until he discovered this. Then he suddenly turned on me with:

"Mrs. Bowser, what possible excuse can you urge in extenuation of your conduct?"

"What do you mean?"

"What do I mean? That's a cool question to ask me! In view of what has transpired what have you to say?"

"I say that you were foolish to undertake the job. I warned you how it would turn out."

"Mrs. Bowser!" he shouted, squirting tears of lime water out of his eyes, "do you pretend to deny that you didn't encourage me to undertake a task which you knew would put my whole future happiness, if not my life, in peril?"

"I do, sir. I did all I possibly could to dissuade you."

"And you are not to blame?"

"Not in the least."

"And I brought it all on myself?"

"You did."

"Mrs. Bowser, this is too much—too much. I could forgive one who had wronged me, if penitent, but when they attempt to brazen it out it is time for action. We will settle on the amount of alimony right here and now."

But we didn't. After blinking around for half a day he went down town, and when he came home to supper he was as good natured as pie. I got a colored man to come and do the work, and two or three days later, when Mr. Bowser happened down cellar, I heard him saying to himself:

"Yes, it's a mighty slick job I did on this, and I'll tackle that stovepipe to-morrow morning."—Detroit Free Press.

RUSSIAN TAXATION.

The Heavy Burden Laid Upon the Peasants Is More Than They Can Bear.

The burdens of the peasantry are very heavy. In Russia the superior classes enjoy many exemptions from taxations, and the public revenue is taken mainly from the peasant classes. The annual redemption money they have to pay to the state for their land is a most serious obligation, and between one thing and another the burdens on the land in a vast number of cases exceed its net return very considerably. Professor Thun states that in 2,000 cases of letting holdings which had occurred in the province of Moscow at the time he wrote the average rent received was only 3 rubles, 56 kopecks per "soul," (land share,) while the average taxation was 10 rubles, 30 kopecks. Stepniak says that in thirty-seven provinces of European Russia the class who were formerly state peasants pay in taxes of every description no less than 92.75 per cent. of the average net produce of their land, and that the class who were formerly serfs of private owners pay as much as 192.25 percent. of the net produce of theirs.

Land owning on these terms is manifestly a questionable privilege, and the moujik pays his land taxes as the Scotch crofter has sometimes to pay his rent, not out of the produce of his holding, but out of the wages of his auxiliary labor; but the Scotch crofter, under his system of individual tenure, has one great resource which is wanting to the other—he can always cut the knot of his troubles by throwing up his holding, if he chooses, and emigrating.

To the Russian peasant emigration brings no relief. He is born a proprietor and cannot escape the obligation of his position wherever he may go. He may try to let his ground—and in many cases he does—but, as we see, he cannot often get enough rent to meet the dues. He may leave his village, if he will, but his village liabilities travel with him wherever he may settle. He cannot obtain work anywhere in Russia without showing his pass from his own commune; and since, under the principle of joint liability that rules in the communistic system, the members of the commune who remain at home would have to pay the emigrants arrears if he failed to pay them himself, they are not likely to renew the pass to a defaulter.

The Russian peasants are thus nearly as much adstricti glebæ as they ever were; they are now under the power of the commune as completely as they were before under the power of their masters, and their difficulty is still how they can possibly obtain emancipation. Sometimes they will defy the commune, forego the advantage of a lawful pass, crowd the ranks of that large body in Russia who are known as the "illegal men," and sometimes, we are assured, by Professor Thun, a whole village, every man and every family, will secretly disappear in a body and seek refuge from the tax collector by settling in the steppes.—National Review

Sharp Trading.

Thrifty country people sometimes drive a bargain, after a fashion of their own. An old lady who had been away on a visit, wanted her trunk carried from the railroad station to her house, two miles distant, and called upon one of her neighbors to ask if he could go and get it. He "reckoned he could," whereupon the old lady asked, "How much will it be wuth?" "Well, I dunno," was the careful reply, "what are you willin' to pay?" "Oh, I'm willin' to pay what's right." "About how much do you reckon it's wuth?" "Well, what do you say?" "I skasly know; I'd ruther you'd say what you'd give." "No; I prefer having you say what you think you'd ought to have." "I reely don't know exactly what to say." After ten minutes or more of this non committal conversation, the man grows desperate.

"Well, would a quarter be too much?" he asks.

"No; I don't know as it would, though I callated on gettin' it done for 'bout twenty cents."

"Well, s'posin' we call it twenty cents, then?"

"Oh, I'm willin' to pay the other five if you feel it's wuth it. I want to pay all a thing's wuth."

They finally agree on twenty cents, the old lady saying that she'll "make the other five up to him sometime."—Youth's Companion.

Nasby's First Book.

During the campaign of 1864 Mr. D. R. Locke (Petroleum V. Nasby) was a temporary resident of this city and made an arrangement with The Indianapolis Journal to publish his letters, for which he paid The Journal $2 each, that being about the price of the composition. The Journal loaned the type to Messrs. Asher & Adams, a local publishing house of that day, and they published the letters in a yellow covered pamphlet for the author. At that time "Nasby" had not acquired a national reputation, as might be inferred from his paying The Journal $2 each for publishing his letters. They had already been printed in an Ohio paper, but he wanted to give them a wider circulation and more permanent form, and adopted this method of doing it. The yellow covered pamphlet issued in this city was his first attempt at book making.—Indianapolis Journal.

It is a pretty fight that is now on in Canada between the divorce and anti-divorce factions. There is practically almost no divorce in the Dominion, and a large and influential party are making agitation to secure a divorce court. Those advocating it are of British blood and are Protestants. Opposed to them solidly are the Roman Catholic French Canadians, of whom there are a number among the highest law officials. It will be interesting to see which side wins.

DINNER AT TEHERAN.

How the Persians Enjoy the Principal Meal of the Day.

There are tiny lambs roasted whole, salmon which has been brought packed in ice upon the heads of runners from a distance of a hundred miles, appetizing kababs of lambs and venison, fowls and partridges (in silver bowls), stewed to rags, and served with strange-colored sauces of the richest kind; great heaps of boiled rice in steaming pyramids, white rice, green rice, colored by an artful admixture of herbs, rice boiled with saffron of a ruddy gold color; omelets and sweet dishes, innumerable little china cups of toothsome pickles, small china bowls containing various thick soups, but not a single joint to be seen. Every body eats away as if he had never tasted food before. There are no forks, no spoons, no plates; but every man's hand appears to be dipping at once into the innumerable dishes. Occasionally our host, with his mouth half full, grunts out an entreaty that we should taste some particular delicacy, and in twenty minutes all is over. Iced rose-water is poured upon the fingers of each guest from a silver ewer, and he wipes them upon a delicately-embroidered napkin. About a tenth of what has been provided has been consumed by the party; the rest is removed and gobbled up with surprising celerity by the great tribe of hungry servants. Pipes are brought once more, but there is little or no conversation; the Persians say that "to talk after a good meal is the act of an ill-bred man or a fool." And then we get up and bid our hospitable friend good-night. And as we leave, we see that the mysterious covered tray is being taken to the banqueting room, and we know that our fellow-guests and our host will drink, smoke, and gamble until an unholy hour in the morning. And then we mount our horses and ride slowly through the silent, unlighted streets preceded by our lanterns, which are an absolute necessity, and we don't meet a soul upon the road save an occasional military-looking policeman, who, armed to the teeth, keeps watch and ward over the silent city of the King of Kings, for this is one of the innumerable titles the Shahs of Persia arrogate to themselves.—Good Words.

YELLOW FEVER THEORY.

The Disease Travels Only in Sun-Light and Forty Feet a Day.

"People are always discovering something known before they were born," growled a Harlem refugee who has spent some time in the South. "Here's a newspaper that says 'the novel theory that the yellow-fever microbe travels about only when the sun is shining is advanced in a letter from General F. E. Spinner.' Why, that's as old as yellow fever itself, I really believe. I was shooting ducks in Florida in the winter of 1877-'78, when the fever broke out in Jacksonville. It was necessary for us to sail up there, twenty miles, to get supplies. Among our number (it was a little settlement just started) was a Louisianian, who proposed to sail to Jacksonville. He was asked anxiously if there was not danger of the unacclimated members of the necessary crew of four catching the fever.

"'Not the least,' he said calmly. 'We'll start in the night, and if we get there before sun-up, as we shall if the wind serves as it does now, we'll lie off in the river until eight o'clock. But we must get through our business by four o'clock.

"'It is a well-known fact,' he explained, answering inquiries, 'that there is not the slightest danger of infection unless you remain in the infected town during the night. Then, too, the disease travels in circles about each center of infection at the rate of about forty feet a day, and outside of these circles one is perfectly safe. I learned all that while I was a boy.'

"Well, we went to Jacksonville," said the New Yorker, "got our supplies and our dinner and some other things I need not schedule, and sailed at half-past four. Near where we were staying was a town which maintained a shot-gun quarantine, but the St. John's is nearly five miles wide there and we slipped by. Ten days after that we went up there and tantalized them about our trip to Jacksonville. Mad? Why, they wanted to lock us up! But we went to Jacksonville several times after that.

"How about that forty feet a day progression? O, I don't know about that, but the other business held good."—N. Y. Telegram.

Treat the Boys Fairly.

The Prairie Farmer gives the following sensible advice to agricultural fathers: Give the boy a colt, a pig, some hens, a garden or fruit patch—in fact, any good live, growing or workable property. Let him pay interest on the investment, all expenses of labor, feed, manure, or whatever it may be, except what time he cares to give it "out of hours." Let him manage the thing under these conditions; even loan him a few dollars with which to carry on his business, if necessary. Sometimes he will lose money; oftener he will make it. In either case he will learn how to do business, and more than likely he will learn to like farming. Religiously leave him in posession of all he makes, even if it be more than his father is worth. Don't push a single bit of advice at him in this affair. Let him get into the habit of asking advice and information.

The new flag of the Republic of Brazil is like the United States flag except that the stripes are yellow and white instead of red and white; there are eighteen stars in the corner each representing a State of the Republic.

Frank Bell, of Reno, has been appointed Lieutenant Governor of Nevada. Mr. Bell was Superintendent of the State Prison at Carson a few years ago. S. W. Chubbuck, the predecessor of Mr. Bell in the office of Lieutenant Governor, resigned to take a position with Wells, Fargo & Co.

Corn is reported selling in Kansas at 15 cents a bushel and oats at 12 cents; other farm products in like proportion. The farmers in Kansas must be sadly lacking in information and common sense to stay in a country subject to blizzards and cyclones and work for almost nothing. It would be better for them to leave such a country and come to California.

A droll fraud was revealed last week in the trial of a case at San Francisco. The Live Oak Distillery Company has had six drummers on the road selling whisky and each drummer sold a different brand of the nectar. On the trial it was admitted that exactly the same kind of whisky was supplied to the customers, but different labels were put on the barrels according as "Freestone," "Amazon," or "Live Oak" was demanded. No doubt all the buyers of the whisky were positive that they could at once tell the difference between the whisky sold under the different brands.

California may well be proud of the Crocker family. The example set by the children of the late Mrs. Crocker in taking pains to search through brief memoranda to find what charitable aims she had in view in order to carry out those aims as fully as she would have done had her life been spared longer is such as proves them worthy of so good a mother. Scotland boasted of the grand old family of Douglas, that all the men were brave and all the women virtuous. California may with not less pride point to the Crockers as a family that reflects honor upon the State. They have sought wealth,

Not for to hide it in a hedge,
Nor for the train attendant,
But for the glorious privilege,
Of being independent.

And the wealth so won is largely devoted to the noblest uses in the service of mankind.

The terrible fires so frequent during the present year prove that we know as little how cities should be built as we know how they should be governed after they are built. The value of the property destroyed by the recent fire in Boston was so great that a small part of it if rightly used when the buildings were put up would have made them fire-proof. The same is true of Lynn. In Minneapolis the building in which a great many human beings were roasted to death last Saturday evening was called "fire-proof," but went up in flames like a pile of shavings. It is a monstrous crime to permit such death traps to exist in a large city. The blood of the men who died such a horrible death rests upon those who kept them in such a dangerous place. It is not possible to read of men in the prime of life putting pistols to their heads and blowing their own brains out to escape the more terrible death of being burned alive without a strong feeling of indignation against those who subjected them to such an awful fate. Our want of a system in building cities needs a thorough change and humanity requires that the change be made.

BORN.

HEROD—At Big Pine, November 30, 1889 to Mr. and Mrs. James Herod, a son.

N. E. Conklin and wife have been in town during the week.

Hon. P. Reddy went to Keeler on Wednesday and from there to Darwin.

Neil McLain came in from Cerro Gordo early in the week.

Ed. Walker and W. T. Grant were up from Olancha at the beginning of the week.

The little hotel building at Laws has been sold to Adolph Gerckens, of Benton, for $2,500.

"If you want to know who we are," just ask the Mikado any time between now and the 17th.

Mr. N. Rhine got back to Independence last Monday after a visit of several weeks in San Francisco.

Mr. John Lucas has given up the butcher business at Lone Pine and Manuel Diaz is back at the old stand.

Mr. C. A. Levy left town to-day on his way from Bishop to Bakersfield with twenty head of horses.

Mr. H. H. Spears came down from Bishop on Thursday on his way to Mojave and Los Angeles.

Arch. Farrington has bonded two mines in the Beveridge District of Manuel Montaña for $5,000.

Mr. C. Collins and Mrs. Collins, of Warm Spring left town on Thursday on their way to Los Angeles by way of Mojave.

Messrs. W. K. Miller, Frank Elder, Ben. Lasky, Joe Montaña and Horace Elder, of Lone Pine, were in town during the week.

Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Conklin left town last Tuesday morning for San Francisco. They expect to return about ten days hence.

Mr. Robert O'Neal says he will have a fruit drier at work at Bishop next season. Driers are needed at several places in the valley.

Miss Maud Cook got home from her trip to England last Wednesday. She was accompanied from Hawthorne by her sister, Mrs. Julia Church.

Mr. O. H. Hill came down from Bishop on Thursday. He is the best possible proof of the excellence of the fare provided at the Valley View Hotel.

Silver keeps on the up grade, 96¼ being the late quotation. It will be interesting to note if the advance will be checked after the election of Mr. Reed as speaker of the House.

A fine standard comedy is in preparation and will be presented at Independence on News Years. The proceeds will be given to a cause that will meet the approbation of everybody.

Inyo Lodge No. 301, I. O. O. F. has elected the following officers to serve the ensuing term. E. Robinson, N. G.; J. Alexander, V. G.; J. D. Blair, Secretary; B. Rhine, Treasurer.

The Superior Court has ordered a change of venue in the Elliott case. The next trial will be had in Kern county. Inyo will have to pay all the expenses of the new trial which will amount to a good round sum.

The Academy at Bishop is fortunate in having a very competent teacher of music. The teacher is Miss Emma Lawrence, a graduate of Cornell Conservatory of Music in Iowa.

The hoisting works whistle blew at Cerro Gordo last week for the first time in ten years. There are twenty-eight men at work for the Company and probably a dozen more are chloriding.

Dr. Bishop and other locators along the line of the Eastside Canal will set out many thousands of apple trees during the coming Spring. Along the line of the canal for a distance of twenty miles will in time be an immense orchard.

John Clarke is making a nice drive way at Bishop about a mile long, running through ground on the east side of Main street. The town at present is rather deficient in speeding streets and this will be quite an improvement.

A team of eight horses and twelve mules left Independence to-day for Cerro Gordo. They are all fine animals and will be put upon the road between Keeler and Cerro Gordo hauling ore down to Keeler and supplies up to the mines. They were brought from Carson.

BISHOP AND VICINITY.

It is very gratifying to note the improvement steadily going on in and about the town of Bishop. New houses are being built all over the surrounding country; canals are run everywhere and much new land is enclosed and being got ready for crops. But the chief glory of the town is its schools. The new public school is a fine two story building and is most creditable to the people who tax themselves to build and maintain it for the benefit of those who come after them. The Academy has increased attendance and is going along successfully under the management of the new principal, Mr. Dickson.

A much needed work is improvement of the streets, but this is being done as rapidly as circumstances will admit. Some system of drainage for the town should be established with as little delay as possible. Bishop is a growing town and every day this need is becoming stronger. The water works supply an abundance of pure water from the largest and finest mountain stream in the valley, but this prime necessity being secured good drainage is the next pressing need. The facility for securing good drainage is excellent and could be done at very moderate cost.

At present there is general complaint of scarcity of money and the very old story of "dull times." A business man who has long been established in the town said to a visitor a few days ago that when he first settled there at any general gathering of the people the only vehicles to be seen were ordinary farm wagons. In these wagons the farmers and their wives and daughters rode to town or elsewhere. Now handsome carriages are owned by all the farmers, and at any general gathering of the people the display of fine teams and conveyances is equal to what may be seen in all other parts of the State. This merchant said further that when he began business the only drygoods kept in the town were the commonest kind, nothing but calicoes or linsey-wolsey for women and jeans for men. Now the merchants of Bishop keep stocks of the finest goods for women and broadcloth for men. Pianos and other musical instruments are quite common in farmers' homes, and the furniture and table ware are to correspond. This merchant says that the farmers instead of hoarding their money have used it to secure comforts and some of the elegancies of life for themselves and their families. There is far less of lounging about the saloons and frittering away of time and money at "bean poker" than in former years and the young men who now begin to do their life work show less inclination for this kind of thing than their fathers. When a party is now seen sitting at a game of "seven-up" or "freeze-out" it is a sure thing that nearly all of them are gray headed. As education is bestowed upon the young and intelligence increases the taste becomes purer and intellectual pleasures—reading, conversation and music—take the place of the ruder attraction of the saloon. Bishop begins to show evidence of this higher and better civilization and the pioneers prove the soundness of their judgment and the real goodness of their hearts by making constant sacrifices to secure for the rising generation advantages denied to themselves.

It is only at this rather late day that the great value of fruit raising begins to be fully understood at the upper end of the valley. About Bishop as fine apples can be grown as anywhere in the State and many thousands of young trees have been delivered there within the past few weeks. Within a few years Bishop will be surrounded with beautiful orchards and the fruit will far exceed in value all the agricultural products now grown there. The upper end of the valley has a prosperous future before it which patient labor will secure.

Death of Charley Schuman

Charles A. Schuman died at Buckeye Springs, near Bridgeport, Mono county, on November 26th ult. The news of his death was a great surprise at Independence as he was aged only 30 years and was a man of fine physique. He was a native of Wisconsin. After coming to California he worked in mines for some years and while so employed studied law and was admitted to practice in Mono county. He was aided in his law studies by Hon. P. Reddy. Last summer he was stricken with rheumatism and never recovered from it. He left a wife and six children, the eldest a girl of thirteen years and the youngest an infant. The family will get about $6,000 from insurances in benevolent associations.

A Great Work

Without personal inspection it is not possible for any one to appreciate what a great work the Owens Valley Canal, at Bishop, is, nor how much has already been done upon it. It is well named the "Owens Valley Canal," for it is in reality the key to the irrigation of the whole west side of the valley. Every reasonable person who will go and examine the work will never again say that the men of Owens Valley have no enterprise. It is amazing that a few poor men should have had the courage to commence such a work, and no better proof could be had of their business capacity than the amount of work already done for the amount of money expended. It is but a question of time when the canal will be extended to Independence and far beyond. Then will tens of thousands of as good land as is in the valley be irrigated that he far above any other canals now projected, or even possible to build. But help must be got from outside the county to complete this great work. The interest is so great that upon a fair presentation of facts to capitalists it is reasonable to expect that money enough could be got to finish the work. There is ample margin for profit to satisfy the greediest investor.

Estray Notice.

I have taken up for trespass, two heasses, not castrated. One is mouse-colored with black markings on the legs, the other is much lighter in color, with white legs and belly; neither of them are branded. The owner is requested to prove property, pay charges for keeping and advertising, and take them away, otherwise they will be sold at public auction thirty days from date. CHARLES STEWARD.

Big Pine Jottings.

Regular Correspondence.

Since writing you last the Big Pine Canal Company has put a large force of men and teams to work on the northern end of the Canal. Mr. E. M. Crocker, who is general overseer of the work, reports everything progressing splendidly, the only detriment to pushing the work more rapidly being the late rains. It is proposed to have the canal completed by early spring to a point a few miles southeast of Big Pine.

Mr. A. C. McDonald is building quite a large and commodious blacksmith and wheelright shop.

The new school house in course of construction is already shingled, weather boarded, and the floor laid. It is also rumored that parties here anticipate the building of a town hall in the near future. We understand that some time during the coming holidays the new school building is to be "warmed" by an entertainment and ball.

It is useless for us to attempt to describe the grand ball given at Crocker's Hotel on the 28th ult. Suffice to say that it was a complete success; that the net proceeds (to purchase a bell for the school) amounted to the handsome sum of $96; that all enjoyed themselves—as they were loath to cease dancing even at 5 o'clock in the morning; that there was a supply of good music; that the supper was simply superb, and—not least if we have placed it last—that the ladies who managed it are truly adepts in the culinary art, as well as able financiers.

Mr. A. L. Baker, an old Inyoite, now of Palmetto Mining District, is visiting our town. He predicts a bright future for the Palmetto series of mines, some of which are on the eve of being sold to wealthy companies. The Sylvania mines in this district have already about 400 tons of paying ore on the dump. The above named properties are in the hands of Mr. William Outhout, as Superintendent. He is a person of ability and experience as a mining man, and it is predicted that he will soon raise a substantial "boom" there. The mines are situated about 60 miles northeast of Big Pine and should they prove to be but part of what is expected they will greatly enhance the business interests of this place as the supplies etc. will be shipped by way of Alvord. The mill at Palmetto is now undergoing repairs but will be completely remodeled and in running order by the 15th inst. Custom ores will also be worked at the mill.

Miss Mattie Wallace, formerly of Independence, arrived here last Friday. She is to make Big Pine her future home.

John and Rudolph Schober arrived in town on Tuesday with a heavy load of borax from Saline Valley.

F. Conn and E. Trudo who are interested in the Saline Valley borax fields left last Saturday for San Francisco. Mrs. Conn accompanied them.

Mr. G. Sanger has returned from Bakersfield.

The current question here: "Say, Mr. Black, do you think we'll all have to go to Bakersfield as witnesses?"

WANDERER.

Keeler Notes

Special Correspondence.

P. H. Mack and A. W. Eibeshutz were in town this week.

Mrs. B. F. Gray left on Monday last for Carson, where she will spend the holidays.

Clem Ogg arrived here on Monday evening from Hawthorne. He will probably assume charge of the Union mine.

On Monday last Cæsar Gasparini, a miner employed in John Farres' mine, near Darwin, while attempting to pick out a charge of giant powder was, like truth, crushed to earth by the aforesaid charge, but, like truth, he has risen again and, with the exception of a few bruises, he is all right. Cæsar is a lucky man. Not one man in ten thousand would come out of a heated argument with a stick of giant powder with a whole skin.

On Tuesday's train Mr. E. F. Hall, for nearly four years in the employ of the C. & C. R. R. at this point, accompanied by his wife, left for Virginia, Nevada, where they will reside in the future. Mr. Hall and his estimable wife made many friends during their stay in our midst, not only in Keeler, but from one end of the county to the other. It is needless to say that they will be missed and that they carried away the good wishes of everyone who has ever met them. The music that for the past year was wont to delight the ears of the Keelerites will be heard no more. In the words of our esteemed fellow citizen Mr. W. Hysterious Walker, D. D. S., "There won't never be no more music in Keeler." Before I close I must introduce Mr. Hall's successor in office. Mr. S. M. Buck, Inyo Countyites. Countyites, Buck, shake! Mr. Buck has, thus far, made a favorable impression on his future neighbors but owing to the rheumatism that occupies most of his joints he is not able to appear to as good advantage as he will later on. In the mean time he will please take notice that Owens lake water is death to rheumatism. B. S.

A Good Optician.

To all who are so unfortunate as to need special treatment for any defect of eyesight or for any injury to the eyes from accident or from any cause, we can confidently recommend Dr. Georges E. Pardee, No. 526 Kearney street, San Francisco. In him will be found a thoroughly trained and most skilful optician, whose study and learning are supplemented by an extensive practice. Nor is this all; he is a most kind and patient gentleman who takes more pleasure in relieving suffering than in the money he receives for his services. Every sufferer from eye troubles may go to Dr. Pardee with perfect confidence of getting the best of treatment and at the most moderate cost.

Profit In Eggs.

As shrewd a farmer as there is in Owens Valley on being asked if it would pay to feed wheat to hens and sell eggs at twenty-five cents a dozen replied that it would pay well to feed wheat and sell eggs at twenty cents a dozen. If this be so it is very strange that we should be paying freight on eggs from Iowa into Owens Valley and our farmers be complaining of scarcity of money and low price for grain. This farmer said he had sold large quantities of eggs at a dollar a dozen. These prices will never return and it will be better for all concerned when there shall be no looking backward, but all shall accommodate themselves to changed conditions.

John Lucas, of Lone Pine, bought a hay press from S. W. Luitweiler, of Los Angeles. He has now been using the press for several weeks and says with three men and two horses he bales one ton of hay per hour. The bales are fastened with wire costing about sixty cents per ton. The bales average about 130 pounds each. Mr. Lucas will take pleasure in showing the machine in operation to any persen. He says it is the best press he has ever seen.

License Violation.

Victor Trepier was arrested by Under-Sheriff Yaney at Lone Pine on Thursday for keeping a bowling alley without a license. He was brought to Independence for trial. When the complaint was read to him he at once admitted the truth of the charge and left the case with the Justice. Mr. Trepier is a Frenchman and has very little knowledge of the English language. It was evident that he was ignorant of the law requiring him to take out a license and he was fined ten dollars and discharged. This is the first case of the kind in the county and will serve as a warning that the law must be obeyed.

Contested Entries.

Several parties from Bishop are in town on contested land entries at the Land Office. All of these cases are on entries made by the San Francisco swindler, W. H. Martin. This fellow entered thousands of acres of land in Owens Valley and swindled people back in the East by inducing them to pay money for land that he made them believe was secured to them. The locations were made under the Desert Land Act and dummy names were used; now the three years fixed by law as the time for reclaiming the land has expired; not a cent was ever expended upon improvements and actual settlers are cantesting Martin's entries.

A great variety of toys of all kinds, handsome books and many fancy articles suitable for Christmas presents on exhibition at the store of L. WOOD.

Sheriff Eldred ran in three drunken Indians on Wednesday night, the whisky being supplied by a Mexican. The Sheriff made a hot chase after the fellow but lost him in the sagebrush.

After an absence of nearly three years at his old home in the State of Virginia Mr. Van Baker got back to Independence a few days ago. Van looks hale and hearty but prefers California to "Old Virginy."

A few days ago a carload of potatoes was landed at Bishop from Dayton, Nevada. The potato crop of Owens Valley is badly injured this year. The yield was as good as usual but the potatoes are black within and not fit to eat.

District Attorney George M. Gill returned last Monday night from a visit of six weeks to the lower country where he had been undergoing a course of medical treatment. He is much recovered in health and his friends entertain the strongest hopes of his ultimate recovery.

A handsome carriage horse belonging to Mr. C. S. Swan, of Independence, died on Tuesday morning. On cutting the animal open the intestines were found distended to bursting with gas generated from damp alfalfa the animal had eaten. It was one of a pair of very well matched grays.

William Rowan, of Bishop, has gone to Los Angeles with about forty head of horses for that market. They were for the most part half-breed Normans and will command a ready sale anywhere. Among the rest was a span of mares, aged three and four years, that weighed thirty-two hundred.

There is much activity in making borax in Saline Valley. The capacity of the works will be largely increased soon and more than double the amount of teams will be employed in hauling the borax from the works to Alvord. Already this interest makes a good deal of business for the town of Big Pine.

A company has been formed to build a smelting and reduction works at Los Angeles. The first outlay on the works will be $100,000. To make this undertaking a success Los Angeles must have more railroad connection with ore producing regions and in no other direction can such extensive and valuable mines be reached as in Inyo county.

At places along the line of the Eastside Canal cement is passed through. This is very hard and expensive to work as it must be taken out with picks and in places blasting powder be used. Recently Mr. McIver ran water over a stretch of cement and soaked it thoroughly. It slaked like lime and after being allowed to dry out a few days it can be moved as easily with the ditching machine as loose soil. This is a great advantage and costs nothing.

BY VIRTUE OF AN EXECUTION ISSUED out of the Superior Court of the County of Inyo, State of California, on the 28th day of October, A. D. 1889, wherein I J Woodin, plaintiff, and Joseph Fernbach defendant, upon a judgment rendered the 17th day of September, A. D. 1889, in the Justice Court of the 3rd Township, County of Inyo, State of California, for the sum of one hundred and twenty-six dollars United States gold coin, besides costs and interest, a transcript of which judgment was duly filed and recorded in the County Clerk's office of said County of Inyo, on the 17th day of September, A. D. 1889, in favor of I. J. CHAPTER XXVII.

A LEGAL DISTINCTION.

"Ah, Mr. Breton, yes, yes, I was sure you would come."

The lawyer pulled two chairs together near his office table. John T. Giddings had changed a great deal since the time when he undertook to engineer the corporation scheme. Apparently he was going down hill very fast, without brakes. His eyes wore a glassy look, as if he had just waked from a drunken sleep. The smooth roundness of his cheeks was gone, his lower jaw was strongly marked, and his nose seemed drawn out and sharpened to give the effect of a bird of prey. Philip glanced significantly about the room. The lawyer followed his eyes and laughed.

"Changed some, aren't we—all lack of money. Actually, you have no idea how $10 even would furbish this old table and polish this floor. Times aint as they were, Mr. Breton, in the old days, when I used to get fat fees out of men like your father. Nice man, your father. But," and he leered meaningly at his visitor, "when we do get a chance for a dollar I tell you we jump at it." He tipped back his chair against his half filled book shelves and peered familiarly into Philip's stern face. "Why, look at those dirty fellows back by the door. Time was I wouldn't notice a client unless he wore white collar and cuffs. But now for business. I suppose you were a little astonished to get my letter?"

"I should prefer not to have listeners," remarked Philip, coldly.

"Oh, well, I will finish with these fellows first, then. I thought you might be impatient."

"Not at all, sir."

The lawyer's clothes were threadbare and soiled, and the black felt hat that he wore, indoors and out, well slouched over his eyes, was torn in the crown. Philip compared him with his shabby looking callers, and could not see but the clients looked as well as their patron. But at every sign of poverty and degradation his heart sank lower and lower, for the man must be reckless and hungry as a man eating shark. If it lay in his power to rack the life out of a victim—the man could have no restraint of character or decency to hold back his hand. Could there be anything he knew about Bertha's past, that terrible gap Philip had not tried to look into? He dared not think. Impatient! he dreaded the moment when the lawyer should send away his soiled clients. Philip started each time he half turned as if to come back. But when Giddings closed the door after the poor wretches, which was not until a little roll of bills had passed from their hands to his, and came back to his seat, the young mill owner did not seem to observe him until the lawyer said:

"I have filled out a complaint, but have not signed it yet."

Philip looked at him blankly. "What is a complaint?"

"Well, my dear sir, a man of your position might pass a lifetime and never know. Ahem! It is a form of procedure that is generally understood to be applicable only to the poor. When a wretch has committed a burglary, for instance, some friend of justice, as I for example, goes before a magistrate and makes certain charges. Then the poor devil is arrested, dragged before the court and tried."

"Well, sir, what are your complaints to me?"

The lawyer smiled. "Strictly, nothing, unless you identify yourself with a woman calling herself Bertha Breton." He paused to notice the effect of his words.

"My wife," gasped Philip. "Oh, for God's sake, speak quick!"

"You have been lately married?"

"A week ago."

"The woman you have married has a husband already. By remarrying as she has done she has committed a felony by our laws. Some rather inaccurately call her crime bigamy. A state prison offense, I suppose you know—I mean for her. The law of our state does not touch you."

"But she told me she was free to marry." How far off his voice sounded. Was it he, indeed, in a low attorney's office, discussing his wife, whether she were a felon or no. It was like a horrible dream; too horrible to be anything but a dream; but he could not awake from it.

"No doubt she thought so," said the lawyer, charitably; "but let me show you." He opened a drawer in front of him, and took out a long paper. Isn't it odd, women have no notion of folding a legal document correctly. Did you ever notice it?"

"No, I never noticed it," answered Philip, mechanically. He felt as if he were standing still, while the world was flying from under his feet.

"This is the marriage certificate. It is proper in form, you will see."

Yes; it seemed correct. Bertha's name was there, and Curran's. They seemed to leap out of the parchment as he read. And there were two witnesses. He rubbed his eyes. "Thomas Bailes"—that was the name of the servant he had turned away. Yes; it was not an hour ago he turned him away.

"Who is this Thomas Bailes?"

"He was a waiter at the 'Lockout house' where the happy couple were made one."

The paper fluttered to the floor, the walls of the room seemed rushing in upon him, while the grinning face of the lawyer danced in hideous measure before his eyes. Was God, in his mercy, sending him death? When his brain cleared again the lawyer was talking still.

"You will wonder how I happen to possess this paper, but you will recollect my advertisement at the top of my letter head? Well it seemed Mrs. Curran, excuse me, grew tired of her uncongenial husband, quite outside her sphere of course. A fine fellow that Curran was too. But the young lady naturally sighed for her old, more refined associations. Her husband does nothing but shock her. She becomes wretched, her craze is over, the reality is not to her delicate taste at all. What next? She leaves him. Fortune throws my advertisement in her way and I receive a letter from her address, then at Vineboro. Here was a short way out of it all, a divorce without trouble or publicity, for any cause desired. She would be free as air again, free to end her life, as she no doubt intended, in conventual retirement."

Giddings threw his feet upon the table and smiled very slyly. "I undertook her suit. What better cause could there be than incompatibility. Oh, no; she need not come to Lockout, so there was no trouble; and as to publicity, why, will you believe it?—and the lawyer winked horribly at his visitor; "Curran himself was within twenty miles of Lockout during the pendency of the suit, and he never guessed his wife was being divorced from him; and I don't believe he knows it to this day. Ha, ha!" And he laid his head back on his chair and laughed till the tears ran down his face.

"But you procured her a divorce?" It is almost worth pain to have the exquisite delight that comes with relief.

Philip felt ashamed that he had distrusted God so much. How much more joyfully he could cherish his wife than before. There was no blot of shame on her sweet name. There was no page in her life the whole world might not look at then. And this man wanted a reward for what he had done, aye, and he should have it. There was no gift too great for him who had turned this young husband's bitterest memories sweet, who had made his life and his love like that of other men. He reached forward and grasped the lawyer's oily hand in hearty good will.

Gidding's stared at him in silence a moment. Then he moved uneasily in his chair and released his hand.

"I guess you don't understand," he had enough of his manhood left to hesitate. It was actually a more disagreeable business than he had counted on. "Such secret convenient divorces as I get don't stand in our courts. The whole thing is bogus, my dear sir." Philip's face had become like a dead man's. "Issued by the supreme judicial court of Utah, it says on them; but there is no such court, and as for the seal, I keep it in this little drawer. Besides, if there were such a court, and its genuine seal were stamped on a decree of divorce, it would amount to nothing when both parties live in this state. Our state makes its own decrees. Utah decrees or the decrees of any foreign state or territory are void here. Your wife is Curran's wife yet. She is as much married to him today as she ever was."

"How am I to know but that you are lying to me?"

The attorney handed him over a file of letters with a shrug of his shoulders. "You need not wade through them all, the last is conclusive, I think you will agree with me."

MR. GIDDINGS—Dear Sir—I received this morning the divorce from the supreme judicial court of Utah, and you will find inclosed a draft for the second half of the $300 agreed upon. Of course I have to rely wholly on your assurance that my divorce is complete, and that I have a right to resume my maiden name. I thank you for the quiet way in which you have have managed it. I did not suppose it could be done so easily. I only wonder Mr. Curran has taken it so calmly, he seemed almost wild when I first left him. Yours gratefully,

BERTHA ELLINGSWORTH.

Yes, there was no doubt about it. It was Bertha's handwriting; no forgery could have deceived her lover's eyes. How little she fancied he would ever be reading it over, and cursing the first hour he ever looked on her dear face. He watched the attorney put it back on file again. It seemed a desecration to lay one of her notes in the stained, tin box, with the ignoble company of lying and suppliant letters.

"She seems to have relied completely on some assurance of yours that her divorce would be good. Philip tried to speak calmly to this man, who held his darling's fate in the hollow of his hand, but his voice trembled, and almost broke.

"You are not well," exclaimed the lawyer, and he opened another drawer in his desk and drew out a square shaped, yellow colored bottle. "Take a swallow of this."

Philip clutched it eagerly. He thought now he could understand how a man might want to drown all pride and sense in drunkenness. He poured the crude stuff down his parched throat as if it were water. One swallow was not enough, nor were two, but when he set the bottle upon the table at last, the lawyer resumed:

"And so it would have been good, nine times out of ten, good enough to make all parties concerned comfortable. A document is a document to most people, a seal is a seal. As a man thinketh, so is he. Parties divorced by my flat alone, remarry and raise children, and are as happy and clear of conscience as if they were not committing a sin every hour of their lives, unless it happens to come out."

"This has come out, I suppose, and Lockout is all agog with it." Philip's heart stopped beating while he waited for his answer.

"No, my dear sir, another mistake; no one under heaven knows of it but me, and you now." Breton must have taken him for a fool.

Philip started from his chair like lightning. "Thank God, then Bertha is safe yet."

But Giddings attempted to look very stern. "Did you suppose I made out that complaint for nothing? She is rich and beautiful and proud, no doubt, but the same law hangs over her as the rest of us. No one knows of her crime yet, but before the sun sets," the attorney rose, and cautiously put the table between himself and his guest, whose eyes seemed to him to gleam dangerously, "but before the sun sets," he continued, watching the other closely, "an officer with a warrant will call at your front door."

Philip lifted his chair high in air, and brought it down like a trip hammer where Giddings had stood. But the agile attorney had dodged aside and left the chair to break into splinters over the table.

Philip lifted his chair high in air.

"Scoundrel! Will you come with handcuffs and billets to take away my wife from my arms for following your lying counsels. Is that your law? Does it choose such ministers as you to break up peaceful homes and shut behind bars a woman as innocent as an angel?"

Philip was advancing toward him, when Giddings suddenly threw up the window and leaned out to shout to a policeman. Then he looked back to Philip.

"Another step and your wife goes to jail!"

"I won't touch you." And Philip folded his arms across his breast, while the red blood forsook his face at the threat. He was in this contemptible creature's power. He might grind his teeth at him; he must obey him.

"You seem very obtuse, Mr. Breton," explained the lawyer, from a respectful distance. "I have no ill will toward Mrs. Breton, a very modest, and I may add"——

"As sure as there is a God, if you speak of her so, I will throw you from the window. Your secret will die with you then."

The lawyer smiled unhealthily. "I want money, that is all there is to it. You are rich—Mrs. Breton—well, well, don't be angry. In a word, I want to be paid to keep my secret."

Philip cast a glance of ineffable contempt at him. Then he put his hands behind him and walked slowly across the room. The price of life, of honor, of liberty! No money could measure it. But what trust could he rest in the fidelity of so base a creature as this? The vampire would suck his blood forever, and forever cry for more; he would learn that his victim would make himself a beggar to save this woman, and would beggar him without shame. The creature might not stop with money favors; he might require to be made a companion; to be invited to his table, and presented to his friends; to be godfather to his children, and at last, in anger at some unintended slight, or in some drunken debauch, might bring or call down the ruin dreaded so long. His lifelong slavery would have been in vain. Better a dungeon—no, Bertha must not be sacrificed. Philip turned on his heel and stopped before his tormentor.

"How much do you want?"

His glassy eye brightened. "Oh, I will not be too hard just because I have got the whip hand of you. Say $200, and your secret is safe."

"For how long?" sneered Philip.

"Forever," answered Giddings, with virtuous decision. "I swear before God I will never ask another penny of you; and your secret shall die with me."

Philip had taken out his pocketbook. He found a $50 bill; then he drew a check for $150. The poor lawyer eyed the money with a great tenderness; his heart softened at sight of it, and the love of approbation, that never dies out of even the most degraded soul, stirred in his.

"I aint so bad a fellow, after all," he said, as he took up the money; "I know lots of men who in my place wouldn't have let you off for less than a cool thousand."

"Your circle of friends must be very select." Philip was moving toward the door.

"To be sure, to be sure," but somehow the lawyer kept close to him, "I couldn't help feeling sorry for you; and then your wife is such a nice woman; it never seemed to me jails were made for such as she"——

"Stop your driveling," cried Philip, turning on him so suddenly that the man fancied at first he had been struck, "keep your blood money, but don't dare to breathe her name, even in your prayers."

The lawyer chuckled to himself when the door closed behind his wealthy client. "I suppose I have considerable grit."

Then he pocketed the bill and scrutinized the check. "But I was almost too easy with him. Some fellows, now, would have just bled him."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE WHITE CHAMBER.

The 5 o'clock train drew up at the Bretonville station, and the young husband alighted a changed man. The brick walls of his mills looked strangely unfamiliar to him. Was he indeed the owner of them? Was that his house set like a castle on the hill off to the left? It seemed impossible that any of his old acquaintances should recognize him, but here somebody was shaking hands with him.

"What, so soon away from your young wife?"

"Business," muttered Philip, breaking away from him impatiently. How the man's simple blue eyes would start out of their sockets if he guessed what the business had been. How he would regale his eager family with the infamous story, and sleep more complacently that night for the sudden calamity that had fallen on the rich man's home, while he was safe and his home spotless.

Another acquaintance drew Philip's hand through his arm before he could reach his carriage. "Something very confidential," he whispered mysteriously.

Then Philip had bribed the greedy lawyer to keep a secret which he had already feasted the whole country on. He glanced around him with a new, hunted look in his face. He fancied he saw a peculiar expression in the eyes of the bystanders. Some of them appeared to avoid looking at him.

"It is this." Philip held his breath and the man laughed at his humor. "One would think you were scared to death. I was only going to say my wife and I want to call tomorrow on your charming bride."

"By all means," Philip answered huskily, and threw himself into his carriage. He had nothing to fear from this man at least; he clearly enough had not heard the news. People don't call on—it was too terrible! He let down the carriage window for fresh air. The village policeman stood by the roadside talking to a stranger. As the carriage passed they spoke of Breton, apparently, and laughed. The man must be a detective, armed with the authority to break into his home and carry away his wife. They would shut her in the dock, crowded close by murderers and foul mouthed thieves. The court house galleries would be packed with ruffians to stare at her sweet, frightened face, and her high bred friends would sit below and look insolent disdain at her, and wonder how they ever escaped contamination from her.

"Drive faster!" he shouted to the coachman. Perhaps they had not seized her yet and clasped their hideous iron bracelets about her dimpled arms.

If he were there they would not dare to touch her. Would they dare burst in his gate and break down his massive oaken doors, stride with their soiled boots through his parlors and tear her from his very arms? His father created this very town, and the men whom Philip Breton had befriended would rush to his help. Who ever heard of a house so grand as his being invaded by loud voiced officers—of justice—they called it, to drag a wife from her home? Let them dare to do it.

"Faster! Drive faster!"

The carriage rolled into his grounds and he leaped out and looked about him. He saw no signs of disturbance yet. His gardener was cutting a bouquet of roses. Bless his gray head, he would not be making bouquets for an outraged, plundered home.

"Whom are you cutting the roses for?" How heavy his master's hand rested on his shoulder.

"For the mistress, if you please, sir."

"Is she within, then?"

"Can't you hear her playin', sir?"

Thank God for that gentle breeze that brought the music to his ears. It was that same familiar air from "Travinta," that she had played the night he had left her for the labor meeting, before the first shadow had crossed her life. And she was safe yet.

He mounted the brown stone steps, and unlocked the door. He closed it very softly after him and with noiseless step made his way to the drawing room. The door stood half open; he looked in at Bertha, his one week wife. She wore no cloak or hat to show she had soon to go, and her foot that rested on the pedal was slippered; why not? She had come to stay, night, morning, noon, always. She had come to stay.

But a sudden change passed over his face. That proud faced woman was a—they called it a criminal, a felon, on whose soft, white shoulder any policeman in the state might freely lay his rude hand. She would look to him, but he could not help her; he had undertaken to protect her, but he must stand back with breaking heart while they dragged her away. Could they not let him imprison her at home? She should never go outside; a cell, for such as she. She would die. Was there no pity in their iron laws? To-morrow her name would be heralded abroad. Perhaps her sweet face, almost too fair for kisses, blazoned on the outside sheet of the lowest picture papers, and the dregs of the great cities would revel in its insulting beauty. Poor girl, she was thinking she had a right with him, that her home was in his arms, perhaps dreaming of a household whose queen she should be, of pretty, proud faced boys and blue eyed daughters, who should sometimes cluster about her knees. She was living in a false world. Her children—God grant that she may never have them—ah, the law had a bitter name for what their children would be. He was the wealthiest man in 100 miles, and he could not give his children a name. Her children; how he could love them; but each young face in turn must mantle with shame. And was there nothing he could do for this woman? She had given herself to him; all his vows were upon him.

"Bertha." She looked up and smiled on his stricken face and played on.

He came up behind her. She was his yet. He bent down and kissed her warm white neck beneath her red gold hair. The law had not claimed her yet, and all the rites of religion had made her his wife. One moment he stood by her side; the next he fell upon his knees, and imprisoned the quick flying hands. He felt he could not bear the music now, it was a wild waltz she was playing; he bowed his head in her lap.

"Why Philip, are you so tired?"

"I am weary unto death," and his bent form shook with agony and baffled love.

Bertha's eyes rested calmly on his head for a moment, then glanced at the music sheet on its rack; not a spark of emotion showed in their clear depths. The perfect shape of her mouth was not hurt by one disturbing quiver of the rare red lips; they did not curve downward in gentle tenderness, nor part in sweet pity. There was not one shade more of color in her fair cheeks for this trembling heart broken man whose whole soul seemed dissolving in love and sacrifice; who would have suffered a lifetime to save her from the unguessed fate which hovered fearfully above her gold crowned head.

A JOLLY CROWD.

Lucky Holders of Louisiana State Lottery Coupons.

A jolly little German is Fred Falkenhahn, whose exchange at 79 Stevenson street is the resort of the factory boys for blocks around. Fred serves a hot lunch at his place daily, and over their stew and beer the iron and woodworkers daily vow that his is one of the best places in town. There was a feast at Falkenhahn's a short time ago. Fred, who has been a steady investor in the Louisiana State Lottery for thirteen years was the lucky holder of one-twentieth of ticket 69,159, which drew the third capital prize of $50,000 in the September drawing, and when he received the $2,500 which his coupon entitled him to he allowed his patrons to partake of his hilarity at no extra cost to themselves, and much to the appreciation of their bodily welfare. Falkenhahn had won a number of times before, and now he is a firmer believer in the smiles of fortune than ever.

Another twentieth of the same ticket which made the saloon-keeper happy was held jointly by W. A. Nelson of W. F. Nelson & Son, 601 Front street, and John B. Robinson. Nelson has been investing with his father in the lottery for about a year past, buying two tickets each month. He won small amounts several times, and in September, besides the two regular tickets, took the third and lucky one with Robinson. Upon the receipt of the money Nelson invested the $1,250 in his business, while Robinson made all the members of his family happy by presenting them with handfuls of $20 pieces.

Yet another large sum was won in this city in September. Two twentieths of ticket 39,526, which drew the second capital prize of $100,000, were also held here and cashed through Wells, Fargo & Co's Bank.—San Francisco (Cal.) Chronicle Oct. 8.

The head and foot dams, sub-flumes and a small portion of the main flume of the Golden Gate mine, near Oroville, were washed away, and the debris lines the river banks for many miles below, but all this wreckage is being successfully collected by the company and will be rafted back to the claim. The loss of the company can not be less than $50,000.

AN OLD LAND MARK.

Among the old land marks of San Francisco, and around which nothing but pleasant memories cling, is the PACIFIC BANK. No depositors can say they have lost money in this staunch institution. It stands at the head of all that is just and right, and has become a synonym through twenty-five years of continued prosperity, of all that is solid, substantial and reliable in a financial sense.

Catarrh

Is a complaint which affects nearly everybody, more or less. It originates in a cold, or succession of colds, combined with impure blood. Disagreeable flow from the nose, tickling in the throat, offensive breath, pain over and between the eyes, ringing and bursting noises in the ears, are the more common symptoms. Catarrh is cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which strikes directly at its cause by removing all impurities from the blood, building up the diseased tissues and giving healthy tone to the whole system.

"For several years I have been troubled with that terribly disagreeable disease, catarrh. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla with the very best results. It cured me of that continual dropping in my throat, and stuffed-up feeling. It has also helped my mother, who has taken it for run down state of health and kidney trouble. I recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla to all as a good medicine." MRS. S. D. HEATH, Putnam, Conn.

"OH FORTUNE, FORTUNE,

All Men Call Thee Fickle"—You Are Running With Wagner Now.

Mr. J. Wagner, of Pinos Altos, New Mexico, is certainly one man who is not "out of suit with fortune." The Fickle goddess is chumming with him, and he has Heitzelman & Turner to thank for it. Several months ago Mr. Wagner wrote to those gentlemen enclosing five dollars for five quarter tickets in the Beneficencia Publica lottery, at the City of Mexico. Otis Turner selected the numbers and sent them to Mr. Wagner. After the drawing on the 12th of Oct., Mr. Turner looked over the numbers and saw that ticket No. 5616 had drawn $10,000. This was one of the numbers sent to Mr. Wagner and entitled him to $2,500, one quarter of the whole. The lucky holder was informed of his good luck, and sent his ticket to the State National Bank. It was promptly cashed by Messrs. Heitzelman & Turner.

After paying the ticket Messrs. Heitzelman & Turner presented it at the El Paso National and were promptly given $2,500 for it by Cashier Austin, and no questions asked. The El Paso National Bank is authorized by the Beneficencia Publica Lottery Company to cash, without discount, all winning tickets sold in this State.—El Paso Times.

CATARRH,

HAY FEVER, CATARRHAL DEAFNESS.

A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on application by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King St., Toronto, Canada.—Scientific American.

THE CHAMBER OF TORTURE

Is the apartment to which the unhappy sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism is confined. If ere the crisis of pain is reached, that fine preventive, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is used by persons of a rheumatic tendency, much unnecessary suffering is avoided. Nervines, anodynes and sedatives, while having none but a specific effect, are yet very desirable at times. Yet can they produce no lasting effect upon rheumatism, because they have no power to eliminate from the blood the rheumatic virus. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters does this, and checks at the outset a disease which, if allowed to gain headway, it is next to impossible to dislodge or to do more than relieve. Rheumatism, it should be remembered, is a disease with a fatal tendency from its proneness to attack the heart. A resort to the Bitters should, therefore, be prompt. Dyspepsia, kidney complaint, malaria and nervousness are relieved by it.

It is to live twice when you can enjoy the recollection of your former life.

"O to be dead and done with the trouble
That fills each day with a dreary pain."
This is the moan of many a woman
Who thinks she can never be well again.
"It were better for me and better for others
If I were dead," and their tears fall fast.
Not so, not so, O wives and mothers,
There's a bow of hope in the sky at last,
and it tells you that the storm of disease which has spread its shadow over you will give way to the sunshine of renewed health, if you are wise, and try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It can and will effectually cure all female weaknesses and derangements, and no woman who has not tried it need despair, for a trial will convince her that it is the very thing she needs to restore her to the health she fears forever lost.

To cleanse the stomach, liver, and system generally, use Dr. Pierce's Pellets. 25 cents.

THE STORY OF A FLOWER.

A spotless thing enough, they said,
The drift, perchance, from foreign lands,
Washed in atop of mighty tides
And lightly left along the sands.

Was it the treasure of some shell?
Some islander's forgotten bead?
A wave-worn polyp from the reef?
The gardener said: "It is a seed."

"Bury it," said he, "in the soil;
The earth will quicken here, as there,
With vital force—so fair the seed,
The blosom must be wondrous fair!"

Ah, woe, to lose the ample breath
Of the salt wastes! To see no more
The sacrifice of morning burn
And blot the stars from shore to shore.

Ah, woe, to go into the dark!
Was it for this, the buoyant slide
Up the steep surge, the flight of foam,
The great propulsion of the tide?

To lose the half-developed dream
Of unknown powers, the bursting throe
Of destinies to be fulfilled,
And go into the dark—ah, woe!

But the mold closed above the seed
Relentlessly; and still as well
All life went on; the warm winds blew;
The strong suns shone; the soft rains fell

Whether he slept, or waited there
Unconscious, after that wild pang—
Who knows? There came to him at last
A sense as if some sweet voice sang;

As if, throughout the universe,
Each atom were obeying law
In rhythmic order. In his heart
He felt the same deep music draw.

And one sharp thrill of tingling warmth
Divided him; as if the earth
Throbbed through him all her stellar might
With the swift pulse of some new birth.

Up the long spirals of his stems
What currents coming from afar,
What blessedness of being glows—
Was he a blossom or a star?

Wings like the brown the great moths though
His pinions rippling on the breeze—
Did ever a king's banner stream
With such resplendent stains as these?

Over what honey and what dew
His fragrant gossamers uncurled!
Forgotten be that seed's poor day,
Free, and a part of this high world!

A world of winds, and showers aslant,
With gauzy rainbows everywhere,
Cradled in silken sunshine, rocked
In skies full of delicious air!

Ah, happy world, where all things live
Creatures of one great law, indeed;
Bound by strong roots, the splendid flower—
Swept by great seas, the drifting seed!

—Harriet Prescott Spofford, in St. Nicholas.

BELLS OF BETHLEHEM.

The Prettiest Women to Be Found Around Jerusalem.

There is a market inside the Jaffa gate, and I can see it just under me as I write. Great piles of oranges and lemons lie upon the flag sidewalk, and there are scores of women with baskets of vegetables before them. Many of these are from Bethlehem, and the Bethlehem girls are the prettiest you see in Jerusalem. They have straight, well-rounded forms, which they clothe in a long linen dress of white, beautifully embroidered in silk, so that a single gown requires many months of work. This dress is much like an American woman's night gown without the frills and laces. It falls from the neck to the feet and is open at the front of the neck in a narrow slit as far down as a modest decollete fashionable dress. Over this they have sleeveless cloaks of dark red stripes and their heads are covered with long shawls of linen beautifully embroidered. Just above her forehead each girl carries her dowry in the shape of a wreath-like strip of silver coins which stand on end fastened to a string, and crown the forehead with money. Some of the girls have several rows of these coins and some have crowns of gold. Not a few have coins of silver and gold the size of our $20 gold pieces hung to strings about their necks, and none of the women hide their pretty faces, as do those Mohammedan girls near by, who, in shapeless white gowns with flowery white and red veils covering the whole of their faces, look like girls playing ghosts in white sheets. Beside these are Russian girls in the peasant costumes of modern Europe and Jewish maidens in gowns and flowered shawls. There are Greek priests, with high, black caps, and monks of all kinds, such as you see under the black cowls of Europe. The Syrian, the Turk, the Bedouin, the African, the Armenian and the Greek, are all in that crowd below me, and among them all is the form of the ubiquitous American traveler, who, in pith helmet hat and green sun umbrella, has conquered the East as well as the West.—F. G. Carpenter's Jerusalem Letter in St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Johnny on the Wasp.

A wasp is a six-legged bird that lives mostly in trees and under the eaves of barnes, and you can not taim him; he is too busy. Never stroke his fur the wrong way, because it makes him mad, and when a wasp is mad I don't want nothin to do with him. He has what they call "a stinger," and when he goes out a stingering, boys must keep away from him. I leaned up agin one once when he was busy, and I jumped much as a feet; ma had to put a mud pie on the place. I hit a wasp's nest with a stone once, and the boss wasp chased me clean acrost the lot so fast that when I got over the fence I tore my pants; then pa spanked me till I wished I had let the old wasp sting me. Some say wasps make honey, but if the honey is as hot as their stingerin' I don't want none. P says the stingerin' ain't so bad at first as the rekolekshuns of it for a few days. He ought to know, cos me and my brother like got on the roof and poked a big nest from the peek down in the barnyard while pa was milkin.'—Toledo Blade.

A KANSAS QUAIL HUNT.

A Sportsman's Experience on a Bright, Frosty December Morning.

Seven years ago a friend called on me one bright, frosty December morning. He had his dog and gun with him. He wanted to hunt a distant field where quail were plentiful. I told him that my ground was the best in the country, and I declined to go seven miles to shoot over strange ground. We decided to hunt a low lying creek bottom, on which plum bushes grew, and which was close to cornfields. My friend had urgent need for forty birds.

"Sam," I said, "when forty birds are killed we will stop shooting."

"Forty grandmothers," he remarked.

"I mean it," I said. "We will get them before we get through this plum patch," which was about a quarter of a mile long, and which lined both banks of the creek. I crossed the creek, called my eager dog back, pulled her ear, and said, "Go ahead, and go slow." She worked steadily at a slow trot. Suddenly she turned and stood, with twisted head and uplifted foot and horizontal tail, gazing into a dense clump of bushes. I whistled warningly to my friend, and then flushed the birds, and missed with both barrels. The covey was exceedingly large. The birds flew into an open space of an acre, where the grass was about a foot high, and there scattered widely. About the same time my friend's dog, a headstrong, stupid pointer, flushed a covey, and they crossed the creek and settled in the grass, scattering widely also. I beckoned him. He crossed the creek, and wished to advance at once to the sport.

"Sam," I said, "you need forty birds. I don't like to say anything against your dog. He is the best prairie chicken dog I ever saw, but he is a lunkhead on quail. Tie him up. Let Queen beat this grass for us and we will get the forty birds."

My friend was indignant. But I coaxed him into tying his dog to a plum bush. We walked slowly to the grass. There I took Queen's soft ear in my hand, pinched it slightly and said: "Be careful. Go slow," and I cuffed her gently.

The intelligent dog began to beat the ground. My friend shot to the right and I to the left. What a hunt that was! The dog worked slowly and beautifully. The birds lay to her well. Her face glowed with pleasure. The shooting was sufficiently brisk to keep the guns warm. The lunkhead pointer howled his disapproval. We shot the grass patch over in twenty-five minutes. Each marked down his dead birds as well as he could, and kept count of the number. The last bird up and killed, I turned to my friend, and with an inquiring lift of my eyebrows said: "Well?"

"I have twenty-seven down," he replied.

"And I have twenty-three," I said.

He loosened his dog and cried: "Dead birds, dead birds!"

The two dogs, envious of each other, worked as nailers are alleged to work, and brought in bird after bird until forty-three quail were in our bags. The other seven were probably winged, and escaped by long and fast running. I never had but one more enjoyable hunt than that.—Frank Wilkeson in New York Sun.

The Ideal War Correspondent.

The ideal war correspondent must be a man who has among other things the gift of tongues. He must speak in addition to the ordinary European languages some of the Asiatic, including Afghanistan, and some African, including Soudanese, Ashantee, Abyssinian and Zulu. He must have a lovely temper, amiable as a woman and as affable as a candidate who is canvassing for your vote, and at the same time he must be big and ugly enough to scare off whole armies. He must be able to ride anything from a giraffe to a rat, and be able to sit in the saddle for 100 miles at a stretch, to go without eating for a week, to write a good, legible round hand so the clerk at the telegraph station can read it. He must write at the rate of a column an hour, and often write eight columns and then gallop back to the scene of action. He must be able to tell every move that is going to be made and scent a battle long before it takes place, and then while it is raging he must tell how it is going and what will be the result long before it terminates. All these accomplishments would make a man an ideal correspondent, but there never was such a man. Julius Cæsar would have made a good one if there had been such men in those days, and Napoleon the First would have eclipsed Julius Cæsar if he could have learned to be truthful.—London Cor. New York Mail and Express.

Which Lead to Perdition.

I do not believe in bringing up the young to know life, as it is said. I should just as soon think of bringing up a child by cutting some of the cords of his body and lacerating his nerves and scarring and tattooing him and making an Indian of him outright as an element of beauty as I should think of developing his manhood by bringing him up to see life—to see its abominable lusts, to see its hideous incarnations of wit, to see its infernal wickedness, to see its extravagant and degrading scenes, to see its miserable carnalities, to see its imaginations set on fire of hell, to see all those temptations and delusions which lead to perdition. Nobody gets over the sight of these things. They who see them always carry scars. They are burned. And though they live, they live as men that have been burned. The scar remains.—Henry Ward Beecher in New York World.

Danger in Dead Rats.

It has been claimed for years that rats first introduced the terrible trichinæ in swine and then, through fresh pork and bacon, into human bodies. Dr. Landrey, in The Popular Science News, supports this theory with personal observations, and cites a number of cases showing that dead rats, mice and cats should be kept away from hogs. It is a crime to throw a dead rat to the hogs with such facts in mind.—Chicago Times.

"Uncle Remus."

WHERE AND HOW JET IS FOUND.

Claims of the Whitby People in Regard to Its Formation.

Jet is a shining black substance which is found in seams dissociated from other black minerals, and not in the coal regions of England, but in others, notably near Whitby, in Yorkshire. It occurs also in Saxony and in the amber districts on the Prussian shores of the Baltic. The scientists maintain that it is a variety of coal, but the Whitby folks adduce many circumstances that go to prove that it must have been at some time in a gummy or semi-liquid state quite unlike coal from ligneous sources. Bits of vegetable substances are often found imbedded in it, also flies' wings and other small articles, which favor the Whitby theory.

The stratum called jet rock is found mostly at Whitby, in a sort of shale, which, when distilled, yields ten gallons of oil a ton. The nature of the connection between this oil and jet cannot now be determined, though some connection evidently existed in past times. There is hard jet and soft jet, the former being the best. It occurs in detatched pieces, ranging in size from a domino up to those many pounds in weight. The largest piece ever found was six feet long, five inches wide and one and a half inches thick. The British museum refused to give ten guineas for it, but a dealer paid fifteen for it and cut it up into crisses of unusual size. How long jet, or black amber, as it was formerly called, has been worked at Whitby is not known, but certainly for many centuries.

In a tumulus or barrow near the town the skeleton of a lady was found, supposed to belong to the ancient British days, before the date of the Danish invasions, and with it were earrings of jet two inches long by a quarter of an inch thick. They were heart shaped, with a hole in the upper part for the wire. Jet possesses considerable electric qualities like amber. It was made into beads and rosaries in the middle ages by the monks. As a trade it had not much activity till the beginning of the present century. The Spaniards made beads and rosaries of the soft kind of jet, and when English ladies began to wear it in mourning the Whitby industry began to flourish. At first the workers used only knives and files, but Matthew Hill discovered a method of turning this brittle substance in a lathe. The largest find ever made was forty years ago, at North Batts, a spot in the neighborhood of Whitby, and consisted of 370 pieces of stones, valued at $1,250. The jet is picked up on the shore, at the foot of the cliffs, but this is of an inferior quality. A dangerous mode of obtaining it is to cut down the face of the cliff, until a jet seam is reached. It is also tunneled for twenty miles inland, near Bilsdale, in the Cleveland hills. The men rent the workings, as in the copper and tin mines of Cornwall, and they may work a month without coming across a bit of the precious stuff. The prices for the best hard jet is three shillings a pound; for the soft, one shilling. The Whitby variety is the finest known, as it is tougher and more elastic than any other, and admits of a higher polish. Many articles sold in the shops as Whitby jet are derived from the Pyrenees, and are liable to break through sudden heat or cold, which is due to a slight per cent. of sulphur in the Spanish variety.

He Loved His Dog.

In the greatest of the ancient Hindoo poems—the sacred book of the Mahabharata—there is a passage of exceptional beauty and tenderness, which records the reception of King Yudiauthira at the gate of Paradise. A pilgrim of the heavenly city, the king had traveled over vast spaces, and one by one the loved ones, the companions of his journey, had all fallen and left him alone, save his faithful dog, which still followed. He was met by Indra and invited to enter the holy city. But the king thinks of his friends who have fallen on the way and declines to go in without them. The god tells him they are all within, waiting for him. Joyful, he is about to seek them, when he looks upon the poor dog, who, weary and wasted, crouches at his feet, and asks that he, too, may enter the gate. Indra refuses, and thereupon the king declares that to abandon his faithful and dumb friend would be as great a sin as to kill a Brahmin.

Away with that felicity whose price is to abandon the faithful!
Never, come weal or woe, will I leave my faithful dog.
The poor creature, in fear and distress, has trusted in my power to save him;
Not, therefore, for life itself, will I break my plighted word.

In full sight of heaven he chooses to go to hell with his dog, and straightway descends, as he supposed, thither. But his virtue and faithfulness change his destination to heaven, and he finds himself surrounded by his old friends and in the presence of the gods, who thus honor and reward his humanity and unselfish love.—John G. Whittier.

The American Type.

The collection of portraits of Julius Cæsar in the February Scribner are specially noteworthy on account of the resemblance of the features to the American type. Take, for instance, plate 7, from the bust in the British museum. Is not this almost a perfect American face, such as one meets daily, and which abounds in New England? One very notable characteristic is the small chin. The American jaw and chin are supposed to be deteriorating, and yet here we find their prototype in a face some 2,000 years old, and in the features of a man whose achievements have been the marvel of the world. With this example before us, we are justified in suspecting that the narrowing jaw is an evolution of civilization, and marks a change rather than a decline of power.—Home Journal.

A Question.

Unity is never going to be the test of the true education. The true progress will suffer no such lowering of its ideal. It will keep before it, as its aim, the development of man, and the whole man, as man. But it will ask whether we have not overlooked some of man's faculties. It will inquire with what reason we have in the past instituted a feudal system among the human powers, which relegates some of them to an undignified servitude, and gives to others all the honor and esteem. Have we not overstepped the limits of science in this respect?—Science.

AN EXCESS OF BOREDOM.

A Millionaire Tired of Life Finds a New Kind of Amusement.

A famous millionaire sat on the edge of a table in the Casino at Newport one night and stared at his boots in dismay.

"Yaw!" he yawned, in an excess of boredom, as he raised his eyebrows and rammed his hands deep into his pockets, "It's slow; monstrously slow."

Apparently it was. One or two men in faultless attire smoked near a window. Others sprawled in languid desperation in the deep armchairs, and an eminent stock speculator added drowsiness to it all by snoring with subtle but penetrating regularity in the corner. It was a sultry night, and the negro waiters mopped their black faces as they whispered together in the corridor. The ennuied millionaire could almost hear the lapping of the water in the harbor against the sides of his beautiful steam yacht. His horses moved uneasily in the heat without and rattled the big pole chain impatiently.

It was nearly midnight in the queen of American watering places, and nothing was going on! The millionaire kicked his heels peevishly against the table and motioned to one of the waiters. They all scrambled forward in such haste that the oldest one slipped and almost fell. The great man smiled, whereat a wave of joy passed over the dusky group, and all but one retired with teeth in full review. Who is unhappy when a millionaire smiles?

"Is the champagne well iced?" asked the man of means, good naturedly.

"It is indeed, sah. De las' bot'le wuz froze dead herd."

"Bring me some."

When the waiter poured it out it was so cold that it dribbled slowly into the glass and sent up a milk white mist almost as thick as the foam that raced to the top of the glass, while the dew gathered in beads on the bottle. The millionaire smiled gently as he gazed at the champagne, and then he glanced at the panting waiter.

"Would you like to shiver, Thomas?" he asked solemnly.

"Me, sah?" said the waiter with a chuckle. "Dere ain't not'in' in dis heah wuld ud make me shivah t'night, sah—no'n'deedy."

"Oh, yes, there is."

"Squse me, sah, but I'm roastin', I am, 'n I don' b'lieve I'll evah be col' again."

"I'll make you shiver in two minutes by the watch or I'll give you $50."

"Go ahead, sah!"

Without more ado the millionaire took the champagne bottle from the other's hand, turned it upside down, thrust it calmly down the back of the darky's neck and left it there, while the champagne dripped gently down the waiter's spine. Then, watch in hand, he waited, while the loungers sat up and the waiters moved in from the corridors with their eyes fairly starting from their heads.

"Don' you shivah, yo fool niggah!" said the foremost of them in a hoarse whisper to Thomas. "I'y' do I'll—I'll kick yo' head offen y' body, shuh. Y' got a chance ter pay me dem seving dollahs now, an' if y' miss it I'll lam y'—I will fer a fac'."

Meanwhile the writer stood there with pursed lips, staring eyes and clenched fists. His head was bent forward and his legs spread apart, while his breath came in mighty snorts. The loungers were crowding around with their watches in their hands making bets rapidly while the time wore slowly away. Presently the millionaire shouted:

"One minute!"

"Oh, Lordy!" moaned Thomas in a voice like the sorrowful roar of a cavern by the sea, "I'm a-goin', I'm a-goin!"

"Remember dem seving dollahs!"

There was an awful hush, the sound of the grinding of African teeth, a wild "Huh-wu-whoooo!" followed by helpless chattering, and Thomas stood shaking like an aspen leaf, with one eye turned appealingly on the seven dollar man, while the other sought the face of the millionaire. One after another the waiters essayed the test, and for two hours the Casino was the liveliest spot in America. Then the famous millionaire climbed contentedly to the seat of his cart and murmured as he drove home in the moonlight: "It wasn't so monstrously slow after all."—Blakely Hall in New York World.

Mulcted for a Mule Collar.

A few instances out of a multitude will suffice to show the way in which the government is in the habit of dealing with its servants. An officer, who has since risen to the highest rank in the service, was for many years engaged in explorations upon the plains. After a particularly long and severe trip, he turned in his transportation to a quartermaster in Texas. Upon investigation it was found that a mule collar was missing, but this was thought nothing of at the time, such losses being inevitable in the course of a long trip. This occurred in 1852. In 1867 a letter was received by the officer in question, then a major general, asking what disposition he had made of that mule collar, and requesting its immediate return. No attention was paid to this missive, and the correspondence ceased for the time being, but in a few months another epistle of like tenor came to hand, and to this day demands are made at intervals for the surrender of the mule collar which was lost upon the staked plains in 1852. At least twenty letters have been written the general of the army concerning a trace chain which he had upon his papers when stationed in California in 1848, and which it is alleged he never accounted for, but presumably converted to his own uses.—Globe Democrat.

A Horological Marvel.

A large clock just completed in Germany by Christian Martin is said to surpass in wonderful construction all previous achievements. It is designed to show the seconds, minutes, quarter hours, hours, days, weeks, months, the four seasons, the years and leap years until the close of 99,999 A. D. It gives indications for every latitude, and records the successive phases of the moon. It not only strikes the quarters and hours but the minutes as well, sixty different symbolic figures performing the work. A night watchman blows the hours of the night on his horn, a cock crows at sunrise, and a cuckoo appears in spring. There are moving pictures, a bell ringing sacristan who kneels and folds his hands, and flute toned musical works, besides other interesting features.—Arkansaw Traveler.

ERCKMANN-CHATRIAN'S FIRST.

The Clever Ruse Which an Old Foreman Employed to Get It Published.

I read in The Tribune of this morning a very interesting Paris letter about the deplorable quarrel between Erckmann and Chatrian, the literary partners who, under the united name of Erckmann-Chatrian, have written so many patriotic novels, most of which are translated into English and much read in America. The particulars furnished by your Paris correspondent respecting the feud now dividing the two are completed by the following details, which I get from La Republique Francaise. They are highly interesting, picturesque and true, since they bear the signature of M. Edouard Siebecker, a well known French patriot and a literary friend of Erckmann and Chatrian.

Erckmann and Chatrian's first novel, "The Illustrious Doctor Matheus," had been offered for publication as a "feuilleton" to the Paris paper Le Constitutionnel. The feuilleton is a standing feature of all French journals; it is a novel published daily, in slices, at the lower end of the pages of the papers. The novel had been rusting for a long while in the drawers of the paper, when they found a friend inside the place. And now, to cut the story short, I will merely translate the narrative published by Siebecker.

Old Nathan Sichel was the foreman of Le Constitutionnel's composing room. He interested himself in these two young writers, who came every month, each in his turn, to inquire about the future of their copy, and he resolved to help them along. The occasion to do so came at last. It was on a Sunday. On the preceding day the word "end" had been printed at the bottom of the feuilleton or novel then in course of publication and the readers expected another to begin the day after. Sichel invited to breakfast the compositor who had the key of the bureau in which were kept the manuscripts of the novels already approved by the management and which was nicknamed the "bear's cage." He managed to get his friend thoroughly drunk. Then he repaired to the paper, and affecting to be ignorant of everything, he raised a terrible stir about that "animal and dunce," X, who did not turn up to open the manuscript chest, and thus prevented him from distributing the "copy" of the new novel to be published.

"Well," said he at last, "I have just fished out in another drawer a novelette. "I'll distribute enough of it to fill up the place of this number's feuilleton." It was the manuscript of his young friends. On the arrival at the office of the managing editor, old Sichel told him all about it.

"What's the name of the author?" asked the editor.

"Well, sir, a queer name. E. Krian, or Chatrimann. No, no. See, Erckmann Chatrian."

"Don't know. But perhaps just on this account the novel may prove better than others. How many feuilletons?" (How many days will it take to publish it?)

"Five or six, by rough guessing."

"That's very much. The director may be down on us. But, after all, you do not have the key of the 'bear's chest,' nor I either; and we have to fill up the bottom space reserved for the feuilleton. We cannot print in its place: 'Ground floor to rent.' Against force no resistance is possible. Let it go!"

And it did go. "The Illustrious Doctor Matheus," not for five or six days only, as had said the cunning Sichel, but it lasted fifteen feuilletons, or days, and had a tremendous success. The door leading to fame and fortune had been opened to Erckmann and Chatrian. Let me add that they were not ungrateful toward old Sichel, whose eyesight soon failed him, and who was kept in affluence until his death by the two young writers whom he had so smartly protected, and who are, unfortunately, no longer the same friends they were for thirty years.—Letter in New York Tribune.

Fern Gathering in Killarney.

The bristle fern delights in shade and moisture, and our first find was in a rocky cleft in the immediate neighborhood of the Tork waterfall. Subsequently within the deep recesses of a cave, the mouth of which opened upon the upper lake and could only be approached by a boat, we discovered several splendid specimens, one of which, with a creeping rhizome, some three feet long, contained no fewer than thirty perfect fronds. Nothing that I have ever seen in my varied experience of fern life equaled the delicacy and pellucidness of these fronds, nurtured in the darkness and the mist. The veins were so prominent, and the green portion so like a membranous wing around the veins, that it resembled more a beautiful sea weed than a fern. In this natural cave we also discovered some of our finest specimens of the adiantum, or maiden hair fern. This plant is called the true maiden hair, to distinguish it from some other ferns which share its familiar name. The bright evergreen tint, the elegant form, and lightly waving attitudes of this fern render it very attractive, and when growing against the side of the sea washed rock, or any moist place in any abundance, no fern exceeds it in beauty.—T. Johnston Evans in Popular Science Monthly.

The Greatest Effort of His Life.

Professor Cadenza—Do not disturb me. I am engaged on a work of profound importance.

Pupil—Opera, oratorio or prelude?

Professor C.—Neither. I am thinking over an overture to her father. He has red hair, a quick temper and don't like me. Leave me for the present.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Looks Like a Mistake.

A naturalist who has been prying into the matter says that the jackass bird has become totally extinct. We think there must be some mistake here. It was only yesterday that we saw at least a dozen men carrying canes or folded umbrellas on their shoulders.—Detroit Free Press.

DRESSES FOR AUTUMN.

Charming Costumes Designed in Paris for American Ladies.

Another model also combines green and mahogany, but in this dress the green is grayish green wool, with lengthwise short threads of mahogany, of dark green, and black at wide intervals, made up over mahogany velvet. The mediæval cuirass of the wool is double-breasted, and is even around the hips, where it is slashed in battlemented squares that show the dark velvet underneath. The double front laps to the right at the waist line, and above this opens in U shape with curved revers of the velvet, and also a velvet plastron and collar. The straight green wool skirt is caught up in folds on each hip, and drawn down in curves across the front, displaying the velvet there, and is slashed at the foot up each side to show a tower-shaped bit of the velvet underskirt.

A dark blue serge dress, with woven borders of palms in cashmere coloring, has a broad chatelaine plait on the left side of its straight skirt, catching it up to show a lower skirt that has the palm border. A sash of blue armure comes down from the front of the waist to meet a passementerie ornament, and these together appear to hold the plait in place. With this is worn a Directoire coat of the serge with its back cut princesse, and extending from neck to foot, while the sides and front are a short double-breasted jacket, with revers of the palm border opening over a red velvet waistcoat, which is also double-breasted, though only seen at the throat and waist line.

A cloth and armure-striped silk combination dress is in the stylish mahogany shade, with black introduced in brocaded fern leaves at the foot of the armure breadths, and also in a great sash, or rather a girdle, as it merely encircles the waist. A straight gathered breadth of the silk, with its fern border at foot, is in the front, with sides of the mahogany cloth that seem to open on the silk, and there are six black passementerie palm leaves placed each side on the cloth near the silk; two breadths of the bordered silk form the straight back of the skirt. The cloth round waist, full on the shoulders and without darts, has a V-shaped plastron of black velvet, and a fold of black velvet is let in from high in the armholes to meet at the waist line under a wide girdle of black velvet or of black armure silk. The high collar is black velvet covered with black passementerie, and it has a point of the gimp below the front falling on the plastron; this point is surrounded by a frill of black lace, giving the effect of a cravat. The cloth sleeves are full at the top, with a point of black velvet let in and a cuff to match.

GRASSES FOR PASTURE.

Valuable Experiment Made at the Wisconsin Agricultural Station.

The experiments made at the agricultural station of the University of Wisconsin, as given in the second annual report, have afforded some interesting results. For the purpose of testing the advantages of using mixed grasses for hay and pasture, four acres were devoted to experiments. The mixed seeds sown were timothy, orchard, Italian rye, perennial rye, tall oat, red-top, Kentucky blue, with the clovers. These grass-seeds were in nearly equal quantity, except that timothy and orchard-grass predominated; the whole twenty-nine pounds to the acre. They were sown early in May, on spring plowing and fine harrowing, a part of the land to these alone, and a part with a light seeding of barley. The seeds germinated and grew well. The advantage of seeding to grass-seed alone was very distinctly exhibited. We are informed that this portion of the field "flourished in a most surprising manner, while that with the barley grew spindling and pale." The latter, however, did well after the barley was cut, although the difference was very visible to the end of the season. So heavy was the growth when seeded alone, that over three weighted tons of hay were taken the same season from two and a third acres. No hay was cut from the barley seeded part. After the mowing, fine pasture was furnished for several weeks in autumn estimated as worth $2 an acre for cattle at 25 cents a week. When the barley was sown, the pasture was worth about half this amount. The hay was worth at least $10 an acre, at $8 a ton. Prof. Henry, who conducted these experiments, is confident that a mixed pasture of this kind will be worth $3 an acre more each year than a common clover and timothy sod. The grass is more in quantity, and the succession continues longer. On the whole, so far as this single trial goes, it furnishes good evidence in favor of mixed seeding, and in sowing alone without the shade of grain crops, barley being regarded as one of the best to seed with.—Chicago Journal.

BRIGHT SCOTTISH BIRDS.

They Boycotted a Sparrow Whose Voice Got Out of Tune.

A correspondent of the Scotsman, who has been devoting some attention to bird language, with a view to ascertain to what extent birds really communicate with one another by voice-note, relates a curious circumstance which recently came under his notice. A brood of sparrows, he says, had been hatched under the eaves of a house contiguous to mine, and on leaving the nest the family came en masse to my shrubberies for several consecutive mornings. One of the young birds, which had a singularly grating and disagreeable chirp, was systematically boycotted for several days, but at last the parent birds, evidently taking pity on the poor forlorn creature, came with the rest of the brood, and taking up a position in a fir tree a few yards from the laurel in which the disconsolate fledgeling was sitting, all commenced to chirp most vigorously in perfect unison. The poor little fellow for some time tried strenuously, but vainly, to imitate the sound. At last he began to lower his tones by a most delicate system of semi-chromatics, till, in response to the apparently encouraging cries of his friends, he hit the real note. Then his tones became simply blatant, but continued perfectly correct, and he was at once welcomed into the family group, and all flew off in high state of excitement and jubilation on a feeding expedition. I am sorry to say that on several occasions the young sparrow has relapsed, but, by the aid of his friends, he always manages to get the correct family note, and the same rejoicings are repeated over the return of the "one that had gone astray."

In a recent number of the Dumphries Standard another interesting story is told—of a tomtit's nest with five young ones in the letter-box of Mr. M'Adam at White Park, near Castle Douglas. The little songster seemed determined to bring forth its progeny in a place where it would be secure from the prying eye and ruthless hand of mischievous youth. At first it began to cover the bottom of the box with a soft green moss, which the owner removed several times. Apparently, however, it had faith in his kind-heartedness and by its persistence conquered him. It then built a very neat nest in the centre of the box, and laid five eggs, all of which were safely hatched. During the incubation letters were frequently found right over the little dame, who sat patiently under the load. On several occasions it had by some means managed to push some of the letters out at the aperture by which the postman had put them in. When Mr. M'Adam happened to open the box himself, it sometimes raised its wings and hissed, as if angry at the intrusion. On the other hand, when his niece went, as was generally the case, it was quite pleased, allowing her to stroke its plumage.

LOOKING FOR EDEN.

America Given a Chance for the Honor of Holding the Site.

Still another theory of the site of Eden is given by a Chicago correspondent: I have read with interest the answers and correspondence on the above question in your valuable columns. In addition to the opinions already given permit me to suggest the following: The difficulty in fixing a site of the land of Eden is to make it correspond to the description given in Genesis, which is either inspired or traditional; I believe it is the latter.

As the result of careful investigation I would place the land of Eden north of the Gulf of Mexico, including, at least the States of Louisiana and Mississippi. The garden planted "eastward in Eden" was on the west bank of the Mississippi and below the mouth of the Arkansas river. The river that "went out of Eden to water the garden" was the Mississippi, in the description called the Euphrates, which after passing through the garden, "became into four heads." The name of the first river was "Pison" (the Arkansas) "which compasseth the whole land of Havilah (Kansas and Colorado), where there is gold, bdellium and onyx stone." The second river was "Gihon" (the Missouri), "which compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia, or Cush," (Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska). The third river was the "Hiddikel (the Ohio) which goeth eastward to Assyria" (Indiana and Ohio); and the fourth is the "Euphrates," that "went out of (passed through) Eden."

When Adam and Eve were "sent forth from the garden" and a "Cherubim was placed at the east of the garden," they settled near the Yazoo river in Washington county, Mississibpi, where the remains of their home may still be seen. When Cain was about 130 years old he left home with his family, two wives and their children, and went to dwell in the "land of Nod, on the east of Eden" (Tennessee and Kentucky), where he built a city called after the name of his eldest son, Enoch. The remains of this city exist at the present day, as well as many other evidences of the cities and homes of antediluvian Cainites and Sethites, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Northern lakes and from the Alleghenies to the Rockies in the United States, and throughout Mexico, Central and South America.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

—The landlord of a hotel at a fashionable summer resort asked a witty guest who was about to leave if he would not write some sentiment below his autograph on the hotel register. The wit immediately wrote: "I came here for rest and change. The waiter has the change and the landlord has the rest."

MASONRY.

This is the season when lodges of the Masonic fraternity elect officers to serve for the ensuing Masonic year and it may not be out place to make a few suggestions. Since history was first written there has never yet been a time of such great and general mental activity as at present. Not when the importation to Rome of all the creeds of the then known world had led to general skepticism and final disbelief in all those creeds was there such questioning of faiths and sifting of evidence as at present. What may be the final result of all this sifting and questioning it is not possible to foresee, but it is very certain that many dogmas and beliefs now firmly held by great numbers of people will be largely modified, if not entirely discarded by coming generations. The preservation of free institutions, and even of civilization appears to depend upon what religious beliefs are held in general acceptance. Rome was vigorous and strong and marched from conquest to conquest so long as the primitive religion was held in unquestioning faith. When general doubt pervaded the Roman mind the course of conquest was stopped and in the end Roman government, and even Roman civilization, were utterly destroyed. Later times afford ample proof of how much the fate of nations is dependent upon what the people believe. Belief in One God, the great Creator of heaven and earth, is the tie that has united the Jewish people into one family for ages; though scattered over all the earth aud among all nations and races of men. The grand foundation upon which Free Masonry rests is belief in God the Great Architect of the universe; and without open declaration of this belief it is impossible for any one to become a member of the order. Here is a center where all men may meet in harmony, and in the turmoil of thought now so prevalent here is a calm center where all may enjoy a haven of rest. Every member of the order knows that the attendance at meetings falls far short of including the whole membership. So long as the services at lodge meetings consist of nothing but a repetition of routine ceremonies this will continue to be so. Men cannot long endure the dull repetition of the same words and where this is the only attraction will not take enough interest to attend. There is ample opportunity in Free Masonry for something far different from this. The human being entering upon life in blindness and helplessness; the need for humble trust in our fellow men and faith in God; the opening of the mind to receive the light of reason; here are opportunities enough to make the meetings interesting. The progress of man in knowledge, his mastery of the arts and sciences, till in the fullness of his manhood he searches out the secrets of nature and fashions the crude materials supplied by nature into objects of beauty, usefulness and grandeur; here are themes that may very easily be made interesting enough to attract attendance. When man has exhausted the whole field of material things he is still unsatisfied and eagerly turns to seek for knowledge of a spiritual world. And the example of those who have been faithful unto death is ever the most powerful, and they are the most honored. Here again the teachings of Masonry are as sublime as ever entered the mind of man, and afford ample scope for the highest genius and the most profound learning. No difficulty will be met in securing attendance at lodge meetings if the subjects hinted at shall be treated properly. If due consideration be given to these matters lodges will select for their officers men who are capable of discussing such noble subjects; and, in fact, none other would be willing to accept the principal offices. If the course here suggested shall ever become the rule in Masonic lodges the grand old order will attain such dignity and importance as it never had before and will then be far more potent in influencing the lives of its members for good. In the mean time the officers who may serve in all the lodges for the ensuing year may do much by personal example as well as by precept to benefit their fellow men.

It may not have been more than a coincidence but a heavy fall in the price of silver followed the election of Reed as Speaker of the House of Representatives.

One of the very greatest advantages to be derived from sending young people away from home to attend school is that by so doing the mischievous interference of ignorant and unwise parents is avoided and the pupil is left to the unmarred training of skilled teachers. It matters little how learned, wise and diligent a teacher may be, if children are countenanced by parents in disobedience to their teacher, and in neglect of studies, it is not possible that creditable progress can be made in learning. As a rule teachers very earnestly strive to lead their pupils as rapidly as possible along the upward path of knowledge and take noble pride in accomplishing all the good that is possible. But if pupils who are almost grown to be young men and women will persist in idleness, and to every effort of the teacher will respond with nothing but surly indifference or brutal rudeness there is no reason why a teacher should waste time or burn out vital energy in the vain endeavor to make cultivated men and women of such perverse and coarse beings. Making bricks from the mud of the Nile without straw was a pleasant pastime compared to the soul-tiring task of trying to make well-informed and courteous young men and young women out of those who will not respond earnestly, gratefully and cheerfully to the efforts of the teacher. If parents will refuse or neglect to give their co-operation to the work of teaching it will be very little use sending their sons and daughters to school. Storing the mind with the contents of text books is far from being the highest good aimed at in education; but even this cannot be accomplished without patient effort on the part of the pupil. The noblest work of education, that which aims at purifying the heart and giving dignity and gentle courtesy to the manners, will be entirely frustrated if the pupil shall be encouraged by unwise parents to steadily resist, or actively oppose, the efforts of the teacher.

Common sense and practical ideas have superseded the wildcat boom in Los Angeles county. The Tribune says: "Plows are running in every direction. Orchards and vineyards are being much better cared for, and preparations are making for planting an unprecedented number of young fruit trees. The people have resolved to take care of their own interests and there is no doubt of magnificent success. This country is in a process of organization. Improvements to facilitate business and to provide conveniences are being rapidly made and order and system are becoming daily more conspicuous. Lands are offered on more favorable terms to occupants and cultivators; the stakes of town lots are pulled up and everything is put on a sensible and substantial basis."

Senator Cullom, of Illinois, has introduced a bill to cede to the Pacific Coast States and Territories all the lands within their borders. Should this bill become a law California could then put a vast area of land in such condition as would secure buyers and settlers in large numbers.

MARRIED.

HORTON—SCHALTEN—At Bishop, December 8th, 1889, Mr. J. M. Horton and Miss Maggie Schalten.

Andrew Bell was down Big Pine to-day.

The Grand Jury will meet next Tuesday.

What are we going to have for the holidays?

J. J. Gunn has gone to Darwin to attend to mining interests there.

Taxes are steadily coming in but there will be a large delinquent list owing to unpatented land entries.

Rain set in on Wednesday and continued till Thursday night. Much land in the valley is now in good order for plowing.

Mr. J. W. Robinson came down from Carson last Monday and stayed in the Valley the rest of the week looking after land matters.

The dairymen of the Coast counties complain bitterly of the low price of butter. First-class butter sells in San Francisco for 22 cents a pound.

A benefit entertainment will be given in Mairs' Hall on New Years eve. The management will endeavor to render the event as enjoyable as possible.

Pat. Downs says he will have a fine crop for the gathering next summer. Pat. has the largest ice-house in the United States and it is being well filled up.

The running stallion El Rio Rey is credited with winning for his owner during the past season the sum of $47,485. He is the property of Theodore Winters.

A large display of toys of all kinds for children; fancy goods and articles of beauty and use, suitable for Christmas presents, now on exhibition at RHINE'S.

The Georgia Minstrels talk of making a visit to Independence about Christmas time. Their last entertainment was very successful and their next—if they give one—will be better still.

Miss Annie Kohler, teacher of the Independence school, is preparing a Christmas tree for the children. Miss Kohler is tireless in her efforts to provide for the amusement of her pupils.

The following have been elected officers of Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M., to serve for the ensuing Masonic year, viz.: P. H. Mack, W. M.; John S. Gorman, S. W.; T. C. Boland, J. W.; C. Mulholland, Secretary; O. I. Mairs, Treasurer.

Tenmore Coffin and Mrs. Coffin, of Carson, have been at Independence during the week proving up on land on the line of the Eastside Canal. Chauncey Latta of the same place has been here during the week on the same business.

The Georgia Minstrels have decided to visit Independence and give an entertainment on the evening of Christmas day. A fine performance will be presented, full of fun and jollity. A ball will follow the performance. Mairs' Hall will be the place.

The largest fruit raisers in the State are now the largest planters of new orchards. This means that the men who know the most about the business of raising and selling fruit are the most assured of continued profit in the business and that there is no danger of over supply.

In the Tax-Collector's office new instances are discovered almost daily of mortgages that have not been assessed. This will force the mortgagor to pay the tax for the present year and take chance of getting repaid by the mortgagee. The county will not lose anything as the property is holding for the tax, but the failure to assess mortgages will cause trouble to individuals.

Mr. C. L. Rockwood left Independence last Tuesday morning for San Francisco. He is a civil engineer in the employ of the Government and since November 9th had been engaged in investigations all over Owens Valley to furnish data for a report on the amount of land that may be irrigated and the possible supply of water for the same.

It is reported that a rich vein of ore has been found at Havilah, in Kern county. Two tons of the ore were sent to San Francisco and after all expenses were paid left a profit of $700. Havilah was at one time a very prosperous camp but for a few years past not much was done there. The recent find gives promise of more prosperous days than ever for the place.

The Native Sons elected the following officers last Tuesday evening to serve for the ensuing six months: Past President, Bertrand Rhine; President, F. E. Densmore; First Vice-President, H. D. Gill; Second Vice-President, B. Lasky; Third Vice-President, Belles Carrasco; Treasurer, Henry Rhine; Financial and Recording Secretary, Albert Lewis; Marshall, W. S. Enos.

During the past few weeks storms have been very frequent on the Sierra Nevada Mountains throughout the entire length of Owens Valley. Far down their sides the mountains are covered with snow and with glasses it can be seen that the canyons are filled to a great depth. This ensures an abundance of water for next year. The snow that falls in the early winter packs solid and gives plenty of water all through the coming summer. Rains in the valley have started a fine growth of grass.

The New Railroad.

It is stated on good authority that a contract has been let for building the second section of the Union Pacific railroad. This contract is for a stretch of road 115 miles long, running southward from Pioche, Nevada, and extending into Inyo county. From the end of the stretch covered by this contract to Barstow the distance is 175 miles and it is expected that connection with the Santa Fé will be made at that point. This will not give any nearer connection with the C. & C. than would now be made at Mojave.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BISHOP, December 8, 1889.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—He sets up a denial. The Register denies each and every allegation set up in the complaint and yet he takes up four columns of his paper in rebuttal to charges alleged. I have not time nor space to review the whole of his elaborate article. I will mention some of the burning points however. In speaking of the article I had published in the INDEPENDENT he says: "To make a general assertion in regard to this extract, it is false all the way through." His saying so does not prove it to be so. There are men enough who know I have told the truth in regard to this matter. He says: "Singular as it may appear, it was Harger and not I who very emphatically said, 'Damn the instructions!' I think I can prove by the Board and by John Alexander that he did say, "Damn the instructions." He wanted the Board to take his medicine but did not want to take it himself because it was bitter. This conversation took place last July and not two years ago as he asserted. Now, in regard to the mortgages, I think it was impolitic to reduce the assessment on said mortgages. The most of them are held out of the county and some out of the State. All real estate in the county that is covered with mortgages is ample security for the money loaned thereon save in one or two instances. The 1840 acre tract that he mentions is known as the Broder or Barrows tract. It is worth almost double the face of the mortgage and as to its depreciation, I deny it unless the county has retrograded, which will not agree with published newspaper reports. The State Board, in regard to this matter, said: "It is a good guide for the Assessor to go by to assess property to the amount moneyed men are willing to take it as security." He says I stopped his paper for not denouncing the Hillside Water Company as "a gigantic thieving scheme." I did, but not so much for that as for him to pat them on the back and boom it as a great enterprise. This rich company stands to-day charged on the assessment books with the enormous sum of $480 in valuation. They will pay to the county as taxes the sum of $12, if they pay it at all. But still he was willing for them to hazard $200,000 worth of taxable property in the valley below. He says I have a niggardly and cinching disposition. Be it so. I have not shown it in his case for I have voted to give him $850 within the last three years for deputy hire. But yet he is not satisfied; he wants me to give him the whole pot. He says: "Any half-wit can make assertions." So he can, pard; but it takes an honest man to tell the truth. Among his proverbs you will see: "What! can't the county business get along with Harger?" I say yes, and without Chalfant, too. In the next county official directory we will both of us probably be dropped. The Assessor finds fault because the Board does not put in longer days. We can't furnish brains to run the county and keep the Assessor straight on the ten hour system. He is the hardest nut we ever tackled. Now I propose to show the Assessor's judgment, or rather lack of judgment. As an Assessor it is his duty to assess everybody as nearly equal as possible. We will see how he did it. Here are some examples: Nathan Rhine is assessed $13,000; Judge Hannah $140 for three horses; Mrs. M. Conklin $4 per acre for the Taboose, Curtis and Tibbetts ranches; George Shedd is assessed $7.87½ an acre for nearly the same quality of land. The Eastern Slope Agricultural Society was assessed at $10 per acre. I. P. Yaney, for land lying north, south and rear of it at $6 per acre. J. B. Chamberlain, for improvements, $600. Horace Smith, for same $1,200. Three years ago Munzinger & Phillippay were assessed $10 per acre for a four acre lot known as the Mahoney lot. It could not have been bought at that time for less than $1,500. I quote from memory but you you will find me nearly correct in all of these statements. Work horses are assessed at 60 per cent. below their selling price and stock cattle above their selling price. This is a sample of the Assessor's work. It is nothing but a botch of inconsistencies from beginning to end. The Board tried to equalize the assessment roll but the more they stirred it up the worse it smelled until the stench became so nauseating that the Board had to give it up as a bad job. It is true the whole roll is not quite as bad as the above but it is bad enough. Occasionally there will be a spark of intelligence flash athwart his superficial brain; but nothing of a solid or concrete form. I have said all I think necessary. I could say more but through modesty, and pity for the man, I forbear. Signed,

"YUM YUM."

A Correction

In an article published in this paper last week recommending Dr. George E. Pardee of San Francisco to all who need special treatment for the eyes, a mistake was made in the address. The correct address is 526 Montgomery street, not Kearney. No matter what may be the trouble with the eyes every sufferer may rely with the utmost confidence upon the skill and kindness of Dr. Pardee. Mr. Jacob Stock, of Hawthorne, Nevada, will also testify to the ability and kind attention of Dr. Pardee.

A Sensible Farmer.

E. Robinson, of Independence, butchered half a score of fine hogs this week. They were fattened on corn and will make hams and bacon of the finest quality. The lot averaged about 350 pounds each. He will butcher another lot in a few days. Mr. Robinson finds that it pays well enough to raise corn and convert it into hams, bacon and lard.

Estray Notice.

I have taken up for trespass, two heasses, not castrated. One is mouse-colored with black markings on the legs, the other is much lighter in color, with white legs and belly; neither of them are branded. The owner is requested to prove property, pay charges for keeping and advertising, and take them away, otherwise they will be sold at public auction thirty days from date. CHARLES STEWARD.

Big Pine, Nov. 27, 1889.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with he medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

IRRIGATION DEVELOPMENT.

It may be impossible to induce Congress to make an appropriation for irrigation works on the Pacific Coast. So little of this subject is known in the East that it is not even alluded to in the President's message. And yet the territory that may be reclaimed by irrigation is larger than some European Nations and would support more people. Congress appropriates money for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Millions are given for the erection of buildings in obscure towns and only a few lot owners and retail grocers are benefited. Nobody questions the right of Congress to make these appropriations, but surely the power by which they are made is ample to warrant appropriations for works that will make homes for millions of people, who in turn will create wealth incomprehensibly great. Should the men in Congress who are wise enough to see the importance of this great subject succeed in getting an appropriation for a beginning of irrigation works there is reason to believe that Owens Valley is one of the first places where work would be begun. The field that offers the best facilities for reclaiming the greatest area of land for the least outlay of money would surely be selected to begin with. Competent authority will report that no where else in the State of California can so much land be so cheaply and so quickly reclaimed as in Owens Valley. Private capital would at once be invested in this work were it not for the uncertainty caused by the action of Congress in connection with the irrigation of public lands. It is regarded as a very great evil when large tracts of land are held in an unimproved condition by private owners. For years past there has been a clamor about the cattle men holding land in an unimproved state. But what is wrong for the individual is not right for the Nation. The public land ought either to be so improved that it can be sold, or such legislation should be made as would induce private capital to make the necessary improvements. If the Government may charge a dollar and a quarter per acre for land surely it has the same right to improve the land so it will far more readily sell for many times that price than it can now be disposed of for the smaller sum. All the cost of the irrigation works necessary to reclaim the vast area of public lands on the Pacific Coast can be made by beginning where land can be so cheaply irrigated as in Owens Valley. Sell the land as fast as water is provided and devote the proceeds to irrigation works in other districts. Purchasers enough stand ready to buy all the land as soon as water is furnished and at prices that will amply repay the cost of constructing the necessary works.

A Big Irrigation Scheme.

It is currently reported that a company of English capitalists having a million dollars at their disposal are about to begin work for the reclaiming of a portion of the Mojave desert. The Los Angeles Tribune says the company now owns fifty-seven thousand acres. Arrangements for irrigating the property have already been concluded—at least it is so understood. To people generally the scheme will no doubt appear to be impracticable, or even impossible, but the syndicate, it seems, have confidence in the scheme. The soil has been carefully analyzed and found to possess exceptionally good qualities for fruit raising and farming purposes. It is the intention to build immense dams and reservoirs into which water from the Rio del Llano will be turned, and from thence will be conducted by a pipe line to the land on which it is to be used. A point about twenty-six miles distant from Alpine Station has been selected as the first, or upper, dam, and a number of others will be decided on as soon as the surveys are completed. Work has already been commenced on a branch line from the Southern Pacific at Alpine to the site of the first dam and work on the structure will be pushed ahead as soon as transportation is provided for the necessary materials.

Puzzled Weather Sharps.

The deer in the Sierra Nevada mountains have been very much puzzled about the weather this fall. Several times large numbers have been seen to come down into Owens Valley as if on their way over into the Inyo range, their usual winter haunt, but each time they came down to the valley they returned to the Sierra Nevada mountains. The past week or two must have convinced the deer that winter has fairly set in up among the higher ranges of the mountains.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of a Board of Directors, held on the 27th day of November, 1889, an assessment (No. 8) of five (5) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary at the office of the company, 205 Front street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 10th day of January 1890 will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 30th day of January 1890 to pay the delinquent assessment together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Independence, Inyo Co. Cal.

It was two hours later that Philip saddled and bridled Joe, the white horse, and set out for Mrs. Ellingsworth's. Strangely enough, as he sat at tea he had remembered the first malevolent expression in Jane Ellingsworth's face as his bride and he drove past that very noon. It had changed so quickly to smiles that he had doubted his eyes, but he trembled at his memory of it now, and the piece of paper that had fluttered to her feet, what could it be? Could it be she knew all; that while he was buying over the lawyer so that he should not use his terrible power, there might be near at hand an enemy to the death, who only toyed a moment with her poisoned arrow to shoot it when it would strike with deadliest effect? Philip had parted with Bertha as painfully as if he were leaving her to die, and as he rode off he looked up and down the street as if danger lurked in every shadow.

Ought he not to have told her? But what good? She might enjoy a few more days of calm. The worst could not be worse than such torture of fear and hourly dread as he suffered. She trusted him perfectly, and he believed he could fight best alone. He would ward off every danger human brain could foresee, and wealth and strength and ingenuity oppose, and then, oh God, and then!

But it could do no good to warn her. She might flutter in her terror straight into the very jaws of destruction. As for him, he could be cool and firm, though his heart was consuming within him. And who knows; the hair that held the sword over her head might never snap, and at last, after many years—what years of agony they would be to him—she might lie down at last in an honored grave. No, he would not tell her. If God in his mercy would permit him he would thank him night and morning, and carry the burden of hourly terror, for her sake, alone.

The horse was not happy. His master had no kind word for him after his absence, nor one stroke for his glossy neck. He sidled sulkily to and fro across the road and made but very slow progress, till a sharp blow of the hand that was used to pat him sent him bounding in great leaps on his way, forgetful of everything except his own resentment. When he reached Mr. Ellingsworth's gate, Philip was sorry he had come so fast, for he had not thought yet how to conceal his motive in coming. But Jane received him so cordially that he quite forgot he had anything to conceal.

This evening Jane appeared at her very best. She made Philip tell her where he had been with his bride, on their short trip, and all they had seen, and was so charmingly interested that he imagined he was succeeding in quite winning her over in Bertha's favor. Then she hoped they would be so "very happy," and drooped her black lashes at last in a beautiful stroke of daring.

"Will you be sure and quite forget I ever thought I disliked Bertha? I mean to be so very devoted now if you and she will let me."

"Do you?" he exclaimed, drawing a deep breath of relief. "God bless you for it; make our house your other home." How he had misjudged this amiable girl. He would persuade Bertha to be very kind to her. How very fortunate it is, he thought, women do not hold their hates as men do. While he had been speaking she had turned her head away, but as he said good night, she looked him in the face again.

"Why, what is the matter?" he said quickly, "your lip is bleeding."

"Oh, it is nothing, good night."

The horse was put into the stall with his master's own hand that night, and rewarded for his services, at last, with the kind words that made him lay back his ears in content. Then Pump went into the house and bolted the doors with a new sense of possession. Bertha was within with him; the whole world besides was shut without, for to-night, at least. He hung up his hat and looked into the drawing room. The gas was in full blaze, the piano open and the music sheets in place; a book lay on a chair as if just dropped there. But Bertha was not in the room. He turned out the gas and stepped along to the library. But it was dark, and no one was there. In sudden, vague fear he bounded up the stairs. She was not in her boudoir, and he pushed open the door into the white chamber. The gas was turned down low, but he put aside the curtains of the canopy and there lay Bertha. Her lips were just parted in a sweet dream, and the delicious suggestion of a smile was in her closed eyelids too. All the thunders of hell might be echoing around her, the dear head rested in perfect peace. A terrible fate trembled over her, but she was as unconscious of it as the babe of an hour. He bent over her with a yearning tenderness in his eyes. One white arm lay on the coverlet, he kissed it as softly as if it were a holy thing. He bowed his head low over her face, that seemed in her sleep to have a new gentleness and warmth in it. He drank her sweet, child like breath. What was she dreaming of, he wondered. He just touched her lips, when she moved uneasily in her sleep, and murmured his name.

"Bertha, you came to me pure, with no sin on your white soul. It is I who have put it there; I, who loved you better than myself, have put the sin upon you. And you never knew, my love, my darling, yes, my holy one, you never knew what you did. His slight form shook with a great tearless sob. Then he closed the curtains about her bed with lingering tenderness, turned out the light and left the room.

It was at the same moment that Jane Ellingsworth drew a letter from her pocket, as she sat in the parlor where Philip had left her. She had read the letter a dozen times; it was the same that had fluttered to the floor when she had thrown kisses to the bridal pair, and this was the part that had interested her so much:

"You ask me why I did not marry Bertha? Who has been insulting her, then? She is my wife, so far as laws can make a wife. She left me because she no longer loved me. I suppose I was too ill bred and common a man for her. If she had only known it before, I watched her in terror as she began to awake from her dream of love. I tried to woo her again. I thought it might be I was not fond enough, and I became so tender I wearied her. I thought perhaps I was not gentle enough, and then I never spoke to her but in approval. But her beautiful face grew colder and colder every day. I saw the light of love that had made it an angel's fade hour by hour. Then I fell on my knees and prayed her to love me, but she only drew back her skirts. Then I told her I must die if she were cruel to me, and asked—begged her to love me for pity. But when the tide of love begins to ebb all the prayers and lamentations of a world cannot stay it. Her face grew cold and hard and the love died out of her voice. She never confessed she had mistaken herself in marrying me till the very hour she left me. Yes, she is my wife, and my heart aches always for her. Write and tell me where she is—perhaps some time she may come back to me, for she once seemed to love me, and they say love cannot die. CURRAN."

CHAPTER XXIX.

EVIL EYES.

Philip Breton began to notice in the next few days that a new spirit of discontent had come over the factory hands. Before the walls of the new mill had risen ten feet from its foundations, the smiles that used to salute him, and warm his heart, as he walked among his people and through the village that he had made smile too—had faded from averted, sullen faces. Once, the men and women could find no words strong enough to express their love and gratitude to him. Now he heard constant complaints against the long hours that he still thought necessary; and against the smallness of their share in the profits of the mill.

Philip was fast losing his only hope and consolation. The dissatisfaction seemed to increase every day, and it was borne in upon him that his life in all its relations was to prove a complete failure. The people seemed to have forgotten how much better off they were than others; to have forgotten the concessions he had given them, such as no other mill owner thought of for a moment. There was so much more they wanted that he had not granted. He had opened their eyes to their condition more than he had satisfied their ambition. They accepted the principle he had explained and illustrated to them, and carried it out in relentless logic. Philip thought they were more restless now, than in the worst days under his father's inflexible management; there were more frequent meetings and bolder threats.

It was at this time, when the light of hope was almost faded from his soul, and when he was fearful of dangers on every side, that Bertha said she would like to see her husband's mill. He could not tell her that he did not dare to have her seen; that he suspected her secret had spread among the villagers; and that he feared the people whose master he was.

"Isn't it too cold this morning," he answered, avoiding her eyes, while he cast about wildly for a pretense to keep her at home.

"I am not an invalid," Philip, she said smilingly, "and you have kept me shut up as if I were a prisoner. What crime have I committed?"

He tried to laugh, but a sorry thing he made of it.

"Well, shall we have the coupe?"

"Why no; you aren't jealous of me, are you?"

In a few moments his beach wagon was at the door. He helped her in and taking his seat in front with a strange, binding sensation in his throat, looked neither to the right hand nor the left, but drove as if he were on a race course.

"Why, Philip, you take my breath away. Why don't you enjoy the morning with me?" How the people gathered in the windows to see them go by.

"I am in a hurry," he said.

"There is Jane signaling us; aren't you going to stop? Oh, yes, that is right. Here is a good chance to be friendly, as you wished."

"May I ride, too?" said Mrs. Ellingsworth, with childlike eagerness. One might have thought sometimes she had grown ten years younger with her new accomplishments. The carriage drew up to the curbstone, and the usual greetings were exchanged. "Isn't it delightful?" said she, as she took her seat with them. Jane was all smiles and bright glances this morning.

"How does it seem to be married, Bertha?" she asked, with charming innocence. Philip caught up his whip with a look so black Jane thought he would strike her.

She saw he knew all; he had found it out some way; but certainly not from Bertha, whose face changed not in the smallest expression as she made a graceful answer.

While Jane Ellingsworth affected to be admiring the horses, she studied the stern set look of the face of this devoted husband, the deathly weariness about his mouth, the suspense in his eyes. Then she glanced at Bertha, the woman who now the second time had struck him; this time mortally; who had given him for the reward of his matchless love and tenderness, first humiliation and loneliness, and now the hourly fear of infamy, certain to come in due time. Bertha was smiling idly at some children at play by the roadside; the old indifference was on her face; the old pride in the untroubled depths of her blue eyes. Well, let her wear it awhile, doubtless there was a shame that could touch her; doubtless her cold heart would be racked at last, unshaken as it was yet by the ruin it had worked in three lives.

"There are the mills," and he pointed his whip at the great brick buildings, that seemed murmuring hoarsely to themselves in their own strange language.

"But I want to go into them," insisted Bertha after she had alighted.

"It would not interest you," answered Philip steadily. "Would it, Mrs. Ellingsworth?"

Jane understood the looks and words; he feared for her, and glanced curiously at the woman who struggled so blindly against his protective love. The lower part of her face had become set and slightly unpleasant.

"It is very dusty, and the smell of the oil would make you ill, suggested Mrs. Ellingsworth. They were standing at the edge of the piazza in full view of the windows of the workroom above, and the help were collecting curiously and looking down.

"Please come into the office." Philip laid his hand lightly on Bertha's arm, but she stepped a little away from him.

"No; I thank you," she answered, in measured tones. "I will wait here for you."

A man whom no one noticed had come up the street from the depot, and was just crossing over toward them.

"Please not wait here, my love," urged Philip, very gently. "Only see; the help from the windows above are all staring at you."

"It will not harm me. May I trouble you to help me into the carriage? I think I will sit there. Thank you."

Jane stood back a little watching the unraveling of the plot whose threads she held in her hands. It was very thrilling. She saw the stranger come up and lay his hand on Philip Breton's shoulder. Who could he be, with his mysterious air, his black felt hat, torn in the crown, and his shiny broadcloth coat without cuffs? Philip had glanced up at the windows on the floor above, where a number of the operatives had gathered. Behind them stood a man, who fancied himself in the shadow; but Philip could see him point his finger at Bertha and his lips move. Then the rest looked back at him and laughed, and looked at Bertha and laughed again. The fellow peered forward incautiously, and the light fell upon the same malicious, distorted features Philip had seen reflected in the sideboard mirror the day he brought his bride home. It was Thomas Bailes, one of the witnesses to Bertha's marriage with Curran. But Bertha sat superbly indifferent, the center of their evil eyes, the mark of their scurrilous words. Philip turned as the stranger's hand fell on his shoulder.

"May I have your ear for a moment?" said the ill dressed man in a low tone. Philip seemed to stagger under a new blow. Jane's keen eyes were very curious over this old meeting, but Bertha noticed nothing.

So three enemies to Bertha and his own honor met by chance in his great mill yard, ignorant each of the very existence and of the motives of the others, but each working for the ruin of a life. Three mines were planted under one weak woman's feet, but neither enemy knew there was another; they were plotters, but not conspirators, and more deadly far. If she escaped one, she must fall by another; if one were melted by prayers, still two remained; if one were bribed with uncounted wealth, still there was one unappeased. The woman sat the focus of three pairs of hostile eyes, calm, beautiful, unconscious. The air might be thick with horrid hate, she never guessed that even one shadow had fallen across the sun's bright beams. But one man had planted himself before her. He did not know how many foes he must fight, he did not know their plan of battle, but if sleepless guardianship and devotion unto death will save her he will do it. He looks up pitifully at her face averted from him in displeasure. Ah, if she knew, she would give him strength for the conflict by a kind smile at least. But she preferred to watch the impatient horses pawing the earth beneath their feet, and Philip turned to the man who had touched his shoulder. The man was staring with insolent familiarity at Bertha, as if he had a certain right of property in her.

"I am ready," said Philip fiercely, "come inside." The paymaster called his name as he passed, but he did not listen to him. He waited till the attorney, Giddings, passed over the threshold of his office, then he locked the door and turned on him like an infuriated animal.

"Do you dare look so at my wife? Do you think she is like the low creatures you associate with?"

The man's face grew a ghastly yellow, while his eyes tried to seek out some safe corner in the room.

"My God," and Philip advanced upon the lawyer's retreating form till he shrank down in a chair, and winced as if he already felt the threatening blow. "I would kill you as I would a dog"— He stopped, and the mad gleam died out of his eyes. He threw himself into a chair, and covered his face with his trembling fingers. "But one crime in a household is enough." There was a dead silence for a moment, then the lawyer, seeing he was out of danger, plucked up courage.

"That was the very thing I called about." Philip took his hands from his face, and his eyes seemed to Giddings to be burning their way deep down into his contemptible soul. Then Philip looked at the man's frayed coat, frayed at the edges, and the lawyer twitched uneasily under his scrutiny.

"I thought I was done with you forever," he said with a bitter smile at last, "why, it was only a little time ago—let me see"——

"I know it, I know it, but somehow the money went pretty fast." And a new cunning leer came into his face. He was beginning to feel at home, though somehow, he could not look his victim in the eye today. "But there is a new point I have thought of since I saw you." He tried to look at him, but could not get his eyes to stay any higher than Philip's shoulder. The baptism of fire he had suffered, had given a certain new dignity to the young man's face, that cowed his visitor. "I mean the risk I run; do you know what the law calls what I am doing?" Giddings lowered his voice to affect a frightened whisper. "It is compounding of felony. I was only thinking I ought to be paid for my risk."

"Let me see," said Philip in stern irony, "$200 for keeping your secret—now how much for the risk?"

"Well," and the man grinned painfully, "you might make it up to an even $500, all together you know, to include everything." Giddings managed to raise his eyes, for an instant, to Philip's face.

"And do you think there won't be any more points? You know I can't submit to be bled at this rate."

"Oh, no, I assure you, not another cent. I had to pay debts with the first, you know, and buy clothes." Philip was astonished at himself, but he really had heart to smile as he looked at the man over.

"Yes, you must have laid out the greater part of it on clothes." Giddings pulled his chair up to the table.

"I thought I was done with you forever."

"I will sign anything you say." Philip had risen, and was crossing to the paymaster's office. "Wait," insisted the lawyer, "I will write an agreement in a minute."

"Your agreement, eh? No, I won't trouble you." He stepped into the paymaster's room. "Have you $300 in the safe, Mr. Smith? Coupon bonds will do. Thank you."

"Will you step in here as soon as possible?" said the paymaster, as he handed him the bonds. "There is a very important mat"——

"Yes, certainly. Please send up stairs for Bailes, I want to see him."

At the foot of the stairs Bailes and Giddings passed each other.

"Good morning, Bailes," began Philip, without turning his face to his discharged servant, "I suppose I was a little harsh in sending you away as I did. "He spoke hurriedly, as if it were a painful task he were performing. "Let this make it up to you," and the mill owner threw a roll of bills on the table much as a man would throw a bone to a dog, though he would have been hearty if he could have forced his tongue to do the false service. The man took up the money with the air of the trained waiter taking up his fee. He asked no questions, he uttered no thanks. He understood. Philip was filled with shame, and the fellow's silence made it very hard for him.

"If you are faithful to me," Philip looked fixedly at the wall over the rascal's head, "I may be able to do something handsome for you."

As Philip went out he glanced on neither side, but unhitched his horses and drove off as if a pack of wolves were behind him. He never dreamed of cause of fear from the pretty, black eyed woman who sat on the seat with him, who was amiable enough to keep up the conversation all the way home in spite of the ungraciousness of the others. After Mrs. Ellingsworth had alighted at her house Bertha said, in a displeased tone:

"I so wanted to go through the mill." But her husband did not hear. He was thinking how mighty his gold was. It had purchased them four weeks of immunity, four weeks of honor; their honeymoon. It surely would control this dangerous servant since it had worked so marvelously with the lawyer.

"I am so anxious to see how cloth is made," persisted Bertha, never losing sight of her object.

To be sure the servant had had personal offense with his master. He might not, unnaturally, cherish malice. Gold is a sovereign balm for wounded pride; but wouldn't it have been wiser to have given him more since he gave him something? He must attend to the matter to-morrow. Perhaps, after all, there might be some hope for his wife and for him. How glorious it was to be rich and have power to save her. He would scatter his wealth like leaves in autumn for her sake. His mill; yes, he would even sell his dear old mill, and pay out its price as the price of one year after another of respite, till he and she grew so poor at last that even their enemies and tormentors would weep for them, and let his beautiful bride die down to die in peace.

"You really must take me through the mills to-morrow."

Philip had alighted and held up his hands to help Bertha to the ground. She held back a moment with a new pretty coquettishness.

"Will you?" she said.

He had not even heard her before. He smiled with his fine rare tenderness as he answered very gently, "Anything you like, Bertha." Then he caught her into his arms.

CHAPTER XXX.

INCAUTIOUS DRIVING.

"Good morning, my darling." But there was another letter at Philip Breton's breakfast plate, and the old look of dread came back to his face—the dark hollows under his eyes showed again. He had forgotten for a moment, but he ought never to forget. How could he tell what moment he would be called upon to strain every nerve to save his darling. He tore open the letter in uncontrollable terror; oh, it was only from Philbrick. Had Bertha noticed his excitement and would she question him in wifely concern? He had so much to guard against. But no, her graceful arm was raised to pour his coffee, inclining her head prettily on one side, as women do always at tea and coffee pouring. She did not watch his face as he did hers. She had not even noticed the change that had come over him of late, that shocked every casual acquaintance on the street. But that made it so much the easier for him to keep the secret from her; he told himself he ought to be thankful for it, instead of ever permitting his foolish heart to ache. He ran his eyes rapidly over the letter his white haired friend had sent him.

"I suppose it is paper thrown away, but I want to remind you once more of my offer to take your mill off your hands. I have made up my mind to try my scheme somewhere. I am old and feel as if I would like to do something for my race with my money, which I have now well in hand. Will you let me have your mills for what I have got? If not I shall try elsewhere. The reason I want your mills is because I propose to give you a chance to take part in my beautiful industrial plan. I will pay you one-third its valuation, one-third you shall keep at 4 per cent. interest till we can buy that in also, the other third I am going to let you give in trust for the benefit of the help as my discretion shall dictate. This is a glorious opportunity, but I suppose I am wild to expect you to take it, except that I have read in the newspapers of growing discontent among your help. Various reasons are given for it; my explanation is that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. If you were working to stop complaints you should not have begun your reforms. You may happen to see things as I do, and be willing to let me try where you have failed. If so, telegraph me at once and I will come."

Philip folded the letter thoughtfully and put it back in its envelope. No, he was not ready for that yet. But he did not smile. If it should ever happen that he be called upon to sacrifice everything to save his wife—but Philbrick required that he accept at once. No, he was not ready yet.

"Oh!" said his wife, as if a sudden thought had struck her, "do you remember your promise, you are to take me through the mills today?"

THAT ELEPHANT.

The passengers on the Berkeley local enjoy a sight which is denied residents of Oakland, unless they make a special trip for the purpose of "seeing the elephant," and those who have taken this trip agree in saying they were well repaid for their trouble. Standing on the marsh near 16th St. station is a ponderous white elephant, evidently enjoying the refreshing sniffs of malaria. So natural does this monster look that the children on the passing trains wonder why he stands so quiet day after day. The animal was imported by the SIERRA CHEMICAL COMPANY, and is causing a great deal of comment. Mr. V. P. Mitchell, the keeper of this monster, appears to have absolute control over his charge, and even boasts of his ability to heap all manner of indignities upon the beast, without danger to himself. Mr. Mitchell further states that the reason the animal is able to remain in such an unhealthy locality is that the elephant's liver is kept in perfect order by the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure.

TWO FORTUNATE MEN.

Mr. C. A. Buckingham Captures a Prize in the Louisiana State Lottery.

C. A. Buckingham is night clerk of the United States Express Company in this city, and a sober, industrious young fellow at that. Last month the clerks in the same office made up a purse for the purpose of buying some tickets in the Louisiana State Lottery and asked young Buckingham to go into the combination, but he refused, saying that he needed his earnings to care for his family, a wife and child, the wife having been sick for some time. Just before the drawing of the 19th of September, however, Buckingham concluded that he would try his luck, and on the quiet sent $2 and received in return two one-twentieth tickets. One of these was one-twentieth of ticket No. 69,159, which drew the third capital prize of $50,000. The fortunate man forwarded his ticket to the Louisiana State Lottery company and received in return $2,500 in hard cash. This is another case of where the prize fell into excellent hands and where it will serve the excellent purpose of making easy for the time being, at least, the path of a most deserving young man and his excellent family. — Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times, Oct. 1.

A Young Business Man Stumbles upon a Lucky Number and is Happy.

There is one young man in this town whom no ordinary trifles can vex. His name is Paul H. Koeschert, and he is the partner of C. F. Jappe, the druggist. He came here from New York some time ago, and last April put what money he had into the business with Mr. Jappe. Some time ago he bought a twentieth part of ticket No. 69,159, which at the drawing of the Louisiana State Lottery, Sept. 19, caught the third capital prize of $50,000. When Mr. Koeschert found that his ticket was the lucky number, he sent it on to New Orleans through the Iowa National bank, and a few days ago got the cash, $2,500. He hasn't lost his head, but says he will put the money into his business and keep right on at the same old stand. He also intends to keep playing the lottery. He thinks there is more to be won than lost.—Davenport (Iowa) Democrat Gazette, Oct. 1.

THE CHAMBER OF TORTURE

Is the apartment to which the unhappy sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism is confined. If ever the crisis of pain is reached that fine preventive, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is used by persons of a rheumatic tendency, much unnecessary suffering is avoided. Nervines, anodynes and sedatives, while having none but a specific effect, are yet very desirable at times, yet can they produce no lasting effect upon rheumatism, because they have no power to eliminate from the blood the rheumatic virus. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters does this, and checks at the outset a disease which, if allowed to gain headway, it is next to impossible to dislodge or to do more than relieve. Rheumatism, it should be remembered, is a disease with a fatal tendency from its proneness to attack the heart. A resort to the Bitters should, therefore, be prompt. Dyspepsia, kidney complaint, malaria and nervousness are relieved by it.

The great difficulty about advice is the predominance of quantity over quality.

Catarrh in the Head

Originates in scrofulous taint in the blood. Hence the proper method by which to cure catarrh, is to purify the blood. Its many disagreeable symptoms, and the danger of developing into bronchitis or that terribly fatal disease, consumption, are entirely removed by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which cures catarrh by purifying the blood; it also tones up the system and greatly improves the general health. Try the "peculiar medicine."

"For 25 years I have been troubled with catarrh in the head, indigestion, and general debility. I never had faith in such medicines, but concluded to try a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It did me so much good that I continued its use till I have taken five bottles. My health has greatly improved, and I feel like a different woman." MRS. J. B. ADAMS, 8 Richmond St., Newark, N. J.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a single bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by HOSPITAL REMEDY COMPANY, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

BRIGHT'S DISEASE CURED.

About two years ago our daughter had congestion of the kidneys, which developed into Bright's Disease. Her body was swollen to an enormous size—measuring 45 inches around the waist, and 18 inches below the knee. After physicians had given up her case, I determined to have her try Dr. Kennedy's "FAVORITE REMEDY," of Rondout, N. Y. Gradually the swelling was reduced from 45 to 29 inches. She began to gain strength, and was able to walk without fatigue. We do not know how to express our gratitude for what it has done for our child. We are confident the Favorite Remedy will do all that is claimed for it—surely God has blessed it in this case, and we earnestly recommend it to all suffering from kidney disorders.—S. D. CONCERNING THE NEW CABLES.

How They Are Constructed—Durability and Conductive Power.

[Inter-Ocean.]

The broad principles of construction are the same in the new cables as in the old, though to the control of these principles new rules are observed. The copper center of the deep-sea cable is formed of thirteen wires, twelve small ones coiled about one that is one-tenth of an inch thick, making the conductor just the size of an ordinary telegraph wire. All the interstices are filled with a solution of gutta-percha. This covering process, which is one of the most important incidents of cable construction, is kept a profound secret by the manufacturers. This core is, after being electrically tested, covered with jute to form a cushion for the protection of the gutta-percha from the outer wires of the cable. Next the cable is sheathed in the finest quality of steel wire, the wires being literally woven about it. The cable is then covered with coatings of a black asphaltic composition, broad tape being worked in to give it solidity, first a coating and then a layer of tape, until three coatings of the composition have been applied. This completes the construction of the deep-sea cable.

The shore ends are larger cables, containing the ends of the one described made of jute and the black composition, with an intermediate size as the connecting link. Though a small section of this cable may appear hard and inflexible, when lifted in a long piece it seems like a thread of silk in graceful pliableness. Though this cable will be considerably the most expensive ever laid, there is reasonable assurance that it will be for the best, not only in the matter of durability, but as the electric medium, the conductor being both larger and more perfectly protected than any others. It may be said that the breaking strain of the wire shield has been tested at a pressure of ninety tons to the square inch, and the average weight of the cable is five tons per nautical mile. There will be 6,000 miles in this cable. Already 2,000 miles have been completed ready for laying, and the rest is now being turned out at the rate of thirty miles a day.

Life Has Its Compensations.

[Detroit Free Press.]

"Are you going to help me put down the carpets, John?"

"S'pose so; where's the tack-hammer?"

"It's in the barrel of dishes—no, it isn't—yes, it is—oh. I know now; I put it in the band-box with your new Sunday hat."

"Just like a woman; never knows where anything is; hat ruined, like enough; where's the handle of the hammer?"

"Oh, I packed that up with the china set; you'll find it, dear, at the bottom of the box."

"Now, who's going to stretch the carpet, hey?"

"Me, dear."

"Well, stand there. Gracious, I can't pull a hundred pounds of dry-goods along with the carpet. Oh, dear, I'm going to have a fit, I believe."

"I'll make you a cup of tea, dear. You can drink it out of your shaving-mug. It'll be just like a picnic."

But when she got back with the tea John was missing.

"Poor fellow! It was too much for him! He's gone to get the air. He looked pale."

John (at a counter covered with eatables, salads, and things)—Two fingers of old crow and a dash of bitters to begin with. I'm nearly starved! A hot beefsteak will help me out. I tell you, boys, moving is tough work.

Life has its compensations. John's wife sits on a roll of carpet and drinks her tea. "Poor boy! I wish he could have waited for it; it's so refreshing. He'll be half starved by supper time! I know he will."

Not much, little woman.

The Bishop's Question.

[Exchange.]

A good story is told of the Roman Catholic bishop of Atlanta, Ga. He recently addressed a large assembly of Sunday school children and wound up by asking in a very paternal and condescending way, "And now, is there a-a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to ask me a question?" After a pause he repeated the question, "Is there a-a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to ask me a question?"

A little shrill voice called out, "Please, sir, why did the angels walk up and down Jacob's ladder, when they had wings?" "Oh, ah, yes—I see," said the bishop; "and now, is there a-a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to answer Little Mary's question?"

Charles Reade on Condensation.

Regarding the stipulation of the publishers of The Youth's Companion that his story must be short, the late Charles Reade said: "After all, condensation is a fine thing and a story long enough to excite an interest and paint characters vividly, a story in which there is no conversation, but only dialogue, which rapidly advances the progress of the action, is more likely to be immortal than those more expanded themes which are apt to betray us into diffuseness."

HOPE AND DISEASE.

Scientific Reasons Why the One Counteracts the Other.

[London Physician.]

You say you "do not quite grasp the scientific reasons" which I have tried to adduce for the assertion that if a sufferer from even "incurable disease" will "only firmly make up his mind that he is going to get well, in many cases his confidence will be justified." These were not precisely the words I used, but I will adopt them. The "scientific reasons" are these:

There is in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a possibility of finding a modus vivendi with disease, even though it be organic and "incurable." Of course there are some maladies which must and will kill; but even these are longer about it when the organism is, as it were, suffused with the glow of cheerfulness and tingling with the energy of hope. The very first condition of life is hope: "While there is life there is hope," and when hope dies life is no longer "worth living." Nature is not an artisan but an artist, and with the aid of the "ghost" (or spirit) she has contrived to put a good deal of "artistic finish" into her chief work—man. This spirit is the life of the creation, and it is a life with more than one source, if I may so say.

Some men live by virtue of muscular vigor; others by sheer power of feeding—a vegetative existence. Many live by mental and nervous energy. The multitude of this last class of livers is very great; their bodies are wondrously weak and crippled, but their "go" and "spirit" are remarkable, and they live while those around them think they ought to die. Now, my first reason for believing that many persons who have incurable diseases may live on almost indefinitely, if they please, is that when a man, who has hitherto lived by the aid, chiefly, of some part of his organism which is placed hors du combat by recent disease, begins to feel that his old life-prop has been knocked away from under him, he may, by an effort of the will, lean on some other.

Say, for example, a man is told that he has heart disease. Well, that is a great pity, to be sure; but nature has given him other vital organs besides a heart. Let him leave the crippled circulatory system alone, and, instead of fretting himself into the grave because "his heart is affected," set to work to make his lungs do such excellent work in the oxygenation of the blood that the defective flow of his blood through the organism may be of less importance than heretofore. This is not a vague suggestion I am prepared to contend that what I have urged can be done, and is being daily done, by specific and common-sense measures of self-control within the power of ordinary sufferers.

Another scientific reason for believing that hope will help to cure disease, or to prolong life under its depressing influence, is to be found in the fact that all vital energy has for its primary source and center the nervous system. The brain is the central and principal organ of the nervous system. Hope is a brain function. When a man hopes, his brain is stimulated, his nervous system is healthily excited, his vital energy is increased. Is it not obvious that if the vital energy be increased, disease may be conquered, or at least outlived and down-lived? I orgive me for being so prolix in trying to be plain.

He Was Given the Job.

[Detroit Free Press.]

He called at the house and asked if she had any carpets to beat, adding that he had been in the business over twenty years.

"How much to beat that parlor carpet?" she asked.

"One dollar,"

"Why, that's awful. There was a man here yesterday who offered to do the job for 50 cents.

"Exactly, madam; but how was he prepared?"

"He had a club in his hand."

"I presume so. He intended to take the carpet out on a vacant lot, didn't he?"

"Yes, sir. Our yard is too small, you know."

"Exactly. That is a tapestry Brussels carpet. It is badly worn. It has numerous holes in it. He would make a great show in getting it out and in here. Out on the lot he would give you away to every one who asked who the carpet belonged to. Is that the way to do a job of this sort?"

"How do you do it?"

"I take the carpet out through the alley. I wheel it home. I beat it in a yard surrounded by a high board fence, and while I am returning it, all nicely rolled up and covered with cloth, if any one asks me what I have I reply that it is a velvet carpet for 224 Blank street. If no one asks any questions I call at the houses on either side of you and ask if they have ordered a new Wilton. They watch me and see me come in here."

He was given the job.

Some Early Birds.

[Chicago Journal.]

Of birds the greenfinch is the earliest riser, as it pipes as early as half-past 1 in the morning. About half-past 2 the black cap begins, and the quail wakes up a half an hour later. The sparrow occupies nearly the last place on the list. The reputation of the lark for early rising is entirely a false one. That celebrated bird is a sluggard, and does not rise until a number of other birds have been up and about for some time.

THE THEORY OF DREAMS.

Modified by Externals—Animals' Dreams—Time and Space.

[New York World.]

The New York Anthropological society met Tuesday night and listened to an address by Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, entitled "A Tentative Theory of Dreams."

In the course of his lecture Dr. Buckley said that the primary cause of dreams is the use of certain drugs—opium, alcohol, nitrous oxide gas and the like. Hasheesh is a most extraordinary drug for its effects in this way. The speaker quoted the experience of an eminent French medical writer on the subject of hasheesh as productive of the most fantastic and dreadful dreams. As an example of its extraordinary excitant qualities, he stated that the Saracens employed it to produce the necessary impulse in the minds and nervous systems of persons to be engaged in the perpetration of atrocious acts.

Reverie and abstraction is a cause of dreams. Reverie, when it becomes the master of any person, is the twin sister of lunacy. When it is impossible for persons to break from their reveries and mingle with the actual affairs of the world, they are on the very threshold of lunacy. The number of mental processes that occur in reverie and their vividness is as great as in dreams. Persons pass from reverie into dreamy sleep. Dreams are modified by the external effect of things. If a man fills his stomach with corned beef and cabbage, sauerkraut, limburger cheese and that sort of food, it is an unquestionable fact that his dreams will be totally different in character from the dreams of some men with an equal amount of distention produced by less avoirdupois weight. Animals dream unquestionably, the speaker said.

In dreams identity is lost very frequently. Time and space in the most remarkable dreams are apparently annihilated. The greater activity of the mind in dreams is an absolute delusion. It is apparently greater activity because the faculties by which we estimate the flight of time when we are awake are entirely inactive. Most people dream, and one may have 100 dreams in one night. The speaker concluded by saying that every dream can be analyzed, and that there never has been a dream that contained one image or one idea not in existence and known to be in existence before.

Human Life Is Lengthening.

[St. James' Gazette.]

To be told that under proper conditions we ought to live 100 years, and that the discouraging doctrine of the influence of heredity in shortening life is only true in a limited sense, is interesting to most people. So, also, is the circumstance that we are living longer than we used to live, and the assurance that much may yet be done to prolong our lives. These and analogous topics were given in a recent lecture by Dr. John Foster, of Bradford, England, read at the February meeting of the Sheffield Medico-Chirugical society: "The late Dr. Farr in his description of the march through life of 1,000,000 children, has given the following results: Nearly 150,000 will die in the first year, 52,000 in the second year, 28,000 in the third, and less than 4,000 in the thirteenth year. At the end of forty-five years 500,000, or one-half will have died. At the beginning of sixty years 370,000 will still be living. At the beginning of eighty years, 90,000; at eighty-five years, 38,000, and at ninety-five years, 2,100. At the beginning of 100 years there will be 223, and at 108 years one. The mean lifetime of both sexes in England was calulated some years ago to be 40.858, or nearly forty-one years. Mr. H. Humphreys has shown, however, that in the five years, 1876 to 1880, the mean age at death was 43.56 (females 45.3), being a gain of nearly two and a quarter years. Thus within twenty years, notwithstanding an increased birth rate, density of population, and the unsanitary condition of towns suddenly grown large, more than two and one-half years have been added to the life of every inhabitant of England.

How Bessemer Began.

[London Times.]

It was a chance remark at a gun trial in France that gave Henry Bessemer the idea of improving and strengthening gun metal. He incurred an immense outlay. He built furnace after furnace, he tried machine after machine, he took out patent after patent, and he saw the money he had amassed by previous inventions fast melting away. After sundry partial successes he fell in disrepute and was jeering sneered at by the iron manufacturers as an unpractical enthusiast, while the Woolwich authorities had been snubbing him as a matter of course. A few months later Bessemer had produced steel worth from £50 to £60 per ton from iron that cost him only £7. "He could then see in his mind's eye, at a glance, the great iron industry of the world crumbling away under the irresistible force of the facts so recently elicited." Fourteen years afterwards these experimental works were sold for exactly twenty four times the whole subscribed capital of the firm, after returning fifty-sevenfold, and the manufacture he originated is now estimated to be worth no less than £20,000,000 yearly.

[New York Herald.]

Louis Stervosky and Harris Aarenson preferred complaint-charges of larceny against each other at the Tombs yesterday. Each accused the other of stealing his dog.

"Where is the dog?" asked the court.

"He skipped!" sententiously said the policeman.

"Then leave it to the dog. The one whose home he goes to owns him," said the court, and the case was dismissed.

Pueblo Beauties of New Mexico.

[Cor. Chicago News.]

A white man is an alien forever at Santo Domingo. He can visit the pueblo if he pleases, and may even occupy one of the houses, but other than the merest social intercourse with the people he can expect nothing. I do not know of but one Mexican who has gone to live at the village, and he looks enough like the men around him to pass as one of the people. Noticing the beauty, what there is, of these fat, rounded people one naturally, if he is a man, turns his eyes first to the women, and once turned upon them, the men of the tribe might be as ugly as sin and as fierce as his satanic majesty, but he would gaze until the object looked at moved away.

Why? Simply because a girl of Santo Domingo, a real first-class, able-bodied, nice girl, is as pretty as a picture. Brown as a berry; eyes dark and languid; hands and feet small; ankle well-shaped and liberally displayed; shoulder round and peeking out of the calico waist that ends just below the arm; pearly teeth, black hair, pretty laugh, saucy, flirty, and yet demure. Where is the man who would not fall in love for half an hour, or until that time at least when he noticed that his adored one wore no shoes; that her dress was soiled, that she couldn't write; that she had to work; that she was an Indian squaw? Ah, well, Pocahontas isn't dead yet by any means. And coming back to the girl, and not thinking of her few imperfections noted above—see how gracefully she carries her earthen water-jar full of water on her head; see how strong she is, how easily she carries her burden that would make us stoop. She is a modern Rebecca at the well, and, like her model, she lives in a hot country, and she wears few clothes, and she loves to linger and to gossip.

New Treatment in Diphtheria.

If experiment should confirm what is claimed for it, a French physician, Dr. Delthil, has placed the civilized world under weighty obligation. He has discovered that the smoke of liquid tar and turpentine will dissolve the fibrous exudations, which choke up the throat in diphtheria and kill the patient by suffocation. Local applications of chloroform have been used by many physicians with good success, but they are of no use when the false membrane extends below the larynx.

Dr. Delthil pours equal parts of turpentine and liquid tar into a tin pan or cup, and sets fire to the mixture. A dense resinous smoke arises, which obscures the air from the room. "The patient," he says, "immediately seems to experience relief; the choking and rattle stop; the patient falls into a slumber, and seems to inhale the smoke with pleasure. The fibrinous membrane soon becomes detached, and the patient coughs up microbicides. These, when caught in a glass, may be seen to dissolve in the smoke. In the course of three days afterward the patient entirely recovers." The New York Sun says that the treatment was tried by Dr. Nichols upon a 9-year old child of one of its compositors. She was lying gasping for breath when he visited her, and was too weak to endure tracheotomy, or cutting the windpipe. The tar treatment was entirely successful, fulfilling Dr. Delthil's predictions in every particular.

A Surfeit of Words.

[Globe-Democrat.]

The task of preparing a new dictionary of the English language is, perhaps, about as grave, intricate and laborious as man could undertake. Of all tongues, ours is the most inexact and scattering, to begin with. It was largely borrowed in the first instance from foreign sources; and we have been adding to it from the vocabularies of other nations for centuries. More than this, we alone of all the people on the earth have a common habit of coining new words and giving old words new meanings to suit our whims or to emphasize a particular fact or object.

By such means, our lexicon is made to undergo continual change, and to be, as it were, in an unceasing hide-and-seek with itself. The words and expressions in general use 200 years ago are many of them absurdities and vulgarities now; even the prevailing English speech of the last century is not at all that of to-day; and it would not be too much to say, probably, that every person who lives to exceed forty years must find it necessary to alter his "English as she is spoke", in a very considerable degree from the style in which it was taught to him at the start, if he would make sure of being understood, and of escaping correction and derision.

Paris' Card Telegrams.

[Chicago Herald.]

Card telegrams are much in use in Paris. There are two kinds of them—one like the ordinary postal card in form and color, and the other blue and capable of being so closed as to conceal the writing. They are each large enough to contain a message of fully sixty words. When a card is dropped into the card telegram box of the nearest telegraph office, the official in charge picks it up and has it transmitted through one of the pneumatic tubes which extend all over the city, thus insuring its delivery at the place to which it is addressed in less than half an hour from the time it was "posted."

Strength of the Violin.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

Dr. Johnson once declared: "There is nothing, I think, in which the power of art is shown as much as is playing the violin." The violin, although it seems simple, requires great care in its construction. Each variety of wood has its variety of sound. The pressure on the four strings of the violin is said to be equal to about ninety pounds, and yet the whole instrument may not weigh more than two pounds.

Some Facts Concerning Australia.

[Cincinnati Times-Star Interview.]

"Sydney is a very handsome city indeed. The structures are built of stone and brick, the streets are wide and clean. The houses are not made four or five stories high, for there is no occasion for it. Ground is not so scarce yet. It is said that Port Jackson, its harbor, is the most beautiful in the world. In this harbor you will find vessels from all nations; also men-of-war of most all empires. It is the center of exporting and importing. The city itself is growing very rapidly besides. Last September another medical college was opened in Sydney, now making two in Australia. The other one is in Melbourne."

"What do you mainly import and export?"

"We export a great deal of wool, mostly to England, and also meats, then copper, tin and other minerals, skins and tallow, etc. We import, however, from all countries. From England we get cotton, silk, woolen goods, dry-goods, etc.; from Germany we also get woolen goods. From America we import rural implements, machinery of all kinds, especially tools; formerly wheat from California. Dried apples and canned goods are very largely imported from your country. Tobacco also comes from here. The best cigars and tobacco in Australia are American. You may believe me," jokingly remarked Dr. Faithfull, "I cannot get as good a cigar here as in Australia; especially the tobacco itself is much better in Australia. For a good American cigar we usually pay there from 12 to 18 cents."

"Tell something about the country in general?"

"Well, the country is as large, I suppose, as is the United States, with the exception of Alaska. The main occupation is grazing. The mines are known as 'quartz' and 'alluvial.' The latter are situated near rivers. Mining is a very dangerous business. It is something like gambling. Sometimes you may strike a good thing, and at other times again you lose all you have invested. The wages are as high in Australia as here, while the cost of living is much cheaper. The population is mostly composed of Englishmen, or of English descent, but the merchants are of all nations. The climate is about the same as in California. We have a good many schools and they are free for all who cannot afford to pay. At present school-houses are being built all over. We have newspapers, quite a number of them. They are cheaper than in this country. For instance, Sydney's Morning Herald, the best in the city, a twelve-page paper, and much larger than your papers, costs only 4 cents. Our street-cars are propelled by steam, and cost 6 cents; but if you purchase a ticket, which you can get on every corner, it will only cost you 4 cents.

Father and Son.

[M. Quad's Letter.]

I want my boy to rub against every day life a little while he is a boy. If he has the idea that a hunter's life is full of juicy buffalo steaks and victories over grizzlies, I'm going to send him into the woods for a week to live on woodchuck meat, carry a cold in his head and be jumped out of his boots the first time an owl hoots. If he asks for money I'm going to give it to him, but I want to sit down of a Saturday night and see how he spent it, and show up some of his foolish bargains. If he wants to sail the bounding billow I know of a lake captain who will take him on a trip from Detroit to Saginaw, and if he can't cure him in just one voyage nobody else need try.

Sit down and talk to your boy as you would to your brother. Don't bulldoze because you happen to be his father and have the bulge on him. Argue and reason. Don't expect to make assertions and have him swallow them as gospel truths unless you have backing. Teach him what to avoid, and what to cultivate, and turn him loose for a while. If he seeks the good he has the right instincts; if he runs after the bad, don't walk him into the woodshed for a pounding until you have asked yourself if he doesn't come naturally by that failing.

A Good Institution.

[Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.]

A novel and salubrious institution has been established in New York city. It is known as the "New York Labor Exchange and Lodge." Its manager is Mr. D. M. Davidson. We may gather its purpose from the following "bill of fare:"

Absolutely clean "square" meals	10 cents
Clothes cleaned by fumigation	5 cents
Hot soda or sulphur bath	5 cents
Shave or hair cut	5 cents
Absolutely clean beds	15 cents

Fumigation and bath compulsory the first night and every week to insure cleanliness.

It is intended to "assist" honest men who have hard luck in finding employment. It is said people come there in a horrible condition of filth, but the compulsory bath for their persons and the sulphur fumigation of their clothing is a purifying process that restores a sense of self-respect, and they start out in the morning in search of work with a renewed spirit of manhood.

Although not a self-supporting enterprise, yet Mr. Davidson thinks it soon will be, but its beneficent effects are such that it has the sympathy and support of the best people in the city. Davidson claims that it has already saved hundreds of men from ruin.

Where Were Dolls First Made?

[Congregationalist.]

Nobody knows, but they have been used since very early times, and by children in all countries, savage as well as civilized. The largest manufactories for dolls are in England, and, as in other trades, there is a very minute division of labor. Some carve the heads and the bodies, others paint the faces and necks, others prepare legs and arms, and still others cut out, sew, and put on the dresses. The extent to which dolls' glass eyes are manufactured is surprising. One firm in Birmingham received a single order for over $2,000 worth. It is said that the blue-eyed dolls are the favorites in England and black-eyed ones on the continent of Europe. Black dolls are made of gutta-percha to export to this country, where they are in demand by the colored people.

THE PRINTER'S LAST "TAKE."

The Hours Drew Wearily On—Out of Sorts—"Old and Unseaworthy."

[Burdette in Burlington Hawkeye.]

And so, year after year, he wrought among the boys on a morning paper. He went to bed about the time the rest of the world got up, and he rose about the time the rest of the world set down to dinner. He worked by every kind of light except sunlight. There were candles in the office when he came in; then they had lard oil lamps that smoked and sputtered and smelled; then he saw two or three printers blinded by explosions of camphene and spirit gas, then kerosene came in and heated up the news-room on summer nights like a furnace; then the office put in gas, and now the electric light swung from the ceiling and dazzled his old eyes, and glared into them from his copy. If he sang on his way home a policeman bade him "cheese that," and reminded him that he was disturbing the peace and people wanted to sleep. But when he wanted to sleep the rest of the world for whom he had sat up all night to make a morning paper, roared and crashed by down the noisy streets under his window, with cart and truck and omnibus; blared with brass bands, howled with hand organs, talked and shouted; and even the shrieking newsboys, with a ghastly sarcasm, murdered the sleep of the tired old printer by yelling the name of his own paper.

Year after year the foreman roared at him to remember that this wasn't an afternoon paper, editors shrieked down the tube to have a blind man put on that dead man's case; smart young proof readers scribbled sarcastic comments on his work, on the margin of his proof slips; they didn't know how to read. Long-winded correspondents learning to write, and long-haired poets who could never learn to spell, wrathfully cast all their imperfections upon his head. But through it all he wrought patiently, and found more sunshine than shadow in the world; he had more friends than enemies. Printers and foremen and pressmen and reporters and editors came and went, but he stayed, and he saw news-room and sanctum filled and emptied, and filled and emptied again, and filled again with new strange faces. He believed in his craft, and to the end he had a silent pity, that came as near being contempt as his good, forgiving old heart could feel, for an editor who had not worked his way from a regular devilship up past the cases and the imposing stone.

He worked all that night, and when the hours that are so short in the ball-room and so long in the composing-room drew wearily on, he was tired. He hadn't thrown in a very full case, he said, and he had to climb clear into the boxes and chase a type up into a corner before he could get hold of it. One of the boys, tired as himself—but a printer is never too tired to be good natured—offered to change with him, but the old man said there was enough in the case to last him through this take, and he wouldn't work any more to-night. The type clicked in the silent room, and by and by the old man said:

"I'm out of sorts."

And sat down on the low window sill by his case, with his stick in his hand, his hands folded wearily in his lap. The types clicked on. A galley of telegraph waited.

"What gentleman is lingering with D 13?" called the foreman, who was always dangerously polished and polite when he was on the point of exploding with wrath and impatience.

Slug Nine, passing by the alley, stopped to speak to the old man sitting there so quietly.

The telegraph boy came running in with the last manifold sheet, shouting:

"Thirty!"

They carried the old man to the foreman's long table and laid him down reverently and covered his face. They took the stick out of his nerveless hand, and read his last take:

BOSTON, Nov. 23.—The American barque Pilgrim went to pieces off Marblehead in a light gale about midnight. She was old and unseaworthy, and this was to have been her last trip.

Diet for Athletes.

[Harvard Herald.]

In Dr. Sargent's recent lecture on "What Shall We Eat to Get Strong?" he said in the course of his remarks: It has been customary to train athletes on lean beef and mutton, but he thought this a mistake, as tissue-making food should be used in combination with these, and the diet should be so changed as to meet the requirements of the organism of the person using it, for to establish one diet for all persons was ridiculous. Beef alone is not superior to meal, beans, or other farinaceous food, and the size of the muscles of a man is not indicative of his strength. Farinaceous food tones a man down, and will tend to give him more endurance. A man who can strike a blow equal to 400 pounds would be called a strong man, but this strength cannot be kept up for any length of time on animal food, as it comes from the base of the brain, and endurance must be sought for in other kinds of food.

To reduce the weight of a man in training, lean meats may do, but when he is down in weight he must go back to food containing more carbon, such as ham and sausages, which should always be eaten cold. Three years ago this would have been considered ridiculous by trainers, but for a diet for running, walking, and rowing it has been found that saccharine food, with beef or mutton, is the best; tea, coffee and alcohol, as well as condiments, are objectionable; indeed, it is not the quantity of food a person eats that strengthens him, but the amount assimilated and worked into the organism.

Died of a Fit.

[London World.]

Byron's good sayings have been in all men's mouths—in the mouths of some who have claimed them as their own. Many were admirable puns, others had a better claim to remembrance. The last time I met him—a long time ago—I sat next him at dinner. "So Poole, the tailor, is dead!" remarked our host. "Indeed! What did he die of?" "Of a fit," said Byron at once; "what else could a tailor die of?"

AN IDYL OF THE HAMMOCK.

[Earle H. Eaton.]

We are sitting in the hammock, she and I,
May and I,
And the gentle blowing breeze,
Through the overhanging trees,
With a sad and mournful sigh,
Whispers by Rustles by,
Coolly, sweetly, sadly, gently rustles by.

We are swinging in the hammock, lovers
two, May and Lew,
And her tiny booted feet
With the branches nearly meet,
And I see in eyes of blue,
Love so true,
Fond and true,
Brightly glowing, gladly beaming, fond and true.

We are sitting in the hammock, lovers fair, foolish pair,
And my careful arm around,
Her delightful waist is wound,
Just to keep the little dear
From a fear,
Haunting fear,
From a tumbling, toppling over, haunting fear.

* * * * * * * *

We are lying in the grasses, she and I, May and I,
And the maiden blushing red,
Sitting squarely on my head,
Utters one affrighted cry—
"Hammock's down,
Broken down,
Oh, the horrid, horrid hammock's broken down!"

COTTON FROM CINDER.

The Curious Substance Blown From Furnace Slag by a Steam Jet.

[Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.]

A process for utilizing the slag or cinder from blast furnaces, recently discovered, is now undergoing experiments at the Isabella furnaces, Sharpsburg. The product is in appearance similar to third grade cotton, but in weight is about 80 per cent. heavier. The method of producing the slag fiber is as follows: About thirty feet from the furnaces is a tight inclosure twelve feet square made of boards. Running from this inclosure to within two feet of the gutter, into which the slag from the furnace is ordinarily tapped, is a tunnel constructed of sheet iron and wood. At the end of the gutter furthest from the tap-hole is a steam pipe so placed that when steam is turned on it strikes against one side of the hot-flowing slag.

The operation blows the slag into innumerable sparks and into the tunnel, where they are met about half-way between the ends of the tunnel by a second steam jet which forces the disintegrated slag into the inclosure. When it gets there it is transformed into the substance heretofore described. The process can be conducted only during the flow of hot slag, which lasts for from fifteen to twenty minutes, and in this time about fifty pounds of the light cotton-like substance is produced. Superintendent H. Kennedy was asked regarding the process and the uses of the product, but he said that the scientists had not yet got to the bottom of the matter. He took a handful and wrapped it around a red-hot poker without the slightest effect on the material, though upon placing the iron into a strong fire it would not burn in the least. A handful of fiber thrown into a hot fire is not affected.

The manufacture of the substance, which is known as mineral wool, was tried at the Lucy furnace some two or three years since, and an establishment is operated by a New York firm, in which W. P. Shinn, of this city, is interested, where it is made. The uses to which it may be applied are various, and as it is practically incombustible it will eventually take the place of asbestos. It has also been used for deadening the sound and reducing the danger from fire in sleeping and ordinary railway coaches, and has been tried by upholsterers for lounges, chairs, and railway-car seats. It has been tried as an inside filling for partitions and joists in dwelling-houses, not only as a protection against the spread of fire, but for deadening sound, but the process of manufacture is still in its infancy, and has not reached perfection by any means. It has, however, been found to be an excellent polishing agent, and is used extensively to polish wire rods and wire fencing.

A Queer Boston Merchant.

[Every Other Saturday.]

A Boston merchant who lived and died on Summer street, was a curious instance of one who had been an invalid from childhood, always extremely hypochondriac, who never imagined himself ill when he was not, nor exaggerated his actual illness, nor feared, unduly, sickness or pain, or death itself. But it was the business of his life to take care of his health; and he devoted himself to this work with wonderful assiduity. He rode just so far each day, when the weather was fair, and at such an hour. He had a great variety of clothing, which he regulated with precision by the thermometer, sometimes changing his dress many times in a day; and selected for his over-clothes, when he rode out, the very garments which the mercury indicated.

He had a weathercock put upon his stable, within fair view from his bedroom and sitting room; and that and his thermometer, and possible or impossible signs of the weather, he was watching constantly, and found in these occupations a very agreeable way of employing all his day and all his days. How far his long life is to be attributed to this excessive care it is hard to tell; but he outlived every brother and sister, every brother's wife and every sister's husband, and his own wife, and died in 1837 at the age of 81.

A Genius for Bonnets.

[Exchange.]

A London gentleman of means discovered that he possessed a genius for making bonnets. He has turned his gift to account. You get an introduction to him, and call at his house. It is a private house and a servant shows the visitor to the drawing-room. There sits the gentleman of the house, surrounded by a constellation of bonnets. He diagnoses the head, studies the complexion, takes note of the tendency of the nose—whether it be depressed or aspiring—and the character and color of the back hair. These points settled, he hands, not a bonnet, but the bonnet. The visitor may accept or reject, but no one must attempt to modify. If persons buy, he is very courteous, and orders up afternoon tea; if they don't buy, he is equally courteous and equally hospitable.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
FRIDAY DECEMBER 20.....1889

In an able article on the great smelting business that will grow up in Los Angeles with the building of railroads to reach mining districts the Herald of recent date says the man is now living who will see the day when from the northern limit of Mono county to the confines of the great Lower California Desert, a man may ride the whole stretch of that country and never get out of the sound of a quartz mill. From this time on we may expect to hear of a constant succession of discoveries along the route by which the Salt Lake road will approach Los Angeles. The great richness of that section has been known for years, but the difficulty of transportation and consequent great expense of development have caused them to lie dormant. Another great center of exploitation will be around Panamint and Darwin, where innumerable lodes of great value will be developed when the Carson and Colorado Railway makes a connection with this city, and even before. The air is fairly scintillant with hints of a coming mining revival in Southern California, Southwestern Nevada and Southwestern Utah, in which Los Angeles will also participate, and in all of which she will be the beneficiary. In mining as in agriculture, while Northern California led the way, Southern California will achieve a record, though different, quite as brilliant. The absence or scarcity of running streams, and the quick evaporation incident to our climate, made placer mining a difficult and unprofitable pursuit in Southern California, but the lodes of silver and gold are here, and as rich as any on the Coast and quite as permanent. We shall not only witness a boom in the precious metals of Southern California, but the cheap coal of Utah will result in the establishment of smelting works here in the not distant future. Meanwhile a prospecting work is steadily going on which will provide illimitable supplies of pay ore when that day shall arrive. There are thousands of people residing in Los Angeles to-day who know nothing of the immense shipments of bullion that formerly passed through this city to San Pedro from the Cerro Gordo mines in Inyo county. Countless mule teams were engaged in freighting between the camps of Messrs. Belshaw & Beaudry and Los Angeles, bringing down massy ingots of mixed silver and lead to be carried to San Pedro and thence shipped to San Francisco for reduction. For many years this business was the mainstay of the prosperity of this city. There are still other thousands of our new people who are not aware that an extensive trade once existed between Los Angeles and Salt Lake City. It is a most auspicious sign of our future that these streams of wealth are about again to turn this way, although this time, under different conditions, we shall not ship these ores to other points for reduction. Los Angeles, like Denver, will soon be a great smelting center. The ores that will pour into this city from Southern California, Southwestern Nevada and Southwestern Utah will be met by another stream from Arizona that will furnish the fluxes that will admit of the cheap and easy reduction of the rebellious ores of the former section. When once they reach Los Angeles they will be encountered by the competing cheap coal of Utah and Alaska. But a brief space of time separates this pen picture from fruition.

It is strongly intimated that the recent terrible scandal in London is likely to bring the English monarchy to an end. Albert Victor, the eldest son of the Prince of Wales, is deeply implicated in the scandal. When all the facts are made public it is believed that the vileness of this young man will be so gross and so clearly proven that the English people would never permit him to come to the throne. It is expected that an official declaration will be made that Victoria shall be the last monarch of Great Britain. The government has long been a Republic in fact and it had better be declared so in name.

It is very confidently asserted that in addition to the Union Pacific railroad another transcontinental line will be built to Los Angeles. This report says that Gould has quarreled with Huntingdon and as a result has gained control of the Denver and Rio Grande and will make that a standard gauge and extend it to the Pacific. Gould controls the Colorado Midland railway the present terminus of which is only two hundred miles from Ogden. Work is now going on to complete that short stretch and from Ogden the road is to be continued to Los Angeles and the Ocean. This road and the Union Pacific must both both pass through a portion of Inyo county. There appears to be little doubt of the speedy building of both lines.

Our neighbors of Nevada have taken a step that will be of more benefit to the State than the discovery of two or three mining lodes like the Comstock would be. Their newly organized State Board of Trade is taking hold of the work upon which alone States can continue to live and prosper. It is the settlement upon and cultivation of the soil that must in the end be depended upon for the prosperity of any country. Nevada has a vast area of very excellent land, and plenty of water to irrigate it, if the necessary works shall be erected to store the water. The State has a delightful and most healthy climate. In Frank G. Newlands Nevada appears to be fortunate in having found a man with judgment clear enough to see the value of her land and water, and with energy and business skill to push the improvement of these resources to a successful issue. Nevada has as much right to aid from the General Government for the improvement of her public land by the storage of water as California or any other State has for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Nevada has as much right to help in building dams for the storage of water as Louisiana has for building levees.

A very wise arrangement has been made by the Representatives in Congress from all the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains and including Colorado. All the Senators and Congressmen have entered into an organization by which they can act together in all measures of general interest to their constituents. Without regard to party lines they propose to unite on all questions of irrigation, silver coinage, Chinese immigration and all other matters concerning the general welfare of those States and Territories. This union of force in Congress can hardly fail of securing for the Pacific Coast such consideration as is fairly due but has never yet been accorded.

The Chicago murderers have been found guilty of the murder of Cronin. Daniel Coughlin, Patrick O'Sullivan and Martin Bourke were sentenced to imprisonment for life. John F. Beggs not guilty and John Kringle sentenced to three years imprisonment. The three chief culprits escaped death because some of the jurors would not consent to hanging on circumstantial evidence. Chicago has been sorely afflicted with criminals but the just punishment inflicted will no doubt prevent a repetition of similar crimes.

Superior Court of Inyo County, California

MONDAY, December 16.

Estate of Henry James Hartshorne, deceased—Filed petition for sale of real estate, and order to show cause why same should not be granted.

TUESDAY, December 17.

Grand Jury impaneled.

WEDNESDAY, December 18.

Grand Jury files its report and is discharged.

A party will be given at the new school house at Big Pine on Christmas night.

Mr. J. C. Crocker got home last Monday from a trip to Kern county.

The usual force of men is employed in the Lucky Jim mine, at Darwin, and the output of ore is up to the average quantity.

Dr. S. A. Chapman, the dentist, is in town and will remain for several days yet. He comes highly recommended as a skilful operator.

Miss Kohler is training her pupils in exercises to give a pleasant entertainment on Christmas eve. The meeting and Christmas tree will be in the school house.

Hon. P. Reddy is still at Darwin. He will put up a concentrator at the Defiance mine and make other improvements for the more extensive working of the property.

Recent rains made the Sacramento River higher than ever before known to white people. A good deal of country was overflowed and much damage done to growing crops.

Mrs. Johnson started for Los Angeles via Mojave last Tuesday, where she will remain a couple of months visiting with her sister. Her son Pierce accompanied her and will enter a business college in that city.

It is reported that Sullivan has given notice to the Athletic Club of San Francisco that he will agree to fight Jackson the negro. Jackson asks five months time for training.

The Grand Jury recommended that a fire proof vault be built for the County Records. The same has been done by the Grand Juries for several years past and no vault yet.

Nathan Rhine and C. A. Walter have been appointed Directors of Agricultural District No. 18 to supersede John Shepherd and W. K. Miller, whose terms have expired.

Martin Mee came in from Darwin last Tuesday. It was two years since he was last at Independence and during much of that time he has been quite ill in health. He is still weak but able to get around.

Mr. E. Robinson got severely hurt on Wednesday. He was riding after cattle with his horse on a fast run when the animal fell throwing his rider heavily to the ground. Mr. Robinson is bruised severely and has a sprained ankle.

Walter Ober has leased the Palace Saloon on Edwards street, opposite the Court House, and is managing that popular resort. Walt. is well known in sporting circles and his friends will find him always ready to cater to their amusement.

M. Castro has purchased the corner property in Lone Pine formerly occupied by E. H. Edwards as a store building. He will erect a fine two-story building, the upper part being fitted up as hall and the lower as a saloon.

Mr. C. Anthony started up the mill at Darwin on the 18th of November. Recently a few days loss of time was caused by rains that prevented fuel from being hauled. That difficulty was overcome and the mill started up again. The run is now nearly completed.

At Cerro Gordo Mr. Farrington is timbering the Union shaft. A drift is also being run from the old Omega tunnel to connect with the old Union workings. Till both of these jobs are completed it is not likely that much actual mining will be done

Very heavy rains have fallen in Los Angeles and San Diego counties. A good deal of damage has been done to railroads causing interruption of travel and business. The good resulting from an abundance of water will vastly exceed all the damage done, however.

The Georgia Minstrels are in active preparation for their entertainment next Wednesday night. There is a new cast and a new and varied repertoire. The music for the ball will be the best procurable and the entire entertainment will be most enjoyable.

The men of Big Pine turned out in full force to put the school house grounds in good condition. The tract is of ample size and has been nicely leveled and prepared for trees, grass and other such improvements as may be decided to have. The building is a handsome one and a credit to the town.

GRAND JURY REPORT.

INDEPENDENCE, December 18, 1889.

To the Honorable Superior Court of Inyo County, State of California:

We, the Grand Jury impaneled by your Honor for the December term of 1889, of said Court, respectfully submit the following report:

We have examined and inquired into the public affairs of the county.

The books of the various county officers we find neatly and correctly kept so far as our limited time would permit of examination.

The Auditor's and Treasurer's books show there should be cash in the hands of the Treasurer to the amount of $16,775 76 which amount we find on hand.

Having visited the County Hospital we find three patients there. We conversed with these patients alone and received from every one assurance that they received everything they required and the food and attention were satisfactory.

We recommend to the Honorable Board of Supervisors that a fire-proof vault be built for the safe-keeping of the County Records and books. And that the windows of the Treasurer's office be barred. Also that the necessary painting be done on and in the Court House.

We respectfully call your Honor's attention to the bonds furnished by some of the county officers. We find names of men who are bondsmen for thousands of dollars who are responsible before the law for but a fraction of the amount for which they have become surety, and in one instance where a bondsman has sold out and left the county.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN KISPERT, Foreman.

Mexican Killed.

Word was received at Independence on Wednesday that a Mexican had been killed at Cerro Gordo but no particulars were given. A Deputy Coroner at once started for Keele. The following letter was received yesterday morning.

CERRO GORDO, Dec. 17th.

MR. P. H. MACK: Dear Sir:—This forenoon at the above place a Mexican by the name of Ramon Laguna was caved on and killed. He was carried out of the mine at half-past one. He will be taken to Lone Pine this afternoon. Yours,

NEIL MCLEAN.

Following is the verdict of the Coroner's Jury, the inquest being held in the town of Lone Pine.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA } ss
County of Inyo. }

We, the Coroner's Jury summoned in the inquisition upon the body of Ramon Llaguinas, found caved upon and dead in the Buena Vista mine, Cerro Gordo, Inyo county California, do find that deceased came to his death by reason of a cave, or fall of rock and earth in said mine on the 17th day of December, 1889. That his death was accidental and that we attach no blame therefor to the management of the property. That deceased was a native of Guaymas, North Mexico, aged 48 years, 3 months and 18 days.

A. C. HARVEY,
FRANK FITZGERALD,
M. CASTRO,

Approved: THOMAS PARKER,
County Coroner.
By JAS. E. PARKER, Deputy.

Cheese Making.

Last Spring Mr. A. Matlick, of Bishop determined to try an experiment in making cheese. He found that from the milk of a given number of cows the yield of cheese was equal to four times the amount of butter that could be got. His cheese sold readily at fifteen cents a pound when butter was selling at twenty-five cents per pound. This made the account stand at sixty cents for cheese against twenty-five cents for butter. Mr. Matlick had never before made cheese consequently he labored under a good deal of disadvantage. Yet he had orders for cheese faster than he could make it and got coin for the article immediately on delivery. Mr. Matlick milked thirty-eight cows on an average and says they gave him more net profit than all his general farming He owns 320 acres of good land and will increase his head and continue cheesemaking.

Mental Aberration.

Last Monday night Mr. Wimberly, an aged man, made an attempt to destroy his own life. He was living alone in a house near Lone Pine and his condition was not discovered till Tuesday morning. He had made a cut across his throat with a razor. Medical assistance was got as soon as his condition was discovered and he is likely to recover. He has long been in very poor health and is extremely hard of hearing. There is no doubt that his mind was temporarily deranged on Monday night. Mr. Wimberly is naturally a man of a cheerful disposition; is of sobe , industrious habits and would never make any such rash attempt if his season were not disordered.

The East Side.

Mr. McIver expects to have the Eastside Canal completed to a point four miles south of Lone Pine Station by the first week in February. There work will cease for a time. There is some good land along the lake shore south of that point but not a great deal. When Mr. McIver quits work upon the canal he will at once commence getting land ready for crops and tree planting. Many of the locators along the line of the canal have already applied to him to take charge of their land and get it ready for cropping, but his own land will need a good deal of care and it will not be possible for him to take charge of all he is requested to do. There will be a great deal of activity along the line of the canal during the coming Spring.

New Prospects.

Several good mining prospects of recent discovery are reported from Big Pine. Well up in the Sierras ledges have been opened and the ore yields seventy to eighty dollars per ton in gold. Over in Deep Spring District some good ledges are also opened. Recently George Turney took out enough ore in three weeks to leave him a profit of seven hundred dollars. Such is the report given by a citizen of Big Pine.

Syrup of Figs.

A Chinaman Sundries.

The guileless and honest Chinee, with a smile that is child-like and bland, is always coming to the front. Big Pine can boast of the last discovered one. He had been there a long time and was so honest; every body knew he was. But now where are Lem Meyers' chickens and eggs? What has become of Ed. Crocker's fat pig? Denny Hessian has lost faith in the honesty of Chinamen. Justice Uhlemeyer would like to sit on that particular heathen Chinee. But he is gone, and so is all he could get credit for and all he could steal and Big Pine is minus about a thousand dollars and a Chinaman.

Three white men, brothers, are in the pest house at San Francisco, all of them the victims of leprosy. The steamship companies refuse to take any Chinese lepers out of the country at any price. The number of lepers in the State is increasing and it is a grave question what is to be done with them. The presence of the Chinese among us is constantly producing fresh evils.

The Los Angeles Herald says it is astonishing how many farmers in that county buy their vegetables, eggs, poultry, pork and meat. Their insane devotion to barley puts them at the mercy of the middle men and brings prices down to zero. It is astonishing but nevertheless a fact that all over California farmers are buying and paying high prices for what they could just as well produce for themselves.

Further examination proves that some of the untaxed mortgages alluded to in an article last week were not recorded till after the first Monday in March and consequently could not be assessed. So far but three mortgages are known to have been omitted from the assessment roll that should have appeared there. This is a very small part of the whole and proves that the Assessor used due diligence in making out his list.

The Trustees of the Inyo Academic Association have sued A. Spencer, of Bishop, for the amount of his subscription to the Academy fund. Judge Webster, of Nevada, is the Plaintiff's attorney and J. W. P. Laird appears for the Defendant. Several parties who signed the subscription paper now refuse to pay so the Trustees decided to make a test case of the Spencer subscription and if successful will bring suit against the balance of the subscribers who have not paid.

Water was turned into the Big Pine ditch at the end of last week. It is now about twelve years since the work was begun, faulty surveys causing great loss of labor and time. When Mr. Ed. Crocker took hold of the canal new life was infused into the enterprise. Now the settlers who have waited, worked and hoped so long see success at last. Mr. Crocker says he will have the canal finished at least as far south as Sam McMurry's place by April first. A tract of fine land about ten miles long and two to three miles will soon be brought under cultivation by this canal.

"Did I promise that?" He put back his coffee cup untasted.

"Certainly, Philip, and I cannot let you off."

"But you must." His face drew dark at the thought that she should put at naught all his careful plans to secure her present safety. Bertha pushed back her chair and rising angrily to her feet, swept from the room without another word. Philip tried in vain to swallow the mouthfuls of food he so much needed, then he started on foot for the mill.

That Bertha should be angry with him seemed the last intolerable blow. Was he not bearing enough before? He had made her unhappy. Perhaps she was weeping hot tears of impatience now. She had thought he loved her enough to grant her every wish that might cross her heart. Philip was tempted to go back and explain everything. Then she would not doubt his love, but she would have to share his agony with him. It were better to bear his burdens alone—even to this last burden of her unmerited reproach. His sympathy for her grew stronger than his consciousness of his own unhappiness. Of course she would be hurt that he had denied her anything; if it had been a ribbon, it would have been the same. He was to blame for letting her leave him in vexation. He should have forgotten his own grievances and soothed her with gentle words till she smiled on him. It was not because she wanted the thing so much, but it was the first time he had ever crossed her wishes.

Philip was so absorbed in his thoughts that he did not observe that he was close upon an excited crowd of village people, until such words as these fell upon his ear:

"A noice friend of the poor man he be, with his four fancy hosses, his silver dishes to eat his victuals out of, and his house like a king's palace, while we lives and dies in dirt and poverty. Who made him better nor us? do he work harder? do he sleep less? No, but he have his venison and his game dinners, while us starves on tea and crackers; he sprawls on his fine cushions, and sleeps in his soft beds, while we rot in close atticks, and loafs in dirty saloons, the poor man's only home. What title have he got to have better than we, and give himself airs over us?"

Philip was astonished. The man who stood on the steps of one of the tenement houses, instructing an audience extending quite across the highway, was no other than the incendiary who had so nearly caused the ruin of the Breton Mills the night of the great fire. The fellow's hair was cropped as close to his bullet head as it was then.

The audience was mostly made up of old men, women and children, with here and there an able bodied man, who preferred talking about his rights to deserving anything. One or two had observed the young mill owner, but they took no pains to spread the intelligence, and in a moment more the agitator had caught his breath and went on:

"He feeds his hosses more'n would keep two poor families. The wines he drinks every day cost enough to keep another two.

Perhaps the man was right in his tirade. Perhaps Philip Breton had only begun to grasp the first outlines of the great question he had fancied mastered.

"But ye kiss his hand."

"No, we won't" shouted the crowd. There stood Thomas Bailes, Philip's discharged servant, in the middle of the street, shouting with the rest. He could afford to be idle since his last liberal present.

"Ye will thank him for his bein' so kind to ye."

"No, no!" screamed the women. What a fool Philip Breton had been to count on gratitude. Human nature is too progressive to be grateful. Perhaps he deserved no thanks. He had done more than others for his help. The more fool he was, all sides would agree, unless he went further. He ought to have been either a thorough radical, or a thorough conservative. All parties abuse the half way reformer. A vessel of pottery between two jars of iron, he is certain to be crushed.

A carriage was struggling down the street. How slow the crowd were to give way. They were so much interested in their orator that they did not notice they were obstructing the highway.

"What good is such men as him? our women is stronger than them sort."

The horse seemed spirited, or else not properly guided. Ah, the driver ought not to use a whip in such a situation as this Good heavens! the horse had become unmanageable. A man, it was Bailes himself, and a woman had been struck by the shafts and rolled under the feet of the horse, who was now rearing and plunging, while the crowd scattered in all directions with screams and curses.

Under the very wheels of the carriage lay a woman stunned and helpless from the blow she had received. Instant death threatened her, when a man's form rose suddenly out of the dust under the horse's iron shoes and caught the excited animal by his bit. The crowd gathered in more closely than ever, while a dozen hands dragged out the old woman from her terrible situation and wiped the dust from her white, ghastly face. The orator had ceased his eloquence, and all danger of accident seemed now averted, so Philip Breton, was passing on his way.

But Bertha, for the occupant of the carriage was no other than she, found her way blocked in all directions by an angry mob.

"Pull her out, scarlet face," screamed the women. "Tear her pretty rags off from her." The barefooted children threw earth at her; lean, dirty fingers plucked at her delicate skirts. How dared they touch her! she shrank from the pollution of contact with such creatures as these, with a terror that would be inconceivable to a man. She saw them gather around the restive horse, who seemed as impatient of their touch as she; they were beginning to undo his harness. In another moment she would be lost. But the horse was strong, could he not break through them? She did not care how many he should trample to death; she would rather, a thousand times rather, die herself, than endure their insulting touch. But a rough hand caught the whip from her grasp; the creature's unpared nails hurt her; another had was on her shoulders; and vile words, whose meaning she only felt, were on every tongue. Her heart grew sick; oh, she prayed God would not let her faint; oh, not now; oh, not now—yet her vision seemed failing, she could not see the horse's head, and the terrible insults the people hurled at her grew indistinct, like a roaring of many waters in her ears. But she saw a hideous faced hag reach her bare, brawny arm into the carriage and clutch at her feet; they were lifting her out. But a hand like iron flung the virago back.

"Stand off. It is my wife!" The mill owner's wife. The crowd fell back for a moment, as if it was news for them; but Philip knew by instinct, the lull would only last for a moment. He must make the most of it. He had only time to refasten a little of the harness, when a sharp stone struck him on the cheek and drew blood.

"How many husbands can a woman have?" screamed a woman on the sidewalk.

"Jail's the place for her," growled a man at his shoulder. Then the crowd closed in again.

"Let go the bit," demanded Philip, never quailing. But Bailes only grinned at him, as Philip had seen him before, and tightened his hold on the horse.

"You're too small to give orders; I aint in your pay now." But before the fellow had time to put up a guard, his young master had struck him a blow in the face that fairly staggered him, large man as he was.

"Oh, that's your game, is it? Make way, boys, all I want is room. I'll finish him up quick."

The man wanted to make use of his weight and strength in the directest way possible, so he rushed forward to close with his antagonist, throwing up his hands to protect himself. But he miscalculated and his cheek bone fairly cracked with the force of the second blow. Bailes drew back for another attack. The smile of contempt was gone from his bruised and bleeding face, but a very dangerous look was in his eyes. His young master had lost his first paleness, a bright red spot burned in each cheek and his black eyes flashed forth defiance. The discharged servant ducked his head and came at Philip like a maddened ox. The crowd held its breath; the slight form of the master would go down, and the victor would pound his young life out of him. Was the lad crazy to invite a battle with a man of almost twice his weight? The young man did not flinch a hair's breadth. He raised his arm again. What good of battering against the fellow's thick skull? He was upon him—no, Philip had leaped aside at the last moment, and, as Bailes went past, had dealt him a blow in the temple that sent his great form reeling to the ground.

Before the crowd had time to move Philip had leaped into the carriage and caught the reins from his fainting wife. He turned his horse into an open space and the half fastened harness let the carriage run against the animal's legs. It was better than a thousand whips, and he broke into a wild gallop. Bailes had only time to get his feet and shout after the young mill owner:

"This is only the first round!"

Philip heard his words and muttered to himself: "I ought to have killed him, since I had to beat him. There isn't gold enough in California to buy him over now."

"What did they mean, Philip?" Bertha was lying on the sofa in her own little blue room. Philip had put a pillow beneath her tired head, and was kneeling by her side watching for the color to come back to her frightened cheeks.

"Thank God she did not know, not yet."

He looked down at the veins in her pretty hands; how many there were to-day.

"It was only their senseless jargon. They are angry with me, you know. Do not think about it again."

She opened her great blue eyes on him. She was going to thank him no doubt for her rescue out of the terrible peril.

"You look so small and weak. I wouldn't have thought you had any strength." That was all she had for him.

CHAPTER XXXI.

INK.

Philip left his wife to fall asleep if she could, and made his way to his study where he and his father before him had fought out so many battles. His secret was out. The police might be at his door that very night to claim his bride back from him. He had beaten one man for her, but he could not defend her against the force they would bring against him. The air of his little village had grown close and suffocating. How long would it be before the storm would burst. He tried to calm himself and calculate how much time his crowding destiny would give him. He was rich and powerful and had many friends, and nothing that could happen to his wife could make him less formidable, though it might break his heart. There was not a soul in Bretonville that had something to hope of his favor, or to fear from his displeasure. He could shut up his mills and the village would become a desert; he could lower wages and send starvation knocking at every door. And there was not one creature in the village but knew his power. He had not used it to harm them yet, but would not a man forget mercy in defending his own home? And then what did they know, after all, even the mob that had insulted his wife? They might suspect, but suspicion was not enough to give them courage to assail all the bulwarks of wealth and respectability about such a home as Philip Breton's. Even the discharged servant, Thomas Bailes, did not hold the trump card in this terrible game of life and death. No one held it but Giddings, the lawyer, and he was provided for as yet.

Philip paused before the window. There could be no vital danger yet. It would take time. His enemies were on the right track, but there were blind windings in it that would hinder the scent. Hinder it, but at last what? His mills seemed to hold him in bondage. His life work was here where the danger was, to show the world what an employer ought to concede to his workmen. To set a bright example to soften the rigor of his class. Could he forsake his glorious work? To be sure his workmen were proving themselves ungrateful, and murmured louder against him today than ever against his father. They had taken their children away from the schools to spite him, though he would not suffer their little bodies to be tortured in the mills any more. They begrudged him his luxuries, as if it were their money that bought them. There were no more smiles and hearty word for him from the poor he had done the best he knew for, and all the manufacturers around were laughing at his failure, as they called it.

But a look of determination came over the young man's pale face. He believed he could plant his feet like the rock and wear out their impatience. The violence of his people should not make him tremble. He was their friend and they would come to believe it. He had not done all they wished, but he could not see any further yet, and he would take no step blindly because of reproaches. If he were not right he was nearer right than thousands of his class. By and by their turbulence would subside, when it could not stir him, and his measures would have time to bring forth their certain fruits of smiles and prosperity. New blocks of mills would stretch away in all directions, and the homes of his working people would dot with happy cottages all the hills and valleys near.

But Bertha. Did he love his mills or her the more? She should not be permitted even to guess her own terrible story, or her life would be clouded like his. But the air of the village would soon be trembling with the news, and the hand of pitiless justice would be laid upon her. Should he wait for it? God had granted him one week of peace, and now this month for warning. Was not the world large? Were there not high mountains and unpeopled deserts, where they could be safe? where he could hide his darling from insulting looks and words, where no prison cells gaped open for her?

A sudden great light broke over Philip's face as he walked his little study with rapid turns. He could save her. The plan unfolded itself in his mind. There was yet time if he were quick. He must give up his great plan for his workmen; he must sell his mill, but he could yet save his wife if she were willing. But she might refuse to go. Philip hurried to the room where he had left her and opened the door so suddenly that she started up in terror. Her nerves were so shaken that day, poor girl.

"Bertha, my love," he said, breathlessly, "how would you like a trip to Europe?"

"You are joking, Philip." Was it eagerness or aversion in her eyes? He felt afraid to look and see. What resource was left if she would not go? "How can you leave your business?"

There was an inflection in her voice that made him glance quickly at her face. The coldest women have their enthusiasms; he had touched hers. He hardly knew her, her face had such a new vitality in it.

"And would you really like it so much?" he said, with his deep tenderness, that had a touch of reproach in it, which she was too dull ever to catch. He came up to her and explained what charming routes they should take, and what lovely lands they should see. Not France and Italy and the banks of the Rhine alone, but even Egypt and the far east, not a spot of beauty in the whole far off world, but they would enjoy it.

A flush was on Bertha's cheeks, at last, and her eyes shone like a young girl's while a lover whispers the first romance into her ears. And Philip sat by her side only too happy to see her smile, and to touch her golden braids of hair.

It was after the table in Mrs. Ginness' factory boarding house had been set for next morning's breakfast, which was soon after tea this same day, that one of the boarders came into the dining room and cleared away the dishes in front of him to write a letter. It was not a very highly ornamented room, but everything was painfully clean, reminding one of the aching arms of some poor woman, everything but the table cloth. Clean linen is one of the most exclusive luxuries of the rich; the industrious poor may achieve shining floors, and glistening faces, but spotless linen is quite beyond them. But it made very little difference to this man to-night, for his eyes were swollen so that discriminating vision was out of the question. He spread his paper before him, and after uncorking his ink bottle, made two or three abortive attempts to dip his pen. Then Bailes, for it was he, looked around to see if anybody was laughing at him. But the room was empty, all but a French girl and her lover in one corner, who were quite too much taken up with each other to take notice of anybody else. Then he tried again, and this time inked not alone the pen and half the length of the holder, but the palm of his hand in addition, and as a natural but apparently not foreseen consequence, that portion of the tablecloth within his reach. If it had been much that Bailes had cared to say, he probably would have given it up in despair, but it was only two lines, and even a blind man could write two lines, if he had a whole sheet of paper for he way. The two lines Bailes wrote were these:

"Curran. You are wanted here at once! A friend."

CHAPTER XXXII.

TOO LATE.

It was the afternoon of the Wednesday that the steamer Salvator was to sail. But Philip Breton and the woman he had hoped to save were yet in their house in Bretonville, hundreds of miles from the pier. The clock in Bertha's drawing room had struck three. It was the very hour; the last bell must be ringing now, and friends were saying their farewell words, handkerchiefs were waving graceful adieux, with here and there a teardrop. Home seemed very sweet at this moment of separation, and dreams of joys in strange lands seemed too vague to comfort many a heart that had been light and merry till now.

Philip had not slept these two nights for anxiety. The very air had seemed so full of danger he had feared the storm would burst upon them before today. New, haggard lines had come into his face. He had watched all the countenances of the villagers for signs and warnings. Would his enemies give him time? Well, they had given him time, and yet he waited.

He had driven to every train for his old friend Philbrick, but he had failed him. He had strained his blood shot eyes so eagerly last night to make him out of the solitary arrival on the evening train. If the old man had known how much depended on him, he would surely have hastened. Philip dared not trust his mills in any hands but his. The old man would be gentle with his charge; he was patient, he had broader ideas than Philip Breton, he was less of an aristocrat. And his mills were very dear to Philip—only less dear than his wife. Perhaps the old man might come yet, before the next steamer sailed, but there were three long days for his terrible secret to work its way to the light—three long, dark nights for a blow to fall.

Philip found Bertha in the drawing room, waiting for him. The excitement that flushed her face seemed to have smoothed out the lines of care, her eyes were brighter than love for him had ever made them. She seemed grown young as the first day in the garden she had fallen asleep on his shoulder. How the poor girl longed to go. He stood a moment before her, and love and sorrow swept over his soul in alternate waves. She was his beautiful wife, who looked to him for her only protection. And out of pity for the mob that had insulted her he had let slip, perhaps, his last hope of saving her. What did the wretches deserve? Yet perhaps he had sacrificed his wife to them. Perhaps this delay would make those sweet, eager eyes weep forever; that queenly, gold crowned head bow in humiliation. How the world would wonder that he had not saved her from a felon's cell, with such wealth and power as his to command. He had risked her salvation to soften the fate of the thousand ungrateful creatures in his mill who cared nothing for him.

"Oh, Bertha, forgive me!" he cried as if his heart broke that moment. All his hope seemed dead then; the waters of desolation were sweeping in ceaseless swelling waves over his soul.

For a moment the woman looked at him in silence, trying to interpret for herself the meaning on his wan, passion marked face. It was for him the supreme moment of an agony such a soul as hers could not even conceive of. The man suffered more in that moment, than the foulest dungeon in the world, or the scoffs of a city rabble, or the contempt of every woman that ever spoke her name could hurt her. Then she drew herself back from him; she thought, poor creature, she understood the expression on his face.

"Then you have missed the steamer, and you knew, too, how much I wanted to go." He did not speak, but a pitiful look of confusion was struggling into his face.

"When can we go, then?" she asked coldly.

"The next steamer sails Saturday." Saturday! Poor girl! Poor Bertha! The furies are folding their black wings this instant to settle about her soul. She only thought it was her pleasure trip was deferred; it was his plan to save her from impending ruin failed. One of the ministers of evil was at the gate this moment; now at the door; in the hall. Then the servant announced a name, and Mrs. Ellingsworth stepped into the room.

She had been smiling her best, but every smile vanished at the sight of the shawls and traveling bags. She looked sharply at Bertha, who was dressed in her blue traveling suit; her hat was on the sofa beside her. She glanced about the room. The chintz covers were placed over the damask upholstery; the piano was closed and packed. Bertha looked listlessly at her.

"Oh, won't you sit down?" But this strange visitor stood as if rooted to her place.

"You are going away?" Philip turned a surprised glance at her, the tone she assumed was crisp and imperious. He saw the dangerous look come into the dark, brilliant eyes, which forgot their dissembling for the moment. The woman knew everything. In some way she had learned the secret. Would she dare denounce his wife before him? Was he so poor a man a woman like this dared to beard him? He did not speak. Her message of scorn and infamy would come in a moment, she would tear down the veil he had spread before his wife's crime; he saw her red lips fairly trembling with the bitter words. Then Philip looked at her no more, but his eyes rested pityingly on Bertha. How would see meet it? Would she flash into rare passion? Would she turn pale and faint in overpowering shame?

"Yes, we were going to Europe," answered Bertha, utterly unconscious of the hate that glowered at her out of the flashing eyes. "Philip did not want me to speak of it or I should have told you before; but I suppose it don't make any difference now, since we've lost the steamer. It left the pier an hour ago. So we are not going now till Saturday. Isn't that it, Philip dear? Why, you don't mind my telling Jane?" It was Bertha's own words then, that had decided her fate. There had been some hope before, Philip now remembered; but at last her deadliest enemy knew everything. The mine would be sprung before to-morrow's sun had set. He could see it in the sudden triumphant gleam in the woman's eyes before she thought to smile. But Bertha was the only one who could talk, just yet.

"Why, you don't mind my telling Jane?"

"Won't you lend me a few things, to get me over a few days, everything is packed up, and our baggage on the way, you know?" and Bertha went on to explain in detail her ludicrous necessities. "To-morrow will do."

"Certainly, I only wish you had let me help you get ready." But her light laugh could not deceive Philip again, but it was too late now to guard against her. "I will run right home and get the things you spoke of ready for to-morrow."

Yes, and there were some other things she had not spoken of, Jane Ellingsworth would have ready for to-morrow, too.

(To be Continued.)

A gentleman who died recently near Berlin desired to have his tombstone decorated by the following legend: "I believe in one Saviour—in him everybody must believe, of whatever religion he may be—and he is Death, for he releases us from all our troubles." This has been done, and now the paris authorities have requested the heirs to remove the gravestone.

The Turkish ambassador in Paris has protested to the French Government against the production of De Bornier's play of Mahomet, founded upon the life and adventures of the founder of Islam, which has been accepted by the Theatre Francais. He has only succeeded in obtaining the assurance that no disrespect shall be shown to Mahomet's memory.

CAPTURING A FORTUNE.

The $15,000 which A. Moyer Obtained for Three Dollars.

The drawing of ticket No. 8,174, on which $30,000 was captured in The Louisiana State Lottery benefitted two Denver men to the extent of $15,000 each. One was Mr. A. Moyer, who held one-twentieth of that ticket; and the other was a gentleman named Tracy, whose identity has not yet been made known. Mr. Moyer drew his money through the City National Bank, and Mr. Tracy obtained his through the First National.

Mr. Moyer resides, and also has his place of business, at 1,116 Laramer street He was found yesterday, by a reporter for The Republican, engaged in dandling his little girl on his knee. Although the money was drawn by him through the City National Bank on September 16, he had modestly refained from making publication of the event.

"Yes," said he, "I drew the money on my ticket promptly. It was the third ticket I had purchased and I paid a dollar each for them. The other lucky ticket was held, I think, by an employe of the Rio Grande shops. His name, I believe, is Thomas Tracey."

Mr. Thomas Tracey was hunted up by a reporter who learned that he resided at 825 South Water street. There was a Mr. Tracey who resided there, but he disclaimed having been the possessor of such good fortune as to have purchased a lucky ticket. Yet it is quite certain that a Mr. Tracey, who is not yet found, owned the piece of paste-board, and collected the money.—Denver (Col.) Republican, October 15.

A NEW HOME TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result is that a simple remedy has been formulated whereby these distressing diseases are rapidly and permanently cured in from one to three simple applications made at home by the patient once in two weeks. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free on application by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King St., Toronto, Canada.—Scientific American.

Danger from Catarrh

Catarrh is an exceedingly disagreeable disease, its varied symptoms,—discharge at the nose, bad breath, pain between the eyes, coughing, choking sensation, ringing noises in the ears, etc.,—being not only troublesome to the sufferer, but offensive to others. Catarrh is also dangerous, because it may lead to bronchitis or consumption. Being a blood disease, the true method of cure is to purify the blood by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which has cured many severe cases of catarrh.

"For several years I had been troubled with a kind of asthma or catarrh in my throat, and had tried several kinds of medicine but could find nothing to help me. My wife wanted me to try a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. I told the druggist of whom I bought it that I had no faith in it, but would give it a trial, which I did. I must say I was very much benefitted by using it and would recommend it very highly to any one having asthma or catarrh." Elias P. Devries, firm of Devries & Peterson, Omaha, Neb.

STONE IN THE KIDNEY.

I was first taken with sharp pains in the lower part of my bowels in the region of the bladder. Shortly blood appeared mixed with my urine, and a few weeks later I had an attack of gravel, I tried a number of doctors. One said it was gravel, another inflammation of the bladder, and another stone in kidneys. For three months I was under the care of an eminent doctor at Albany, but constantly growing worse, went home to die. At this time I was induced to try Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., and am now robust and strong. A remedy which can do this for one so near death as I was should be known everywhere. I hope this statement will cause others afflicted as I was to use the Remedy.—C. W. Brown, Petersburgh, N. Y.

THE CHAMBER OF TORTURE

Is the apartment to which the unhappy sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism is confined. If ere the crisis of pain is reached, that fine preventive, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is used by persons of a rheumatic tendency, much unnecessary suffering is avoided. Nervines, anodynes and sedatives, while having none but a specific effect, are yet very desirable at times. Yet can they produce no lasting effect upon rheumatism, because they have no power to eliminate from the blood the rheumatic virus. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters does this, and checks at the outset a disease which, if allowed to gain headway, it is next to impossible to dislodge or to do more than relieve. Rheumatism, it should be remembered, is a disease with a fatal tendency from its proneness to attack the heart. A resort to the Bitters should, therefore, be prompt. Dyspepsia, kidney complaint, malaria and nervousness are relieved by it.

LIBRARIES FOR SHOW.

The Purchase of Books by Ignorant Parvenus.

A New York Sun reporter interviewed a book-seller with regard to the purchase of books for the mere sake of their bindings by ignorant parvenus. "I have been sent for several times this year," said the salesman, "to measure the shelves of libraries in new houses, to find out the number of books required to fit them up. Books are an important item in house furnishing. The comfortable old-time sitting-room has made way for the formal library. As a library without books would hardly do, house owners are bound to have them whether they possess literary tastes or not. Besides, they add tone and color to a room. A customer recently said to me, frankly enough: 'I don't pretend to read anything except the papers; but there's a home feeling in having books around; they look well, too, and sort of encourage the children.' He told me to be 'sure and "chuck" in a few big ones to put on the tables.' Another harmless fellow, who wanted the reputation of a man of culture, always directed us to put in some books that had been used a little. He once told me that he was bound to have a library as big as his neighbor's, and whenever the latter ordered a new stand-up show case he was going to do the same. Some of these folks have queer ideas.

One of our customers insisted on having all his books bound after the same pattern and numbered. Some time afterward a friend told him that people were asking if he kept a circulating library; so he had morocco labels stuck on over the figures. But this only made the matter worse, for his guests were particular to ask him what the labels were for. At last, in sheer desperation, he sent the volumes to an auction-room, and we received his offer the next day for so many feet of books, each one differently bound. He wouldn't have even a two-volume edition of anything. A wealthy man once sent in great haste for a dealer, saying that he wanted his library closed out immediately and a new one bought. He was a speculator in produce, but some one had sold him a law library. He liked the uniform appearance of the volumes, and had made the purchase without reading the titles. His new books were to be illustrated, all of them. When I first went into the business I was surprised to see at a customer's house an extravagantly-bound copy of Shakespeare's works in the German language. I knew the man did not understand German, and the circumstance puzzled me. I found out afterward that a bookseller had loaded him up with a very unsalable article by telling him that every gentlemen ought to have a copy of Shakespeare's works in the original.

"No; house furnishers do not often buy the books for a library, but they frequently give directions as to binding. They look for light, elegant, and well-contrasted colors, or for heavy antique morocco or Russia bindings suited to the character of the room. As a rule, the owner of the house thinks himself competent to buy his own books, though he seeks aid from us in making his choice. I once picked out a handsome assortment for a customer about to refurnish his house. He had no acquaintance with books; but he looked over the titles and made some rather interesting expurgations. He told me to put all of the standard 'thorities in anyway, and he would attend to the rest. He threw out 'In the Meshes'—which he supposed to be a book on fishing—because he was no angler. 'Boswell's Life of Johnson' was rejected because he didn't want political campaign works; and wouldn't have the biographies of the presidents, they all lied so. These men do not bother us much, for they are easily satisfied; but what do you think of a gentleman who refuses to pay his bill because you have 'left out the dictionary—the most important work of all—from a complete edition of Daniel Webster's works.'"

The Church Bell War.

[New York Letter.]

As the senate committee on education and labor seems to have a sort of roving commission, I don't see why it should not take up the church bell question in which some New Yorkers are just now deeply interested—Jackson Schultz, the leather man, more than any one else. You have heard of Jackson Schultz. Every one has heard of him. There are some, in fact, who frankly say they heard quite enough of Jackson Schultz, and some still more frank, who say they have heard too much of him. Mr. Schultz is a great reformer. He wants to reform everything. He is convinced that the world will never go right till it is remodeled on a plan drawn by Jackson Schultz. Mr. Schultz lives near St. George's church, which has a bell that is rang early every morning. The ringing of the bell annoys him. He could easily move away from the neighborhood of the bell, but he does not propose to do that. What he does propose to do is to suppress the bell. And not only that bell, but all other church bells. This fight will go on, he says, till every church bell in New York is stopped. Church bells must go. They are a nuisance, and quite unnecessary, and their doom is sealed. Mr. Schultz has been joined in his crusade by another man, who makes complaint against another bell connected with an institution belonging to the Little Sisters for the Poor. That bell must be suppressed, too, the other man says. It rings him up when he don't want to get up, and makes him uncomfortable in various ways. Jackson Schultz, and the other man, are determined to carry on the fight at all hazards, and "arouse a public sentiment that will sweep every church bell out of existence."

"By Foolery Thrive."

[Inter Ocean.]

Peck, of Peck's Sun, and author of "The Bad Boy," to an interviewer of The Boston Traveler said that his mother often asked him why he made such a fool of himself. His reply was, of course, "because it is the most profitable thing a wise man can do."

BIBLE STATISTICS.

Interesting Facts Gleamed from the Old and New Testaments.

After the bishops' translation of 1568-1589, nothing further in that line was accomplished until 1609-1610, when the Roman Catholics brought out the Douay Bible, so called because it was printed at a city of that name. A year later, in 1611, the English press issued the King James revision.

The translation of 1611 has remained the standard up even to this day, notwithstanding the recent revision, the merit of which rests almost wholly on the fact that "hell" was changed to "hades."

The Bible of today (Old Testament) contains 39 books, 929 chapters, 23,214 verses, 592,439 words and 2,738,100 letters.

The New Testament has 27 books, 270 chapters, 7,967 verses, 132,253 words and 933,380 letters.

In speaking of the Bible it is generally understood that we mean the two books, the Old and the New Testament, which, taken collectively, have 66 books, 1,189 chapters, 31,173 verses, 773,692 words and 3,566,480 letters.

The word Lord, or its equivalent, Jehovah, occurs 7,698 times in the Old Testament; or, to be more exact, the word Lord occurs 1,853 times, and the word Jehovah 5,845 times.

The Apocrypha (rejected by the Council of Nice as uninspired, but sometimes bound with the inspired portions) contains 14 books, 183 chapters, 15,081 verses and 153,185 words.

The shortest chapter in the Bible, and which is also the middle chapter, is Psalm 117. The middle verse is Psalm xviii. 8.

The shortest verse in the Old Testament I Chronicles i, 25; shortest in New Testament is John xi, 35.

The ninth verse of the eighth chapter of Esther is the longest verse in the entire work.

The word "and" occurs 35,543 times in the Old Testament and the word "reverend" but once.

Most commentators, in fact all that the writer has ever consulted, say that the word "girl" is to be found but once between the first chapter of Genesis and the last chapter of Malichi—in the third verse of the third chapter of Joel. This, however, is a mistake, which can be proven by turning to the fifth verse of the eighth chapter of Zachariah.

Four verses of the 107th Psalm—the 8th, 15th, 21st and 31st—are exactly alike, and the 36th chapter of Isaiah and the 19th chapter of II Kings are alike.

The above curious facts in regard to the number of chapters, verses, words and letters in the Holy Book were ascertained by the Prince of Granada, heir to the Spanish throne, who was for thirty-three years a prisoner in the Palace of Skulls, Madrid, with no companion except his Bible, which he faithfully perused and dissected for the benefit of more fortunate humanity.

After a great deal of laborious research I am enabled to give the following explanations of obscure Bible terms:

The cubit, according to Sir Isaac Newton, was 20,625 English inches.

A finger's breadth was 1 inch.

A span was 8 inches.

A shekel of silver was about 49 cents of our United States money.

A shekel of gold was $8.09.

The talent of gold was $13,809.

The talent of silver was $516.32.

The mite was about a 1½ cents.

The gerham 1 cent.

The farthing was 3 cents.

The weights and measures of the same good old days were:

The nepha contained 7 gallons and 5 pints.

The homer 75 gallons and 5 pints.

The omer 6 pints.

The bath was the same as the nepha. The hin was 1 gallon and 2 pints. The firkin 7 pints and the cup 3 pints.

There are nine books and one psalm mentioned in the Bible which are now lost to the world.

The book of Jasher, mentioned in Joshua x, 13, and II Samuel i, 18.

The book of Iddo, the Seer, to which reference is made twice in II Chronicles—in ix, 29 and xii, 15.

The prophesies of Ahijah. See II Chronicles x, 29.

Book of Shemaiah, mentioned in II Chronicles xii, 15.

Book of Jehu. See II Chronicles xx, 34.

Solomon's five books on natural history. See II Kings iv, 31-35.

The prophecy of Enoch. See Jude, 14.

The book of the wars of the Lord. See Numbers xxi, 14. The psalm mentioned in several places but not found in the Bible is the 151st.

There are many other curious facts in regard to the Bible that would interest the reader, but space forbids further reference to them here. Enough has been said to convince anyone of an inquiring turn of mind that the old Bible is not the dryest book in the world after all.—John W. Wright in St. Louis Republic.

The Sparrow's Family.

The fecundity of the English sparrow is enormous. As computed by the department of agriculture the progeny of a single pair in ten years would number 275,716,983,698!

Sparrows accommodate themselves with great ease to the home of their adoption, and seem well pleased with all parts of our country, possibly because living is easier here. Mr. John Colam, secretary of the Royal S. P. C. A., told the writer that the sparrow in England is not polygamous.—New Orleans Picayune.

A Gorgeous Liar.

"Steward," he said, feebly, in the small hours of the stormy night, trying to turn over in his berth; "steward, what's that?"

"The sailor on deck, sir."

"Yes, but what did he say just now?"

"'All well,' sir."

"My, what a liar!"

And then he turned over and moaned a mel de mer moan.—Ocean.

The Festive Crocodile.

[London Telegraph.]

With its short legs out of sight in the ooze, its murderous snout sunk to the upper jaw, a tangle of river drift caught upon its shoulders, and the tail perhaps lying in a pool of water, the bulky reptile looks so harmless that birds sit twittering upon its armor, and hunt among the crevices of the fungoid-grown and slimy scales for insects. Its very size disarms suspicion; the outlines become indistinct, the complete monster indistinguishable. And a crocodile's patience for mischief is prodigious. Hour after hour, and all day long, the abominable fraud lies in its place without a sign of life. Natives going to their work in the morning look down from the bank and see the birds flitting about the dark object at the water line in pursuit of the swarming mud flies that are attracted to the brute by their keen sense of smell; but, familiar as they are with the wiles of muggur and gharal (as they call the blunt and the sharp-nosed crocodiles respectively), they are deceived to the last, and go on their way to the field or shop thinking it was only driftwood that they had seen. If it had been a dead body, bullock or tattoo, washed up by the river, the vultures would have been close by, patiently waiting for the carrion to ripen in the festering heat, and the crows would have been there too, hopping on and off it impatiently, trying the tough hide here and there with their beaks, and cawing and croaking in discontent with their battled appetites.

But by and by, if the crocodile will only hold out, or unless some one passing halloos to it at a venture—"just to see if it is a muggur or not"—there will come along the water's edge a hungry pariah dog, trotting in an aimless, shuffling way, and sniffing as it passes at everything in the line of drift, with its head turned toward the river, and away from the crocodile. And so, trotting along, thinking only of chance offal, it comes up to the waiting brute. A sandpiper, startled by the dog's plashing feet, tumbles up with a sharp cry from under the shade of the reptile's side, and the pariah stops dead, startled as the bird, watches it flit along the shore and resettle a few yards further on and then resume its jog-trot, or rather, it has just made up its mind to go on, when suddenly the ooze all around it seems to heave up, and in a shower of mud there is an instant's vision of a huge pair of jaws, glistening with white teeth, and then a crimsoned ripple on the river, and the tragedy is complete. The native thinks he heard a dog yelp, and turns his head. There is only a scared sandpiper wheeling in the air.

The Man With a Beard.

[Milwaukee Sentinel.]

The man with the long beard at the dime museum passed the seven feet of brown hair on his chin through his hands yesterday forenoon when asked how he accounted for it, and said that scientists called it a "freak of nature." He is a tall (nigh to six feet) man, with thick gray hair, trimmed up close, and rather thin, gaunt face and frame. His mouth is as good as hidden by a thick mustache that mingles with the beard growing high up on his cheeks. And that beard runs on and on, tapering from the bushy growth at the roots to a thin point over seven feet away, and changing from a dark brown in color to a light straw as it gets away from the foundation. The reporter of The Sentinal ran the curious growth between his fingers and found it fine and silky. Then he inquired how long that thing had been going on.

"When I was 12 years old," answered the wearer, "I had a very good and strong beard that grew very fast, and when I was 16 I had an astonisher for a boy. I was brought up on a farm in Camden, N. Y., where I still have a nice place, and was always a good deal talked about around home on account of my whiskers. My name? Oh, yes! It is Edwin Smith, and I was born in 1732."

"Did you use to shave often?"

"Between 12 and 20 years of age I shaved some, but after that I let it grow, although keeping it trimmed up well. It grows about five inches a year, and I have had it measure seven feet nine inches. Just now it is worn off from handling."

"Been in the show business long?"

"I started at it three years ago as a professional. I lost my wife and got uneasy staying on the old place, so went out with Barnum for a change. I used to, six or seven years ago, go out to the country fairs and make $50 a day by showing myself in a little tent I owned. Then I went to California, and there I surprised the whole coast."

"How do you account for it?"

"I don't. The scientists have studied it, but couldn't make anything out of it, so called it a freak. I have a twin brother whose beard never gets beyond six inches long. That seems strange to me."

A Missing Link.

[Exchange.]

A primary school teacher in one of our New England cities, met with a strange experience. Having taken pride in imparting to her pupils much information not found in their spellers and readers, she thought she would show this to the visitors on examination day, and framed a set of questions, such as "Who made you?" "What are you made of?" etc., and so drilled the scholars in the answers that each child knew the question coming to him and its answer.

The room was full of visitors who had heard of the teacher's new method. She called up the class and gave the first question, "Johnnie, who made you?"

No answer. Johnnie was dumb as a fish.

"Who made you?" the teacher repeated, in a tone intended to reassure the frightened child. But he only stared.

"Why, don't you know who made you, Johnnie?" asked the puzzled teacher, for the third time.

"Please, ma'am," exclaimed Johnnie, "I am the little boy what is made of flesh and blood; and—and—the little boy God made has got the mumps."

EXPERIENCE AS AN EDUCATOR.

Though a Man May Live Long in the Land He Is Never Done Learning.

The school of experience is often a costly one, but it is generally a thorough one. Lessons learned from experience are generally more lastingly and effectually impressed upon the mind than those which are merely theoretical, and a young man's education is never complete, or at least never actually on the road to completion, until he has studied in the varied and ever expanding school of practical experience. Theoretical education, however thorough, however well taught, can never fit a man to begin a practical business life with any assurance of success, anywhere but at the foundation. Theory is undoubtedly the foundation of all practical knowledge, but, without the actual practice and experience, is of little value.

This is a fact which too many young men at the present time ignore, and which sooner or later proves their ruin. They are wont to think that, because they have passed a successful course at school or college, and have mastered the theoretical problems, they are fitted to enter upon the practical application of theory without further study, and make a success of their undertaking.

A man's education is never complete, and those who have the sense to see and acknowledge this are the ones who will be most sure of becoming successful. The longer a man lives, the more thoroughly he becomes impressed with the fact of his limited knowledge, and he is never more easily and thoroughly impressed with this than when he begins a practical business life. He starts in with the idea that he knows it all. Theory has taught him cause and effect, and he has only to follow out his calculations to attain the desired end.

The fallacy of this kind of reasoning is too evident to need further comment, and examples of its results are not wanting to warn any one against pursuing such a course. And still how futile seem the efforts of those who are able to advise to impress these facts upon the minds of those younger in years, and who have never learned from the school of experience.

The theoretical school is the one in which the young mind should first be taught, because it is then that it is more susceptible to such teachings, and less able to profit by experience requiring stronger physical developments; but this mental training should be supplemented by one combining both the theoretical and the practical, and it is in this that experience proves itself a most thorough and able educator, and no young man's education at the present time should be considered complete until he has been thus taught. Then, no matter what conditions surround him, whether he be the son of wealth or heir to a humbler inheritance, he is, at least, fitted to take his position in life with a knowledge of what life is, and be able to provide for himself and those who may be dependent upon him for life's necessities. — Boston Budget.

Write Slowly.

The one absorbing object of this breathless age seems to be rapidity. In putting down ideas on paper, no other quality seems to be taken into account. The typewriting machine that can be made to write 144 words a minute crows over the machine that can compass only 126 words a minute.

There are indeed some kinds of work, I concede, in which utmost rapidity is the paramount requisite; such work as copying, taking notes, reporting, belongs to this class. And I plead a native bias toward rapid work in penmanship as strong as anybody's; in fact, if my own experience had not demonstrated thoroughly that in some kinds of work, and especially in original composition, the more haste the less speed, I should be driving my pen as fast as it could possibly go, for that is indeed my impulse. As a matter of fact, however, I purposely put on the brakes; I am writing this with an old fashioned quill pen; partly, perhaps, because I have come to like the squeak of it, and find it the easiest to the fingers of any pen in the world, but principally because it compels somewhat slower and more deliberate work.

Why, then, seek for slowness? Because their is an interval between the first inception of the sentence in the mind and its final form on paper, which to him who has learned to utilize it, is the most valuable moment of composition. I would not take a great deal for that interval; the time that I lose therein is time gained. For in that brief time all the mechanical and grammatical questions are debated and settled. In every sentence I have here made, such as it is, while my quill has been squeaking through one word after another, my thoughts have been constantly running ahead, and taking care of the verbs and the pronouns, and the commas and the semicolons; so that when the old pen caught up its exact work was ready for it.—Professor Genung in Writer.

Wood Bending.

There are comparatively few persons outside the carriage and boat building interest that know to what an extent the wood bending business is carried, and the management that is necessary to carry on a well arranged wood bending establishment. Few know that the fine carriages they ride in are very largely made of bent wood. The felloes of their wheels are bent and made in two parts. The framework of coaches and heavy carriages is nearly all made of bent stock. They are not only better, but more cheaply made. The frames of most of our pleasure boats are bent, and so are many of the frames of some of our finest sailing yachts. Furniture of many kinds has bent frames. The objects of bending are, saving of time and stock, stability and strength of work and beauty of form. It is a business that needs to be well understood, however, to make a success of it. Simple as the work seems to be, yet it is full of little details which must be strictly attended to, else the result is a miserable failure.—New York Telegram.

PRECIOUS PEARLS.

One of the Most Beautiful Ornaments Used in Fashionable Jewelry.

The pearl, which has no real relationship with precious stones, is numbered among them in the world of ornament for the sake of its beauty. Formed almost exclusively of lime and an organic matter secreted by its parent mollusca, it has yet, when its dimensions are favorable, and its smooth and beautiful form reflects with an inimitable softness the colors of the light, the preciousness of a corindon, which can boast of birth far back in the Azoic age, and a durability that, compared with the fragile and sensitive "gem of the sea," is well-nigh eternal.

The pearl, which the ancients considered a drop of dew imprisoned in the shell, which early some morning opened to receive its prize, and then held it like a little idol enshrined evermore, is now well known to be a slow and perhaps painful product of the marine animal, which in several families belongs to the order Mollusca, the most important being the "Avicula Margaritifera"; a species which not only produces the globular or pear-shaped pearl, but the "mother of pearl," that has a somewhat similar luster, although different construction; the constituent layers of the pearl being concentric, while those of "mother of pearl" are parallel, which prevent the optical effects from being the same. Experiments have been made to determine the time spent in the formation of a pearl, and the result suggests that two or three years are spent to spread a sufficient number of these pearly layers to reach a size of any value.

There is no fixed money value of pearls according to their size, as quality has so important a part in their valuation. A pearl of finest quality is sparkling white, with a delicate reflection of azure; the least tint of yellow spoils it completely, and in securing a necklace of pearls the matching of size and tint gives what is called an "associate value." The bridal gift of the Princess Royal of England, consisting of thirty-two well-matched though not perfectly associated pearls is valued at $93,000. In 1789 the Crown of France held pearls valued at $186,000, but some of these have caught the deadly ailment of discolorment, which no art has yet found means to prevent or to cure.

The possibility of change in the beauty and value of the pearl is one of the sad perils attending its possession. A moral is pointed against the too jealous hoarding of treasure in the history of a merchant who became the owner of a wonderful pearl of the size of a pigeon's egg, and of an opalescent lustre so marvelous that people traveled long distances to be allowed to gaze upon the wonder. The merchant, to express the sanctity of this object, made it the centre of something like a temple, whose inner sanctum, paved with malachite, and hung with silken tapestries, contained a pedestal of Egyptian marble on which was placed an intricate casket unlocked by a magical key under the spell of incantations. So guarding his pearl, dearer to him than his life, and representing a fortune, the merchant reached the moment when he wished to display his treasure to the eyes of royalty. A retinue of nobles and a concourse of bankers awaited the spectacle. The mysterious alphabet which regulated the openings of the manifold casket was carefully followed; the unique key was applied to the last guard of the priceless treasure, when lo! almost death-struck with sudden dismay, the merchant found only a mockery of the contents. The imprisoned pearl had lost at once its beauty and its value; it was, indeed, no longer a pearl—the pearl of pearls—but a poor little mass of unattractive limestone, fast darkening to decay.

The most beautiful pearls are found in the Persian Gulf and the Straits of Manaar, which separates Ceylon from India, or more recently in the Gulf of Mexico and upon the coasts of California and the vicinity of Panama. Pain, which is associated with the production of so many precious things that "to take pains" has become the watchword of achievement, is associated with the pearl not only in its birth, but in its presentation to the daylight. The pearl-divers are a short-lived and suffering people.

The love of the ancients for pearls, the extravagance of the Romans in spending fortunes upon them, is well known, and moderns have exhibited equal enthusiasm. Twenty-five years were spent in search for "virgin pearls" to form the necklace (the most perfect pearl necklace now in the world) of the dowager Empress of Russia.

Just at present the "rage" in jewelry is for pearls, and they are set with diamonds, or arranged together in many charming forms. Rosettes and pansies of pearls are linked together with graded strings, or strung like rosaries; earrings are made in circlets and other Greek forms; a hemisphere of large pearls is one of the caprices as a clasp to the bodice; and two of the reigning beauties of the day wear tongs of diamonds clasping as the "live coal" a radiant pearl.—N. Y. Evening Post.

SORT OF UNPLEASANT.

A Revenue Officer's Adventure Among the Georgia Moonshiners.

The moonshiners in Union County gave Deputy Marshal Trammell a warm reception the other night.

The deputy marshal, whose home is in Fannin County, was called to Union County on official business. He knew there were some pretty tough customers in that county, but he anticipated no serious trouble. Mr. Trammell went through the county horseback. His destination was Blairsville. Night came upon him and he stopped at Jesse Souders, who lives seven miles from Blairsville and who is known to be a good citizen. He rode up to the gate and asked if he could stay all night.

"Certainly, sir," was the reply, "if you are willing to put up with our accommodations."

"I suppose I can get accommodations for my horse, too?" asked the deputy marshal.

"Yes. Just ride around through that gate, and I will come out and help you get the corn and fodder for your horse."

"All right."

And Mr. Trammell rode around as directed, and Mr. Souders came out and assisted him in putting his horse in the log stable and then went up into the loft and threw down a couple of bundles of fodder and a dozen ears of corn. They were given to the horse, and the two men went into the house.

—Mr. Trammell found Mr. Souders and his family clever people, and a short time after his entrance to the house he was asked into supper—a good substantial supper—yellow-legged chicken, butter, biscuits, coffee, etc. After the evening meal the gentlemen lit their pipes and went out on the little porch to take a smoke while the females busied themselves cleaning up in the dining-room. When this was finished the ladies came out and general conversation was indulged in till about ten o'clock, when all retired.

The night was cool and pleasant, and soon the deputy marshal, tucked snugly away in a feather bed, was wrapped in the arms of Morpheus and dreaming of successful raids and large accounts. The cocks were crowing for day when the deputy marshal awoke. He felt refreshed, and hearing the people astir about the house, arose and dressed, thinking all the while how fortunate he was in having found such a comfortable place to spend the night. He went out of his room and was met by Mr. Souders, who told him breakfast was waiting, and not waiting a second invitation he walked into the dining-room and sat down at the table upon which was spread a breakfast good enough for any man. After breakfast, for it was not yet good day, the two men went out to feed the stock. When Mr. Trammell entered the stable where had left his nag, he found a hideous-looking animal standing before him. It was his horse, but his mane and tail had been shaved off, and blood was dripping from two deep cuts in his side. The saddle and and bridle were cut to pieces and a note pinned to a piece of the saddle telling Trammell he had better hit the grit and not make his visit a prolonged one around Choate.

Mr. Trammell felt shocked, and scarcely knew what to do. Mr. Souders appeared to regret the outrageous proceedings as deeply as did Mr. Trammell. The saddle and bridle were patched up and placed upon the horse, but Mr. Trammell found that his horse would not do to ride and continued to lead him. He had not gone far before two shots were fired upon him from the bushes, but both missed their mark, and Mr. Trammell hurried on. He does not want any more of such experience, and says he is satisfied the good people of the county disapprove of any such proceedings. Several of them told him so, and said they would aid in bringing the guilty parties to justice.—Atlanta Constitution.

FRANCIS SCOTT KEY.

Francis Scott Key, the author of the "Star-Spangled Banner," was a prominent citizen of the District of Columbia when I can first remember it. He belonged to an old Maryland family, and was quite a noted lawyer, serving for years as United States District Attorney. During this period he closed the haunts of vice at the metropolis, and there was less crime than before or afterward. Mr. Key's mind was inventive, imaginative and yet logical. He reasoned with great ingenuity, and, though his reasoning was not abstruse nor very profound, it never wanted vigor, plausibility or effectiveness. He addressed himself to the good sense and discrimination of the judge and jury, and, though in a high degree poetical, he seldom or never indulged in the mere ornaments of imagination or the "dazzling fence of argument." In early life he had devoted himself to the muses, and threw out from time to time poetical effusions which indicated no common talent. Like all ardent and imaginative minds he loved to bathe in the Pierian fountains, and to repose by the waterfalls of Helicon. The law, however, is inimical to poetry, or the indulgence of poetical feeling, and, like Blackstone and Story, he abandoned the muses and devoted himself to the arid study and laborious practice of the law, which he regarded with reverence as a science, and believed, with Hooker, that, "her seat was the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world." His political predilections, however, did not a together forsake him, and his beautiful lyric, the "Star Spangled Banner," written in the meridian of life, showed that he could not wholly abandon his first love. And yet it will appear strange that, with all his poetical fervor, his speeches at the bar and elsewhere displayed nothing of a poetical temperament, and were distinguished only by great simplicity of style, with scarcely any attempt at ornament. He believed that good sense and argument, not embellishment, at the bar, were the principium et fors of his good speaking as well as writing. Mr. Key died in January, 1843, and was buried, with other members of his family, in a picturesque cemetery at Frederick City, Maryland, from which can be seen the Sugarloaf and Catoctin mountains. In 1857 his brother-in-law, Chief-Justice Taney, published Key's poems in New York. Taney says, in his introduction, speaking of the "Star-Spangled Banner": "The song is becoming a National one, and will, I think, from its great merit, continue to be so, especially in Maryland." Like all men, Mr. Key had his faults, but they were overshadowed by the splendor of his virtues. He was ardent in his attachments, but bitter in his enmities, benevolent, but prejudiced, useful as a citizen, and alike eminent for his philanthropy, his political ability and his legal talents.—Ben Perley Poore, in Boston Budget.

CARL DUNDER.

He Is Catching on to American Ways at Last.

"Hello! Mr. Dunder!" saluted Sergt. Bendall as that individual entered the Central station with a broad, satisfied smile on his countenance.

"Hello! sergeant. Vhas eafrythings all right mit you?"

"I guess so. You look happy."

"Sergeant, I vhas shust like sweet oil. No more troubles for me. I vhas catching on to do shust like Americans."

"I am glad of that. You used to be terribly green."

"Anything happened lately?" queried the sergeant in a careless way.

"Vhell, not mooch. Some fellers try to beat me, but dey doan' make oudt. I vhas too sharp for 'em. One feller comes along mit six pairs of sheep shears in a bundle. He doan' want to sell dose shears, but he likes to borrow three dollars for one day und leaf 'em for security. If he doan' come pack in one day dose shears vhas mine."

"I see."

"He doan' come pack. Maype he break his leg or something, but dot vhas nothing to me. I keep dose shears. If somepody beats me, sergeant, he shall haf to get cop wery early in der morning."

"I presume so. Have you the shears there?"

"I haf. I belief you like to see 'em."

"They are worth two shillings a pair," said the sergeant, after an inspection. "You are out of pocket fourteen shillings, and what do you expect to do with sheep shears?"

"Heafens! I doan' think of dot!" gasped Mr. Dunder as he grew white in the face.

"Anything else?"

"Vhell, I get my life insured. I doan' belief I vhas sheated by dot. A feller comes along und says vhas I Carl Dunder? I vhas. "And he wanted the $2 in advance?" queried the sergeant.

"Of course. Dot vhas to pay for shwearing me."

"Well, you are beaten again, Mr. Dunder. Insurance men don't do business that way. Good day!"

"How you mean?"

"You had better go home. Have you got a tub in your house?"

"Of course."

"Any bran at the barn?"

"Yes."

"Well, make the tub about half full of mash, and then put your head to soak for about forty-eight hours. When through buy some No. 4 sandpaper and polish it down to the bone."

"Sergeant, vhas I some greenhorns?"

"You are."

"Vhill I eafer learn somethings?"

"Never."

INDEPENDENCE, CAL
FRIDAY DECEMBER 27 1889

The capitalists of New York appear to be aiming at a big job. This is nothing less than the total subversion of the United States Government. The Wall street organ, the "Financier," recently contained the following amazing article:

"In our opinion, the State, as distinguished from the United States Government itself, will at an early be so merged into the whole, that its present costly and more or less useless paraphernalia will be entirely discontinued.

"As this is a tremendous issue, and involving great interests, we slowly and quietly set the ball rolling, and invite controversy from all stand points; our own being from a financial point of view; that is, strictly business and devoid of sentiment."

There is no beating about the bush here. This is a plain, open proposition to do away with the whole Federal system of State Governments and invest all governmental power in one grand center. The offices for clerks might be in Washington but the real power to command the obedience of the whole people would be in Wall street. It is so easy for any small clique of people to imagine that they are the only ones of any consequence in the world. Sects of religious people hold this idea, and men who have plenty of money and little or no religion fall into the same mistake quite readily. But a great people are not so easily controlled and compelled to accept masters. An attempt to change the English constitution brought Charles Stuart to the block. He had already sent his willing tool, Strafford, to perdition by the same bloody route. Charles II was wise enough to see that the English people would not submit to despotic government and refused "to again go upon his travels." His stupid and stubborn brother James wanted to be a despot like his father and the attempt brought the Stuart dynasty to an end. The French kings and ignoble nobles regarded common people with Supreme contempt. These idlers reveled in the wildest revelry while the masses toiled and suffered in hunger and rags. The kings and the nobles ransacked earth and sea for dainty food and said that grass was good enough for the "Jaques," as they contemptuously called the working people. "But the outraged "Jaques" chopped off the head of a king and the heads of thousands of the haughty nobles in vengeance for the wrongs heaped upon them. And the vengeance was just. The American colonists pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for the defense of freedom, and it is not at all likely that their descendents will give up the liberty so dearly won and so jealously guarded to a handful of purse-proud speculators in Wall street.

A Clerical Error.

In a country church the curate had to give out two notices, the first of which was about baptisms and the latter had to do with a new hymn book. Owing to an accident he inverted the order, and gave out as follows: "I am requested to give notice that the new hymn book will be used for the first time in this church on Sunday next, and I am also requested to call the attention to the delay which often takes place in bringing children to be baptised; they should be brought on the earliest day possible. This is particularly pressed on mothers who have young babies." "And for the information of those who have none," added the rector, in gentle, kindly tones, and who being deaf had not heard what had previously been said; "for the information of those who have none, I may state that if wished they can be obtained on application in the vestry immediately after service to day, Limp ones, one shilling each; with stiff backs, two shillings.—London Figaro.

The Power of Dinner.

A distinguished lawyer came out of his private office a few days ago and brusquely told a reporter that he did not care to discuss the private affairs of his clients. He said it was none of the public's business, and then he bounced back into his private office and slammed the door. It was important that the reporter should get the news, and so, on the strength of past experiences, he called at the lawyer's home that night. The lawyer had just finished his dinner, and he came into his parlor, his face beaming with geniality and a prime cigar in his mouth. He shook the reporter's hand, and then talked to him for half an hour, and gave him more information than he had any use for. A light knowledge of human nature is sometimes very useful.—New York Sun.

"The Passion of Christ."

The most curious book in the world is one that is neither written nor printed. Every letter of the text is cut into the leaf, and as alternate leaves are of blue paper it is as easily read as the best print. The labor required and the patience necessary to cut each leaf may be imagined. The work is so perfect that it seems as though done by machinery, but every character was made by hand. The book is entitled "The Passion of Christ," and is now in a museum in France.—London

A CROON ON HENNACLIFF.

Thus said the rushing raven
Unto his hungry mate,
"Ho, gossip! for Bude Haven!
There be corpses six or eight.
Cawk, cawk! the crew and skipper
Are wallowing in the sea,
So there's a savory supper
For my old dame and me."

"Cawk! gaffer! thou art dreaming
The shore hath wreckers bold,
Would rend the yelling seamen
From the clutching billows' hold!
Cawk! cawk! they'd bound for booty,
Into the dragon's den,
And shout 'For death or duty!'
If the prey were drowning men."

Loud laughed the listening surges
At the guess our grandam gave;
You might call them Boanerges
From the thunder of their wave!
And mockery followed after
The seabird's jeering brood,
That filled the skies with laughter
From Lundy Light to Bude.

"Cawk! cawk!" then said the raven;
"I am four score years and ten,
Yet never in Bude Haven
Did I croak for rescued men.
They will save the captain's girdle,
And shirt, if shirt there be,
But leave their blood to curdle
For my old dame and me."

So said the rushing raven
Unto his hungry mate:
"Ho, gossip! for Bude Haven!
There be corpses six or eight.
Cawk! cawk! the crew and skipper
Are wallowing in the sea;
Oh, what a dainty supper
For my old dame and me."

—Robert Stephen Hawker.

EVIDENCE BROKEN.

An English lawyer once said that circumstantial evidence would hang the king of England. While that was putting it pretty strong, it is admitted that a chain of circumstantial evidence has often sent men to the gallows. If a circumstance can be explained away, it is but a shadow. If it cannot be explained away, it becomes a menace to the prisoner's life. A witness may be bribed, abducted or impeached. A circumstance is a lion in the path demanding blood.

It has been often asserted that innocent men have been hung on circumstantial evidence. There may have been such instances, but they have been rare indeed. In my own experience in law and detective work I have seen some curious things about circumstantial evidence. It is, in one sense, the strongest chain which can be forged, in another the very weakest.

About twenty years ago I was detailed on a murder case in a Kentucky town. It was not to work up the case, but to save if possible the young man arrested for the crime. When I got the facts and details, I felt helpless to accomplish anything. He was a young man of twenty-three, named Graham, and was of respectable family. He had been engaged to a young lady of the highest respectability, but they had quarreled about something. Common friends had brought about a reconciliation, but a new suitor had appeared upon the scene, and Graham's jealousy had provoked another quarrel. He had not visited her for two weeks, when, on the evening of Sunday, Oct. 30, one of Graham's friends met him and said:

"Your rival is up at Lossing's, and seems bound to cut you out. Adele seems very sweet on him!"

Graham truly loved the girl, and this speech made him wild. He turned pale, trembled, and finally said:

"He is an adventurer and an interloper. Let him look out for himself!"

An hour later he started for Lossing's. He passed several people, who saw that he was excited. The house stood back from the road in a grove of trees, and was approached by two paths or drives from the front. Graham fully intended to enter the house, but when he came upon the grounds his courage failed him. He was afraid he might say or do something rash in his present mood, and very sensibly decided to return to town and defer his call till the next day. Next morning his rival's dead body was found on one of the drives, about half way between the house and the fence. He had been struck down with a bludgeon. Conclusions are always jumped at in murder cases.

Two of the negro servants were at once arrested, but before noon they were set at liberty and Graham was taken into custody. The chain already contained several links. Others were added the moment he was arrested. He was dreadfully agitated, hesitated to acknowledge that he had been near the place, and a blood stain was found on the right sleeve of his coat. Before he had been in jail one day even his own father believed him a murderer. He was examined and bound over, and it was only after that event that he began to protest his innocence. The girl who had been the cause of it came nobly to his rescue. While she truly loved him, she had been willing to make him jealous, and when murder had come of it, as she believed, she felt terribly conscience stricken and anxious to believe in his protestations of innocence.

When I came upon the ground the state had its case all worked up, and when I went over it to look for a flaw I could find none. I had to acknowledge that I was without hope. Indeed, I believed Graham guilty. His own explanations rather strengthened that belief. Lossing's house faced the east. The highway in front ran north and south. The lawn was twenty rods wide, and one drive led in from the north and the other from the south end. Graham approached from the north. He would naturally turn in at the first drive, but he claimed to have gone on to the second. He followed it to the house, passed around it, played for two or three minutes with the dogs, and then circled about the fish pond and took a short cut across the grove and struck the road, not hitting the north path at all. The dead man had come from the village as well, and on foot. He had come and attempted to return by the north drive.

If Graham was innocent who was guilty?

Not the slightest suspicion had been directed elsewhere. It seemed hopeless to look. I questioned and cross questioned him, but he could not give me the slightest foundation for a clew or a theory. What I got came by accident. I asked to see the blood stained clothing, and I found it to be a single daub of blood on a white vest. It was a curious mark, such as I had never seen before, and when I quietly investigated further I discovered that the murdered man had been struck on the back of his head and fallen forward on his face. He had very thick hair, and, while the blow had crushed the skull, he had bled but little. The blood would not spurt from such a blow. The body had not been lifted, and so how did Graham get that blood stain? Accident gave me the knowledge I was looking the ground over at Lossing's for the fourth or fifth time, when one of the dogs came and leaped upon me in a caressing way. Lossing observed it and remarked:

"Old Fan was always very fond of Graham, and I believe she misses him. Here, Fan, let me look at your paw. Ah! it's about as well as ever, isn't it?"

"What ailed her paw?" I asked.

"She got a terrible cut on a piece of glass a few weeks ago."

"About the time Graham was arrested?"

"Yes."

"Then it was her bloody paw that made the mark on his vest that night!"

"Good heavens, but it must have been!"

I had a clew and a hope. Everything changed in an hour, and I now believed Graham innocent and went to work to secure proofs. I posted up to Louisville and examined the police records for arrests. I followed a score or more of cases to their finish, but got nothing. It was my belief that a white man committed the crime, and that he meant robbery, but was frightened off. I returned to the village and looked everybody over, but got no satisfaction. The day of the trial was coming and I was in despair, but accident came to my aid again. I happened into the hotel barn as the landlord pulled a lot of rubbish out of a stall. Hidden away with it was a fine saddle, and as it was brought to light the man exclaimed:

"Bless me, here is the dead man's saddle!"

"Was it missing?" I asked.

"It was stolen on the night of his murder. That's the reason he went down to Lossing's on foot."

Who stole it? What for? An outsider, who stole the saddle for its worth, would have carried it off. An insider only would have stored it in the stall. Who was inside? A white man and two negro assistants. Within an hour I had ascertained that the white man, whose name was Foster, was absent for an hour on the evening of the murder, and that since he had acted very queerly. I arrested him, charged him with the crime, and he did not hold out fifteen minutes. His motive was robbery. He did not intend to kill his victim, but only to stun him. He had just struck him when the dogs barked greeting to Graham, and, overcome by sudden fright, Foster dashed away and dared not return. He thought he had only to keep still to render himself safe, and, but for my being present when the saddle was found, he might never have been suspected. Graham was cleared and Foster was hanged. The change had been brought about by the fondling of a dog.—New York Sun.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County, California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

THURSDAY, December 26.

In the matter of the estate and guardianship of R. Fred Brooks, an insane person—Filed Petition and Order of Citation. Issued citation.

Big Pine is the liveliest town in the Valley.

The Elliott case will not be tried before the middle of March.

Pat. Clinton came in from Darwin and spent Christmas at Independence.

Mr. and Mrs. Conklin have returned home from a short visit to San Francisco.

Every man one meets is growling about the windy weather. The wind is a howling success.

Spain is sadly stirred up, fearing that Uncle Sam wants to gobble up the island of Cuba.

Ben. Lasky, P. La Barge and J. R. Turner were up from Lone Pine early in the week.

C. D. Begolo, of Lone Pine, who has been dangerously sick for several days past is now improving.

Mrs. Lillie Brooks has applied to the Superior Court for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of her husband, R. Fred Brooks.

New York has barely raised $6,000,000 for the World's Fair while Chicago guaranteed $15,000,000 long ago.

Lone Pine had a very fine Christmas tree. The school house was filled with happy children and the children were filled with candy and joy.

Practice on the figure 9 and learn to make it gracefully for no human being now living will ever write the year without using it. The figure 9 will be with us just 109 years longer.

Poor Jim Parker awoke last week from his long sleep, danced a few bars to Pan Apis Chalfant's piping, and returned to his former state of hiberuation. Eheu! Ex nihilo nihil fit.

A grand Christmas tree was set up in the new school house at Georges Creek. It was loaded down with such things that fill little hearts with joy and the children had a happy time.

J. G. Dodge, of Lone Pine, has two young hogs of the Chink Essess breed that have increased in weight fifty pounds each per month since he got them two months ago. This appears to be a very fast growing and valuable breed.

Senator Rose, of Los Angeles, has decided to pay his $5,000 bet on Stamboul and the stake-holder, Mr. Corbett, has informed Mr. Crawford that his money is ready for him any time he desires to call for it.

Dugan & Blair recently put rolling machinery into their mill at Bishop and are now turning out a fine article of flour. So successful is the new machinery that they are [illegible] more of the same kind.

D. Gill had his shoulder broken last week by a horse falling upon him. Dr. Woodin set the broken bone and D. is now doing well. It was his "rope arm," but it will be all right before "long-ears" are sporting in the Spring breezes.

The Crocker Brothers, of Big Pine, a few days ago butchered twenty four head of fine hogs. Ed. Crocker says they will average about 350 pounds each. This will make a fine lot of hams and bacon. The hogs were fattened on alfalfa and grain.

Mr. J. H. Roberts spent several days in town this week. While here he obtained power of attorney from some forty persons to locate and sell mining ground. He is interested in Saline Valley borax mines and intends to do considerable work developing his property.

There is a great and growing interest in the borax fields of Saline Valley. Conn & Trudo have secured a large area of the best borax locations in the valley. This is certain to be a very valuable property. The borax fields will ensure a vast amount of business for Big Pine.

The California Athletic Club has sent an offer to Kilrain to fight Joe McAuliffe for a purse of $3,500. Kilrain says the expenses of the trip are too heavy for him to consent to fight for less than $5,000, and if the Club will increase the sum to that figure he will accept their proposition.

The Irrigation of Arid Lands Committee consists of Vandever of California, Chairman, Spooner of Rhode Island, Bland of Missouri, Hansbro of North Dakota, Pickler of South Dakota, Connell of Nebraska, Wallace of New York, Hatch of Missouri, Herbert of Alabama, Perry of South Carolina, Lanham of Texas and Clancy of New York.

A man named Harvey D. Griswold was found dead in a cabin at Virginia City at the end of last week. He had cut the artery at his wrist with a razor and bled to death. A basin had been placed by the side of the bed to catch the blood. Griswold was in ill health, unable to work and poor, and preferred death to life under such circumstances. The Enterprise says he lived at Lone Pine many years ago and that relatives live in New Jersey.

From Candelaria.

Special Correspondence.

EDS. INDEPENDENT:—There is a rumor in camp that the Candelaria Mill & Water Co. has bought the Holmes and Northern Belle properties. Mr. Sunderland is on his way from New York to San Francisco; he is the manager of the C. M. & W. Co. It is said that Mr. Westerville, the resident Superintendent, has demanded the possession of the Holmes from Mr. Girard, the agent for the Holmes. Mr. Girard says the Holmes is sold but he has not received orders to turn the property over to the new owners. There are over one hundred Chinamen working at Columbus for the Pacific Salt & Borax Co. They ship about five hundred tons of borax per month. Teals Marsh has also started up.

The Mt. Diablo will shut down for a week to give the men a rest and overhaul the machinery at the hoisting works. Their mill at Sodaville is running on ore from the Columbus Con. mine. Thomas Harrington, formerly with Given & Ingalls, of Bishop, is foreman of the Columbus mine.

The Palmetto mill started up on the 17th inst.

Mr. Andy Fyfe has purchased the Kincaid lead mine at Sylvania. I am informed that the price paid was $15,000.

Mr. A. Spencer, of Bishop, was up last week looking after mining interests here. Wallace Miller, Shorty Edwards, Frank Mattlick and Ben. Webster, from Inyo, are here at work. Milburn Hall, of Bishop, has leased a blacksmith shop here and will commence work the first of the year. Dr. Friedline is up here emptying and filling the mouths of many of our people.

Considerable chloriding is being done on the Potosi, the property of T. Reddy, and other claims. There are fourteen men working on the Garfield mine. Mr. Hooper, the Superintendent, has gone to London and it is understood that on his return they will put on about thirty men.

If the Holmes is sold there will be considerable money expended here. Mr. Sunderland has ordered the resident Superintendent to examine the Holmes and send him a report to San Francisco what the probable cost will be to put the Holmes property in good working order and what it will cost to get out thirty tons of ore per day. G. C.

Fish Springs Mines.

There are fine mining prospects at Fish Springs. Elliott and "Doc." Graham have opened up a ledge of gold ore that will pay well. Henry Melone and C. F. Fuller have developed a fine ledge that gives from sixty to eighty dollars per ton in gold and there is said to be enough in sight to give them both a "good stake." Commetti, an Italian miner, worked twenty tons a week or so ago that netted him eight hundred dollars. All over the district new ledges of good paying ore are being found and all can be very easily worked. All the ledges opened so far are by tunnels and two men can work a ledge that may pay them well. Supplies of all kinds can be easily got; there is plenty of water and a fine farming country close to the mines. The distance from the town of Big Pine is but six miles and the locality is one of the pleasantest in Owens Valley.

The Georgias.

A goodly number was in attendance at the entertainment and ball given by the Georgia Minstrels on Christmas night. The ebony-hued performers kept the audience in a continuous roar of laughter with their witticisms and performances. Houdin is a tyro compared to the juggler of the company. We have heard of lungs being talked out of people but this was the first ocular demonstration of a man being talked out of a well. Ben. Butler was all present, ever to the spoons—the latter being in the audience. The entertainment came to an end by a "close shave" and the floor was cleared for dancing, which was continued to an early hour. At midnight the company adjourned to the Norman House Dining Parlors and partook of one of O. I. Mairs' bountiful spreads. The management was a complete success, the boys having several "cases" to divide among themselves as "souvenirs."

Christmas at Big Pine.

A rainy night did not prevent a large turnout of people at Big Pine on Christmas Eve. A very fine Christmas tree was set up in the new school house and a crowd of children were made just as happy as children can be. Mr. D. Crough, the teacher, had trained his pupils to sing several Christmas songs in a very creditable manner. After distribution of gifts the floor was cleared, music called for, and Justice Uhlemeyer and others responded promptly. A dance was soon in progress and all hands pitched in with a will. Mrs. Crocker, as usual was ready to give all comers a glorious feast at midnight and after that the fun was kept up till near morning. A collection was taken up and forty-three dollars realized for a bell for the new school building.

An Old Time Cattle Sale.

Talk about the low price of cattle, but just remember what cattle sold for in other years. An old timer says he remembers well when the Wilder Brothers in 1850 bought several hundred head of cattle from Major Martin, of Los Angeles county, and the price paid was half a dollar a head. The cattle were rolling fat; they were driven north, butchered, and the meat sold to the miners in El Dorado, Stanislaus and Placer counties at an average price of thirty cents per pound. The Wilders realized many thousands of dollars on the trade. Now the city of Los Angeles imports cattle from Arizona and other distant ranges at seventeen dollars a head.

Mine Sale.

Over at Fish Lake an old prospector named Kincaid has lately sold two mine locations for fifteen thousand dollars. The buyer is Andy Fyfe, a well known mining man. Kincaid has been prospecting in that locality for many years; he is now getting old but this sale will give him enough to live the rest of days in comfort. The ore in the mines carries silver and lead. Beyond any doubt there will be a good deal of activity in mining about Fish Lake the coming Spring. The district is just over the California line, in Nevada. Most of the farm products and beef used in the district will be obtained in Owens Valley in the neighborhood of Big Pine.

Syrup of Figs.

Produced from the laxative and nutricious juice of California figs, combined with the medicinal virtues of plants known to be most benificial to the human system, acts gently, on the kidneys, lives and bowels, effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds and headaches, and curing habitual constipation.

Religious Services.

Rev. J. H. De La Matyr will preach at Lone Pine on Sunday at 11 o'clock, a. m.; at Georges Creek at 2:00 p. m. and at Independence at 7 o'clock evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Christmas Tree.

On Christmas Eve. the sound of merry carols sung by happy children was heard in the school house, where a bright scene was presented. Young and old were reveling in the merry Yule-tide, and peace and good-will were written on every countenance. The three large pines enstarred with twinkling candles were heavily laden with the Christmas fruit, and Old Santa Claus was there to serve it out with liberal hands. The untiring zeal with which Miss Kohler has worked for this festival has been fully appreciated, and we feel that to her the community owes a pleasant evening and a Merry Christmas.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE LAST STRAW.

"You are too late, my friend." Philip had been sitting in his study in the darkness which was not more black than his life. But he arose to give his cold hand to Mr. Philbrick, who had come at last.

"Why too late? This is only Wednesday. Have you changed your mind? I did not suppose there was so much hurry, and I wanted to have everything ready."

"It is too late," answered Philip gloomily. What use to tell the old gentleman that Philip Breton's wife was a criminal before the law, that the transfer of the mill property was only a part of his scheme to save her from an infamous penalty, that their deadliest enemy knew all their plans now, and no doubt her sleepless eyes watched their every movement, lest they should escape her hate.

The servant came to the door. "I suppose you will have lights, sir. Some men from the mill folks want to see you."

"Oh, yes; show them in," he said carelessly.

There were not chairs enough for the four workmen who came stumbling in like pall bearers at a country funeral, but Philip did not seem to look at them. One took his place by the window, and soiled the curtain with his hands; another, apparently the spokesman, disdained to lean against anything, but stood stock still in the centre of the room, bent forward a little in an attitude borrowed from the prize ring. His feet were planted well apart, and his arms bowed out at the elbows.

"I suppose you have some complaints to make," said the young mill owner with a gentleness of tone that was quite misunderstood by the delegation, who immediately tried to look very fierce.

"Ye're right, sir," answered the man in the center of the room. "Ye know yerself, ye aint doin' the right thing by us."

Philip did not speak for a moment, and Mr. Philbrick would have thought he had not heard the fellow, only for a little twitching at the corners of his mouth. Apparently the young man was deeply hurt by his failure to satisfy his men.

"I have done the best I knew."

"Wal, we kin tell yer, if ye don't know no better," resumed the workman insolently. Philip's eyes flashed at him, then dropped to the carpet again. "Pay us more wages for one thing, shorten up our hours for another."

"You fare better than others. I divide the profits with you. You thought I was very good with you once." The young man's tone was not argumentative, it was too hopeless for that.

"Yer don't divvy even; our share don't 'mount to much," put in the man who was soiling the window curtain.

"I am sorry for you, but you can't expect me to make you all rich." There was such a sadness of reproach in Philip's voice that a mist gathered before Philbrick's kind eyes. But the workmen got the idea they were frightening the young master.

"I have gone as far as I can see my way. Don't you think you had better be patient with me?"

"Be you goin' to raise our pay?" Philip shook his head thoughtfully.

"I cannot understand it is my duty or my right."

"Are you goin' to shorten up our hours?" asked the man at the window.

"I cannot"——

The chief spokesman turned to his companions. "Ther ain't no use. Wal, 'squire, to-morrow you may wish you had. Come along, boys."

Philip had dropped back heavily into his chair. He seemed to have forgotten the presence of Mr. Philbrick, until that gentleman began to explain his more perfect system.

"How can you expect your help to be satisfied," Philbrick was saying; "even if they were well paid it would be small object for them to be shut up all their lives, as if they were convicts. But you don't pay them, either. It isn't because the business don't pay, for your father's profits and yours were enormous. It is all the result of a false valuation of the worth of services. Now I shall seek to remove the burdens that crush the people and restrict there natural development."

Philip said nothing. How well his old friend had kept his enthusiasm through all the years of his life! Well, it would do no harm to let him talk on.

"You will ask me for details." Mr. Philbrick took his seat again and drew up to him a sheet of paper and a pencil. "You will ask what burdens they are that are on the million, besides the common necessary burdens of human nature. I will tell you the principal burden, it is the intolerable tribute to accumulated capital laid upon the working classes, which makes a tyrant of the man who has saved a surplus out of his wages, and caused the hopeless vis inertiæ of poverty. Like all forms of slavery its effects are great apparent luxury, which never penetrates below the very surface of society, and tireless industry which earns nothing for the workers but food barely enough to support his day's work. It is benefit enough for the man who has saved money that he can work to better advantage; it is a lever in his hands. If we permit capital to take such enormous profits as it does, every day and year it increases, as wealth increases, the crushing tax on labor. I shall pay you but 2 per cent on the money I shall owe you on account of the mill property. The rest of the income of the business above two per cent, belongs to the laborer."

The reformer glanced expectantly at Philip. But the dull, hopeless look that was on his face an hour ago had not changed.

"I am not sure but that is too much," pursued Mr. Philbrick, "but it will only be a little while before I shall pay up the debt."

There was no use in stopping the enthusiastic old gentleman, whose great heart was a fountain of human kindness. It would be time enough for Philip to tell him that he had changed his plans later.

"But I shall also shorten the hours of work. Six hours of confinement in the mills is enough, and without leisure all the advantages I can give my work people will be of little avail. I can let different sets of hands relieve each other if it seems necessary, or build new mills and take in a thousand more hands to share the blessings of justice."

Mr. Philbrick leaned back in his chair and a great light of benevolence shone in his face. It was a pity to disappoint him.

"This is an opportunity I have hoped for a whole lifetime. I can show the world that labor ought not and need not be wretched and famished. It is more blindness than willful cruelty that delays great reforms. If I can once show the world what justice is and how it works it will not be long before"——

"But, my dear friend," said Philip, dropping his eyes to the floor, "did I not tell you it was too late? I am not going to sell. You will have to select some other spot for your Utopia." The young man spoke bitterly. Unconscious of his selfishness, he begrudged the rest of the world the happiness he had missed.

Then came a moment of intense silence which was broken at last, not by a voice, but by the loud ringing of a door bell. It rang so violently the great, silent house echoed again. Had the end come then? Philip leaped to his feet. Wild thoughts of desperate expedients rushed through his fevreish brain, but he yet stood like a statue when the study door opened behind him. He tore open a telegram and read aloud:

"Steamer Salvator delayed till to-morrow morning at 3."

For a moment he did not take in its meaning. Then he caught Philbrick's arm so tightly the old gentleman almost cried out.

"Do you want the mills as you said? You were not joking, oh, you were not joking?" Philbrick gazed at him in astonishment. Philip seemed in such a terrible state of excitement. His pallor was replaced by a burning flush, his eyes that had been so dull shone with unnatural brightness. "Your plans will succeed better than mine, and you can't find such a good place as this. You will take my mills."

"Of course I will, but I thought you said"——

"Never mind," cried the young man, "never mind what I said. Draw the papers at once. But no, I cannot wait." Philip turned on his heel as if no earthly power could detain him a moment longer.

"But the papers are all ready." And Mr. Philbrick took a bundle of documents from his breast pocket, and laid them on the table.

"Where shall I sign them—quick?" demanded Philip.

"No, no, not there, that is my note to you; sign here, and here, and here."

"I can hardly see; everything dances before my eyes. Is it all done now?"

He hardly waited to take the papers Mr. Philbrick had signed for him. Then, without another word, he rushed from the room and bounded up the stairs. Freedom! safety! oh, thank God, thank God! He could save her yet. A castle on the Rhine, a palace in Venice; he would find the rarest homes for her. How sweet it would be to hide with her. The awful sense of hourly peril would lift from his soul.

He pushed open the door of the white chamber. Bertha had been sleeping. The tear marks were on her cheeks that had lost their beautiful flush. She was so disappointed, poor girl; and yet she never guessed——

"Wake up, wake up, my darling." She started from the bed and fell to weeping on his shoulder.

"I dreamed they were taking me away from you, Philip." But he dried her tears with merry kisses.

"We are in time yet. The steamer don't go till 3 to-night."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

UNWELCOME VISITORS.

The watchman at the mills was not a little surprised, as he went his first round that night, to see a man's figure leaning against a pillar in one of the weave rooms. The fellow did not appear to mean any harm; he was not breaking anything or stealing any cloth, but how could he have found his way inside? The watchman felt a little uneasy in spite of himself; it was such a thing as had never happened before.

"Hello! what business have you got there?"

But the interloper did not appear to hear him. How oddly he looked at the looms, as if they were living things that he loved. He had not spoken, and his hat shaded his eyes, but the expression of the attitude was so plain that even so rude a man as the watchman could read the tender reminiscence in his heart. Perhaps the fellow might be crazy, but this was no place for him. Oh! I didn't know you, Mr. Breton. It's a nice evenin', sir."

But the mill owner did not even answer him, and moved away toward the window as if impatient at being interrupted. The moon was full, and the sky was clear, only for a few silver edged clouds. One, he fancied a ship sailing over the sea, but how slowly it glided; could it go no faster? Ah! suddenly it parted into bright fragments, and the wind scattered them pitilessly. He looked across at the other mills; the moonlight kissed their grim walls fondly, and sparkled in their windows like a hundred brilliant lamps. Why, here were his fire escapes, close to the window coping—his first business venture. Philip raised the window and stepped outside.

It must be nearly time for Bertha to come with the carriage, as he had arranged, to avoid possible suspicion. No, there was half an hour yet. But Philip closed the window behind him and went down the silent stairs.

He went into his office. He would wait there for the carriage, it would not be very long, and then there was one last duty he must attend to before it came. He struck a match, and the gas shot up so brightly it dazzled his eyes. He turned away for an instant.

A massive form stood in the doorway. Philip must have left the counting room unlocked when he had come in. Some one had followed him, apparently. But the young mill owner took only one step toward the intruder. It was no stranger that crossed his threshold, but a man whose name was burned into his heart. It was the rightful husband of Philip Breton's wife—Curran. His hair had grown long and almost straight about his neck. His cheeks were thin and haggard, and the form that had been like a proud oak was bowed as if it had been weighed down by a burden too heavy even for a giant to bear. Philip stopped short and looked at the man with speechless terror. He had supposed him hundreds of miles away. Could it be possible the outraged husband had never left the village since their last meeting? Perhaps his flashing eyes had watched Philip woeing his wife a second time, and begrudged him his few cold kisses. Perhaps he had peered in through the windows of Philip's home; had he not a right to look at his wife, and followed them forth on every walk and drive, waiting to strike till the blow should fall most deadly. He had chosen his time well. Poor Bertha, with her dreams of Como and Chamouni. But what would he do? Leap upon his enemy and kill him? The man in the doorway looked too pale and ill for such violence; would he then heap curses upon him, the bitterest human lips ever uttered? But Curran advanced into the room with outstretched hand.

"Don't you know me, then, friend?"

Philip hesitated again. There might be a grain of hope yet; he would surely never have given the young man his hand if he had known—or called him friend.

"Some one wrote me to come. I don't know what he wanted," Curran explained wearily. "They expect so much of a man; they want him to be a God; and if he were they would crucify him."

Philip was recovering his composure. At first he had felt a wild impulse to confess everything to the wronged husband. He seemed so grand, so magnanimous; he would not be cruel. But then his reason came back to him. In such a case as this there could be no amends. Innocently, Bertha and Philip had done him a terrible wrong—and themselves; forgiveness could not blot it out. God in his mercy might spare them the penalty of infamy; but the injured husband had no choice but vindicate his honor, when he came to know.

"You look ill," said Philip at last, drawing him out a chair. Should he detain him? Bertha might come before her time and break in upon them, the two men both of whom she had injured so terribly? Oh! that must not happen. Was not that a step in the passage now? Should he let Curran go, then? The first man he met would pour the story of his shame into his ears, and then the catastrophe. He must not go—but he must not stay. Philip looked out into the passage. No one was there. Curran had dropped into the chair Philip had offered him.

"Do I look ill?" he asked, pushing his long hair back from his forehead. "Did you ever love a woman who hated you? Did you ever want to pour out your life for her, and see that she despised you? You know whom I mean. Why I once fancied you and she were lovers, till she told me not. I mean Bertha." He spoke the name so tenderly, a thrill of shame passed over Philip. Bertha was this man's wife. Had he not a right then to speak her name tenderly? And so Curran had fancied Bertha and he were lovers till she told him not—ah, Bertha.

"She has left me," Curran went on in the same soft, tender tone. "I don't suppose it interests you. But if I could only see her now, I have such a strange feeling that I might win her back. She made such a tender sweetheart." Then he lifted his eyes more firmly to Philip's face, set like a wall of rock. "Is there any trouble among your help?"

"Yes, they have flung all my offers in my teeth."

"It must have been that which made them send for me. I had hoped, or feared, I hardly know which, it might be something of Bertha. It is queer, isn't it, a woman like her should turn my head so completely? What is there about her, did you ever think of it? Of course you haven't." Curran seemed to make an effort to dismiss all thoughts of her that unmanned him. "You needn't be afraid of me; I thought you seemed a little strange when I came in."

Philip started involuntarily, but Curran continued: "I sha'n't encourage any strikes against you. God will bless your life for your work for the poor. If he hasn't yet, he will give you a happier love than he has given me." Then he rose with new energy to his feet. "I must go and stop the mischief. I can do more with your laborers for good or evil than any man in the world. I suppose they may be in the hall to-night?"

"Yes." But Philip hurried up to him and laid his hand on his arm. "But don't go, not yet."

"I must. Shall you be here long? Well, I will see you again to-night."

"God grant not," murmured Philip Breton, as the door closed after him. Then Philip unlocked the great safe and swung back its green door of iron. He took out a packet and locked the safe again, and carried his packet back to his office. He turned the gas still higher and held the packet in the flame till all that was left of it was a little heap of charred paper on the floor—all that was left of Philip Breton's will. With that act he closed up, as he believed, all that part of his life worthy to be remembered. He was young and strong, but he had failed. Henceforth he must look on while others worked. Fate had taken his work away from him. He must sit back on the seats with the women and children, and look on and applaud when great deeds were doing. He would have liked to work, too; but perhaps others would do his work better.

"Hallo, hallo, Phil, don't you work pretty late?" It was Giddings, the lawyer, in a condition of decided intoxication. "I'll bet yer dollar you don't know what I came for? ha, ha, ha; you think money; don't you; more money? But I aint that sort of a feller."

Philip had been simply disgusted at first, but there seemed a terrible leer in the drunken eyes. Could it be the man had come to expose him? What was the use of struggling against his destiny any longer? If he could have gone yesterday, he would have saved all risks. But he had waited just too long. Curran had returned to claim his wife. Jane Ellingsworth had discovered everything. And now this Giddings in his drunkard's foolishness was threatening what ruin he could bring.

"You are not going to do anything rash are you," said Philip, dropping his eyes in humiliation.

But Giddings came close to him and laid his hand on his shoulder. Then he put his face close to Philip's, with a drunken man's false measure of distance. The young man writhed at his touch, and held his breath to avoid taking the hot fumes of bad liquor the fellow exhaled. But he did not dare to anger the low creature.

"Did you think," continued Giddings with gushing reproachfulness, "that I aint got any conscience? You're doin' wrong, Mr. Breton. I aint got no right—no right to let it go on. Did you think I aint got no conscience?"

Philip shook him off and his face grew so terrible that the fellow winced as he had done before at that look.

"Don't strike—don't kill me, Phil—Mr. Breton, I was only jokin'—can't you tell when a man's jokin'. Got any money 'bout clothes, say $50; 'm awful hard up. I wouldn't hurt you; your altogether too nice fellow." He leered affectionately at the young man, then suddenly he winked frightfully.

Philip threw him a roll of bills. It was the last blood money the scoundrel would ever draw. By to-morrow morning Philip Breton and his wife would be beyond the reach of harm, or beyond the reach of help, one or the other. "There is $100; take it and go, I have business."

"Ten, twenty, and twenty makes thirty, ten, and twenty and twenty, here aint but $80. Thought I's too drunk to coun' did you?"

"There is $100 there."

"'S lie. Yer takin' vantage me cause I'm drunk."

This creature must be away if it cost $1,000. He crowded another $20 bill into the fellow's clammy hand.

"Now go, or you'll stay longer than you want to."

Giddings dried his tears and gathered his limp joints together to go. But he insisted on Philip's shaking hands.

But even after Giddings had got into the hall Philip heard the fellow muttering to himself. He stepped hurriedly to the door of his office to catch the word, but could not. If Philip had been a little quicker he would have heard this:

"Somethin' up, I ain't so drung but I ca' see that. Guess 'sil g'up to the boy's house. His wife 'll know me, he, he."

Would Bertha never come? If they escaped now it must be but by a hair's breadth. Ruin would be close upon them. For the adjustment of a ribbon she would sacrifice everything. It seemed a great while since Curran had left the office for the labor meeting, and he had not so far to go. Something might have delayed the terrible disclosure for a few moments, but by this time he must surely have heard the whole story of his shame and dishonor. It would stir him to madness. His noble eyes would flash lightnings, and thunderbolts of hate and scorn would drop from his lips. No human being could stand against the divine dignity of such a man's righteous wrath. Philip fancied the mob sweeping up the road behind this outraged husband, seeking out his wife for the doom that would satisfy his mad thirst for vengeance. Now, perhaps, they were bursting in the gates, now breaking down the oaken door. And Philip could not be there to protect the beautiful woman who had only sinned through love for him. How the color would flee her cheeks as she looked out on the pitiless faces of the frenzied mob. There was no arm now to shield her, none but Curran's, whose love was now embittered into hate. There was no pity in his white, wasted face, only insulted love, only scorn that could grind her fair life, without one throb of tenderness, beneath his feet.

Why did she not come! Philip was almost wild with mingled terror and hope. He walked the room like a caged lion. Now he rushed to the door and glanced desperately up and down the street.

His horses were champing their bits at her door, but the light yet burned in her chamber. There was hardly time to catch the train at the Lockout station. The wild mob with the maddened lover, the most terrible of enemies, at their head would be at her door in a moment. Still other dangers Philip did not guess threw a gathering shadow across her path. But she lingered yet.

A Postal Mission.

I had a bright idea the other day and I want to pass it along as we do the dishes at the table. I had been reading about a postal autograph album, composed of many postal cards from different parts of the country, each having a sentiment and the name and address of the sender written upon it, and all made into a little book with tinted cardboard covers, by means of narrow ribbon. And I thought, why wouldn't it be nice to have a postal mission? That is, when we know of some one who is in special trouble or sick, or is an invalid, we might write the sweetest and most healthful sentiment, either prose or poetry, that we chance to know, perhaps accompanied by a Bible text, on a postal card and send it to the afflicted one. We all know how eagerly we look for a message from some one through the postoffice and how pleased we are when one comes, so I think we may be able to give much pleasure in this thoughtful and inexpensive way. I myself am an invalid and know just how a sweet verse of poetry, coming as the kindly thought of a friend, can help one and make a dark day bright. Let me whisper a little secret to you: For every effort you make to give others pleasure, you yourself will receive an equivalent. For every cent's worth of pleasure you give (a postal card costs a cent, you know), no doubt you will receive ten cents' worth for yourself. It is God's geometrical ratio. "Give and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down and shaken together and running over."—Daisy in Springfield Homestead.

—The New Britain, Ct., Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union has organized mission work among the young girls employed in the factories. From the small nucleus of one room and twenty or thirty girls the work has grown rapidly until now a tenement of seven rooms is required to accommodate the large number of regular attendants. The rooms are open four evenings in the week and two hours on Sunday. There are classes in dressmaking, penmanship and singing and reading matter is supplied by a circulating library.

ANOTHER FAMILY OUT OF TROUBLE AND, AS A RESULT, HAPPY.

Such a remark as this will always draw the attention of every good thinking man or woman. We all desire to be out of trouble and happy, and when we read as above, our hearts join in congratulations. This is one of the many cases that our heading meets exactly:

I, G. W. Mortley, 536½ Howard St., have been a severe sufferer for years, and have had the best doctors in San Francisco attending me, without any results for the better. My trouble was severe attacks of pains in my back and chest; headache; loss of appetite; languid, tired feelings; skin rough and greasy, and, in fact generally broken down in health. I purchased two bottles of your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, and after two weeks I find myself cured from all my ailments. My appetite is fine, my pains are gone, my skin is clear, and I can surely say I am well, and will ever thank your wonderful remedy for my health, and in fact, my life.

Very truly yours, G. W. Mortley,
536½ Howard St., San Francisco, Cal."

Not to be Blamed.

Father Taylor one Sunday afternoon was officiating at an infant baptism, and the church was filled with a large audience as usual. The baby was restless during the services, and when Father Taylor took her in his arms she cried as only infants can cry. But this didn't in the least disturb the old minister, for, raising the child in his arms where all the people could see her, he said: "Don't blame the child for crying, but thank the Lord that she has such good lungs."—Concord (N. H.) Monitor.

—During the Franco-Prussian war, a corporal came to the doctor with one of his men who was unfit for the saddle. The doctor examined him, and found him suffering from rheumatism. The corporal proceeded to fill up the requisite form for the man's admission to the nearest military hospital. "Can you spell rheumatism, corporal?" said the doctor. "I think I can, doctor, thank you," replied he, saluting. The corporal was Louis Coetloyon, one of the leading journalists of Paris.

The San Francisco Police Department

Is a unique institution. To judge from the high and mighty tone assumed by the Police Commissioners whenever one of their pets is charged with what in a private citizen would merit condign punishment, one would imagine that the Archangel Michael had sent down a deputation of Heaven's policemen to patrol our pavements for the sake of exercise. Police Judge Lawler a day or two ago intimated that anyone who accused the police of venal motives is guilty of a contempt of court. This is probably a logical outcome of the sentence of the editor of the Star. We wonder if it is a contempt of court to call the attention of the police to the existence of the Little Lousiana Lottery Company, who do a flourishing business right under their noses in broad daylight, and escape with a semi-occasional fine of sixty dollars? This concern deserves no more consideration than any tan game in Chinatown. It has feloniously appropriated the name and is using the prestige of the Louisiana State Lottery to impose upon the confidence of the public and beguile them into believing that it is organized legally and is solvent. The Louisiana State Lottery is a lawful enterprise in the State of its creation. It also has this to recommend it—that a large percentage of its receipts go to charitable and other public purposes in Louisiana, while it is no small merit that the winner is sure of his prize. The so-called Little Louisiana Lottery, on the contrary, is a California scheme, utterly without warrant of law and headed by irresponsible individuals, who any day may find a trip to Canada advantageous to their financial and bodily safety. The police know the location of their offices as well as that of the City Hall, and yet they are never raided. The managers seem to have devised a cunning system of surrendering one of their number every month or two to undergo a small fine as a sort of peace offering to the offended majesty of the law.—San Francisco (Cal.) Wasp, Oct. 26.

Of unwise admiration much may be hoped, for much good is really in it; but unwise contempt is itself a negation; nothing comes of it, for it is nothing.

You may sing of the beauty of springtime
That glows on the cheek of the young
But I sing of a beauty that's rarer
Than any of which you have sung.
The beauty that's seen in the faces
Of women whose summer is o'er,
The autumn-like beauty that charms us
Far more than the beauty of yore.

But this beauty is seen too rarely. The faces of most women lose the beauty of youth too soon. Female disorders are like frosts which come to nip the flowers which betoken good health, without which there can be no real beauty. If our American women would fortify themselves against the approach of the terrible disorders so prevalent among them, by using Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, their good looks would be retained to a "sweet old age." This remedy is a guaranteed cure for all the distressing weaknesses and derangements peculiar to women.

"I suffered severely from chronic catarrh, arising from impure blood. It became very bad, causing soreness of the bronchial tubes and a troublesome cough, which gave great anxiety to my friends and myself, as two brothers died from bronchial consumption. I tried many medicines but received no benefit. I was at last induced to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I am not the same man in health or feelings. My catarrh is cured, my throat is entirely well, and a dyspepsia trouble, with sick headache, have all disappeared." E. M. Lincoln, 35 Chambers St., Boston,

HOW I SAVED MY LIFE.

I was taken sick while at the dinner table with terrible distress in my stomach. Before this I had been hearty and strong. For fourteen days I kept getting worse, despite the efforts of two doctors. I lost forty pounds, and was satisfied that I could live but a few days. My trouble was Stomach and Liver Complaint, resulting in an attack of bilious colic. At this time I saw Dr. David Kennedy's Favorite Remedy, of Rondout, N. Y., advertised, and sent for a bottle. I also sent for my physician, and told him that I was going to try the Favorite Remedy. He examined it and told me to use it three days and let him know the result. In the three days I walked four miles. Dr. Kennedy's Favorite Remedy has saved my life.—W. S. THE CHAMBER OF TORTURE

Is the apartment to which the unhappy sufferer from inflammatory rheumatism is confined. If ere the crisis of pain is reached, that fine preventive, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, is used by persons of a rheumatic tendency, much unnecessary suffering is avoided. Nervines, anodynes and sedatives, while having none but a specific effect, are yet very desirable at times. Yet can they produce no lasting effect upon rheumatism, because they have no power to eliminate from the blood the rheumatic virus. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters does this, and checks at the outset a disease which, if allowed to gain headway, it is next to impossible to dislodge or to do more than relieve. Rheumatism, it should be remembered, is a disease with a fatal tendency from its proneness to attack the heart. A resort to the Bitters should, therefore, be prompt. Dyspepsia, kidney complaint, malaria and nervousness are relieved by it.

HOPE FOR THE SICK.

One Remedy for One Disease.

(From Medical Journal).

"The four greatest medical centres of the world are London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. These cities have immense hospitals teeming with suffering humanity. Crowds of students throng the wards studying under the Professors in charge. The most renowned physicians of the world teach and practice here, and the institutions are storehouses of medical knowledge and experience. With a view of making this experience available to the public the Hospital Remedy Co. at great expense secured the prescriptions of the hospitals, prepared the specifics, and although it would cost from $25 to $100 to secure the attention of their distinguished originators, yet in this way these valuable medicines are sold at the price of the quack patent medicines that flood the market and absurdly claim to cure every ill from a sing.' bottle. The want always felt for a reliable class of domestic remedies is now filled with perfect satisfaction. The hospital Remedies make no unreasonable claims. The specific for Catarrh cures that and nothing else; so with the specific for Bronchitis, Consumption and Lung Troubles; Rheumatism is cured by No. 3, while troubles of Digestion, Stomach, Liver and Kidneys have their own cure. To these is added a specific for Fever and Ague, one for female weakness—a general tonic and blood-maker that makes blood and gives form and fullness, and an incomparable remedy for Nervous Debility." These remedies are all sold on an absolute guarantee to do what is claimed for them.

A circular describing this new method of treating disease is sent free on application by Hospital Remedy Company, Toronto, Canada, Sole Proprietors.

CATARRHAL DEAFNESS

A NEW TREATMENT.

Sufferers are not generally aware that these diseases are contagious, or that they are due to the presence of living parasites in the lining membrane of the nose and eustachian tubes. Microscopic research, however, has proved this to be a fact, and the result of this discovery is that a simple remedy has been discovered which permanently cures the most aggravated cases of these distressing diseases by a few simple applications made (two weeks apart) by the patient at home. A pamphlet explaining this new treatment is sent free by A. H. Dixon & Son, 337 and 339 West King Street, Toronto, Canada.

TRADE S.S.S. MARK

Having for the past four or five years been troubled with pimples and blotches on my face and body, and finding no relief in any of the chemically prepared soaps and medicines prescribed for me by physicians, I concluded to try your S.
